THIS work is designed to accomplish the following purposes:

1st. To combine, as far as possible, in one work of reasonable and convenient compass, and at a price to bring it within the reach of all, the peculiar excellencies and advantages of Henry's, Scott's, and Doddridge's Commentaries (confessedly the most popular and useful in the language,) together with a large quantity of matter, explanatory and illustrative of the Scriptures, from other sources.

2d. To present the whole, thus collected and combined, in a form at once attractive and convenient for family use and private reading, with special reference also to the wants of SABBATH SCHOOLS and BIBLE CLASSES.

3d. In the selections, the aim has been throughout, on the one hand, to be as full as possible, drawing largely from the rich sources opened by a range of as many as a hundred authors; and, on the other hand, to guard against tediousness and repulsiveness, by too great minuteness. The design has been to draw out the best parts of the best writers, with a strict watchfulness that every part should be evangelical, plain, familiar, and applicatory, and adapted to the exigencies of our country and the times, and suited to the wants of the great body of the people. To this end all words in foreign languages are omitted in the critical notes and quotations.

Each of the leading Commentaries forming the main body of this work has its peculiar advantages, and its friends and admirers; and each has its defects. It is hoped that here, the advantages of all will be found combined without their defects, so that the admirers of each may here meet on common ground. To accomplish this object, great care has been taken. The Text, according to the authorized version in common use, is arranged in a column by itself, to admit of its being read independently of all remarks; to this are added the popular and full Marginal References of Scott, entire; Henry's Exposition or Commentary will be found slightly abridged, or, more properly, perhaps, condensed; but every useful or important thought is retained, and in his own language, and this is also placed by itself in columns parallel with and by the side of the text, so as to be read independently of all the rest.

At the end of every suitable division of the text are placed the Practical Observations of Scott, arranged separately as in his own work; and at the bottom of the page is a large body of Explanatory, Illustrative, and Critical Notes, containing whatever in addition is valuable in Scott and Doddridge, with copious selections from Adam Clarke, Gill, Burder, Calmet, Rosenmueller, Bloomfield, and many other authors. Wherever it is practicable, wood engravings, illustrative of the subjects, are introduced. Thus an amalgamation of the different authors is carefully guarded against, and each reader may often consult his own favorite. In the notes, also, the manners and customs, natural history, geography, botany, &c., of the Bible, are fully illustrated.

It is therefore believed that this work offers to the reader more advantages than the possession of the works of Henry, Scott, and Doddridge themselves would, even could they all together be procured at the same expense; as he is saved the trouble of turning over and searching for a passage in three different works, and finding much of the same matter in all, besides having the additional views of many other esteemed writers.

In the abridgment of Henry, great carefulness has been used, so that his most jealous friends should not be offended by any liberties taken; and it is confidently believed it will be found much more pleasant reading in this form than in the original.

On the Doctrines, it may confidently be asserted that Henry, Scott, and Doddridge, speak their own opinions unadulterated and entire. Where anything has been omitted from Scott, it was because it is anticipated in the remarks of Henry.

In the mechanical department the publishers have exerted themselves to the utmost to present the work in a handsome and durable form. In carrying their plan into execution, an expense will be incurred surpassing that attending any other work ever issued in America, with one or two exceptions; and they have fixed the price so low, that nothing but an extensive sale can sustain them in the enterprise. They are happy, however, in saying, that the encouragement thus far given has been unparalleled in this country.

In using this work in family worship, it is not recommended that all the remarks should be read, but with a portion of text the observations of Scott, which are more particularly designed for that object, or selections of the practical parts of Henry. Difficult passages will occasionally render a resort to the explanatory notes needful.

THE NEW TESTAMENT OF OUR LORD AND SAVIOR, JESUS CHRIST.

INTRODUCTION WITH SPECIAL REFERENCE TO 'THE FOUR GOSPELS'

GENERAL VIEW.

WITHOUT enlarging on the great desirableness of a revelation from God, and its appropriate evidences subjects referred mainly to the Introduction of this work at large, the state of the Jews themselves, as acknowledged by their own historian, and much more that of the heathen, might be assumed as needing the interposition of the Most High. 'I deem it unnecessary,' observes Dr. PALEY, 'to prove that mankind stood in need of a revelation, because I have met with no serious person who thinks that even under the Christian revelation we have too much light, or any assurance which is superfluous.' And he adds, 'I desire, moreover, that, in judging of Christianity, it may be remembered, that the question lies between this religion, and none: for if the Christian religion be not credible, no one, with whom we have to do, will support any other.*' Such, indeed, was the state of the question in his day; but in ours, the Gospel has come again in contact with Judaism, and with Mohammedism, Hindooism, and almost every other form of false religion:† nevertheless, it stands, and not only so, but advances; and its progress, as the church of Christ believes, will be bounded only by the extent of our world. This view of it rests on its intimate connection with the Scriptures of the Old Testament, of which it is to be considered as in fact a necessary continuation, or completion. For 'the New Testament is founded on the Old; proceeds on the supposition of its divine origin, and professes to be the accomplishment of the plan laid down in its prophecies and typical institutions. "Moses truly said unto the fathers, A prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you of your brethren, like unto me; Him shall ye hear in all things whatsoever He shall say unto you. Yea, and all the prophets from Samuel, and those that follow after, as many as have spoken, have likewise foretold of these days."‡ And when Paul was arraigned before the Roman governor, he declared that he asserted 'none other things than Moses and the prophets did say should come.¶ Hence it is justly remarked by Dr. SCOTT: 'The history, contained in this part of Scripture, is an exact counterpart of the prophecies, promises, and types of the Old Testament, in respect of its grand Subject, the great Redeemer and his kingdom and salvation. An enlightened student of the Old Testament, before the coming of Christ, must have expected exactly such events, and such changes in the outward state of the church, as the New Testament records: and the sole reason, why the Jews in general, and the apostles in particular, for a time, did not expect such events and changes, is, "their understandings were not opened to understand the Scriptures." A careful and constant examination of the sacred volume, diligently comparing one part with another, renders this manifest; so that it is possible, and perhaps not difficult, to form a connected narrative of all the grand outlines of the history, contained in the New Testament, from the very words of the Old. The person of the Redeemer as Emmanuel, his descent in human nature from Judah, and from David when the family was reduced to poverty and obscurity; his miraculous conception, his birth at Bethlehem, his character miracles, and doctrine; the reception given him by his countrymen, the unparalleled contempt and enmity shown Him, the manner and all the circumstances of his death and burial, even to minute particulars; the end and design of his sufferings and death, his resurrection, ascension, the pouring out of the Holy Spirit the conversion of vast multitudes, the obstinate unbelief and opposition of the Jewish nation, the tremendous judgments of God on them for these crimes; the abrogation of the ceremonial law, the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, the calling of the Gentiles, the glorious triumphs of Christianity, and indeed the state of the church, through all intervening ages, till the consummation of all things, might be related in Evidences of Christianity. Preparatory considerations.

The mention of several systems of belief recalls the pithy representation, made by an able advocate of Christianity, of the grand apology of deists for declining to believe it: "Various theological systems equally and respectively claim to be a revelation from heaven. But it is impossible that every one of these systems can be a divine revelation. Therefore, no one of them is." This is the sum total of Mr. Volney's entire argument, in his celebrated work. Apply its principle, and see its validity: various bank-notes equally and respectively claim to be genuine. But it is proved that many of them are forgeries. Therefore, logically, all are forgeries.' See 'Difficulties of Infidelity,' by Rev. G. S. FAIRB.

the words of the prophets, only by substituting, in a few instances, the past for the future tense. To a degree so astonishing do the two divisions of the sacred Scriptures confirm and illustrate each other!*

TITLE.

From an early period, it appears that the name of 'New Testament,' though neither given by divine command, nor applied by the apostles, was adopted, to designate the collection of writings composed after the ascension of Christ, and acknowledged by his followers to be of divine authority and origin.† This title however, is justified by several passages in Scripture, (Matt. 26: 28. Gal. 3: 17. Heb. 8: 8. 9: 15—20.) and warranted particularly by the apostle Paul, 2 Cor. 3: 14. In these passages, the original word denotes a COVENANT, and had been, by the apocryphal writers, assigned to the Old Testament, or to the five books of Moses.‡ 'This translation must be adopted,' observes MICHAELIS, 'if respect be had to the texts of Scripture, from which the name is borrowed; and beside, a Being incapable of death, can neither have made an old, nor make a new testament.' But SCOTT judiciously remarks: 'the word signifies a stipulation between two or more contracting parties; sometimes, the absolute appointment of a person in matters entirely at his own disposal; more rarely, a last Will. It is called the New Testament in contra-distinction to the Old; not as if the one contained only the old covenant of works, and the other the new covenant of grace; but because the New Testament gives an account of the abrogation of the old dispensation, and of the introduction of one both new and better. The Mosaic law, the national covenant made with Israel, and the Levitical priesthood, formed as it were an edition both of the covenant of works and of the covenant of grace: but at the coming of Christ, the end being answered, this was antiquated and set aside; and the Christian dispensation, containing clearer light and greater encouragement, not attended with burdensome ceremonies, or clouded by types and shadows, or restricted to any place or nation, formed a new edition of the covenant of grace; yet so that unbelievers continue, as of old, under "the ministration of death," the covenant of works. This dispensation, therefore, is compendiously called "The New Covenant," or "The New Testament," with reference to the death of Christ the Mediator.'

DIVISION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

Although at different periods, and for different purposes, various divisions have been made of the books of the New Testament, yet they may very conveniently be arranged into Historical, Doctrinal, and Prophetic. This, however, is not so to be understood, as that one of the classes shall exclude the subjects of the other: for, like the books of the Old Testament, those of the New are of a mixed nature, and contain history, prophecy, and doctrine. The books that may be termed historical, are the writings of the four evangelists, narrating the life, conversations, miracles, death, resurrection, and ascension of our Lord JESUS CHRIST, together with the 'Acts' written by one of them: the Epistles comprise the doctrinal division, and the prophetic is the book of 'Revelation.'§ Thus 'the canon of the New Testament,' as Bp. TOMLINE remarks, consists of twenty-seven books, which were written by eight authors, all of whom were cotemporary with our Savior. These books were written at different times, and at places remote from each other; and when the latest of them was published, the Gospel had been preached, and churches founded, in many parts of Asia, Europe, and Africa. Different churches at first received different books, according to their situation and circumstances; their canons were gradually enlarged, and it was not long, though the precise time is not known, before the same, or very nearly the same books were acknowledged by Christians of all countries. Persecutions, and other causes, prevented, for several centuries, any general assembly for settling their canon; and we must therefore have recourse to ecclesiastical writers; among whom it is satisfactory to find an almost perfect agreement.'

INSPIRATION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

'It does not rest its claim, to be received as a divine revelation,' observes Dr. SCOTT, 'on the Old Testament merely, and the evidences by which that is confirmed. While Christ and his apostles appealed to the ancient Scriptures, and showed "that thus it was written, and thus it must be," they confirmed their instructions, and combated the prejudices of their hearers, by the most undeniable miracles, wrought in the open face of day, before multitudes of all characters, and challenging the investigation of the most powerful, sagacious, and inveterate of their enemies. The prophecies also of our Lord, and of his apostles, interspersed through the books of the several writers of the New Testament, and fulfilled through all succeeding ages, form a demonstration of its divine authority, gathering clearness and energy by revolving centuries. Other proofs, external and internal, might be mentioned; but these hints may show, that the New Testament stands on its own basis. Indeed, it is utterly inconceivable, that Christianity could have made its way in the world, by the obscure persons who propagated it, had it not been confirmed beyond the possibility of denial.'

inspiration is desired to be, such an influence of the Holy Spirit on the mental powers, as perfectly to qualify men for communicating the knowledge of the will of God. Not that every thing mentioned in the Scriptures needed such an influence, in order to make it known to the writers. Many things they knew, as others, from the possession, in common with them, of intellectual faculties, of memory and judgment; in these things it was only necessary they should be preserved infallibly from error. This implies a care exercised, in the providence of God, over all the sacred writers, in whatever degree inspired, to secure a faithful relation of the histories, doctrines, prophecies and precepts they were to communicate. Other things required that they should be endowed supernaturally with more than ordinary vigor of mind. Without miraculous assistance, the evangelists, for instance, simple and illiterate men, could not have so recalled, after a lapse of years, the discourses and miracles of Christ, that no unfair, inaccurate, or confused account should be transmitted. The promise, given them by their Lord, (John 14: 26.) of the Holy Ghost, to bring to their remembrance all things whatsoever Christ had said to them, proves that their mental powers received from his agency, new strength and capacity. In several passages of Scripture, there is such elevation of thought and style, such grandeur, and a sublimity of ideas and expressions, to which the acknowledged powers of the writers bore no proportion, as must have resulted from superior influence upon them. It is also manifest, that the subjects of many passages, which no natural means could discover, nor any elevation of the faculties reach, as thoughts and purposes of the divine mind, must have been distinctly revealed. This is the just and scriptural term.*

Now, 'the writers of the New Testament speak of themselves and of each other, as divinely inspired, (Rom. 10: 14—17. 16: 25, 26. 1 Cor. 1: 21. 2: 7, 10. 7: 40. Eph. 3: 3—5. 1 Thes. 2: 13. 2 Pet. 3: 15, 16. 1 John 4: 6.) Should any then think, that, provided these writers be regarded as wise and good men, it is not so absolutely necessary to vindicate their divine inspiration; let them consider, whether laying a groundless claim to divine inspiration, be not such an impeachment of any writer's probity and veracity, as to render him unworthy of credit in all other things?†

WRITINGS OF THE FOUR EVANGELISTS.

We ordinarily speak of these under the designation of 'the four gospels.' But there is hazard of leaving an impression on the uninformed or inattentive mind, that these are distinct systems of faith. Now, it pleased God simply to commission four individuals to write the life of Christ. The display in Him of the divine mercy to men in their redemption, is the grandest work of God. But, as there never was but one way of salvation for sinners, men fallen from happiness and the favor of God by transgression; so there can be but one Gospel. Salvation began to dawn in the days of Adam; it brightened through succeeding ages, in prophecy, types and ceremonies; but when the Messiah came, it shone in its perfect splendor. And though it was the same in the respective ages of the patriarchs, prophets, and apostles, yet Christians have high advantages over the ancient church. We live more than they, under the dispensation of the Holy Spirit, who 'takes of the things of Christ, and shews them unto us.' The work of the evangelists was, to give a faithful representation of Emmanuel, the Savior. Fully have they proved, that He has done all that was necessary to redeem the world, to work out a finished salvation, and to bring in an everlasting righteousness, 'that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have eternal life.' Yet each adopts his own plan and style, and records some things which the rest omit. They vary, it may be, with regard to circumstances, out all agree invariably as to facts.‡ They were competent witnesses of the facts themselves, and it is plain were neither enthusiasts nor fanatics; their whole manner and appearance, as they exhibit themselves, being, in the furthest degree, removed from such a character. They evidently relate with integrity and sincerity what they knew; had no earthly advantage to gain by imposing on men; appealed to miracles which were undeniable, and to other notorious proofs, and suffered every thing for the truth of their narration, even death itself.§

PROOFS OF AUTHENTICITY.

It has been well said, that 'the books which bear the names of the apostles and evangelists are known to be theirs in the same way that we know the works of Cæsar, Cicero, Virgil, Horace, Tacitus, to be theirs—an unanimous or generally concurring tradition.'|| Abundant proof is afforded from the primitive age of the church of Christ, that, although there were other works handed down among different communities of professing Christians, purporting to exhibit a narrative of the life of Christ, and a history of his people, yet 'there were no other gospels but those of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, admitted by the church. This we learn from Polycarp, a cotemporary of the apostles, and from Justin Martyr, Tatian, Irenæus, Tertullian, and Clement of Alexandria, all of whom lived in the second century.'¶ From Eusebius it appears that early 'Harmonies' were made of the four narratives, that of Tatian, by its very name of Diatessaron, distinguishing four, and no others. Indeed the external evidences of authenticity, which have been accumulated in the ancient Christian, Jewish, and heathen Testimonies of LARDNER; the internal, exhibited by the very style, by a comparison of the narratives with other parts of the Scriptures, by their holy character and tendency, and the concurrence of prophetic annunciations with the simple statements of fact, corroborated by unquestionable miracles—all establish the truth and genuineness of the historical records of the evangelists, with every studious, candid, and judicious inquirer. Let an inquirer of such character but consider the force with which the evidence of independent history, relating to the period impressed the mind of the learned MICHAELIS when he wrote, 'It is sufficient, in answer to the question, "Is the New Testament ancient and genuine?"' to reply, 'COMPARE IT WITH THE HISTORY OF THE TIMES, AND YOU CANNOT DOUBT OF ITS AUTHENTICITY.' '*

CONCLUDING REMARKS.

The design of this work was, not to supply the learned with critical disquisitions on the original text out to furnish the intelligent and practical Christian with the general results of such investigations, and thus to produce a popular, though not unlearned commentary—agreeably to the discrimination made by our distinguished countryman, Prof. STUART, to which I beg leave to refer.† The critical commentators, however, have been consulted; but, whatever writer has been quoted, the most condensed forms of expression and representation, consistent with perspicuity, and with justice to the authors, have been adopted. Indeed, it is to be acknowledged, that much acquaintance with biblical criticism, as it was in his day, is very perceptible in HENRY,‡ as it is on all hands granted to DODDRIDGE, and is generally, without the show of minute reference, found in SCOTT. With their valuable matter has been united what is additionally useful or necessary in the rich and learned, though often miscellaneous biblical labors of the late Dr. CLARKE, and the highly important collections of BLOOMFIELD, in his 'Recensio Synoptica.'

With respect to the present volume, my acknowledgments are due to several clerical gentlemen, at various times, and to a diversified extent connected with me in the labor of preparing it—through the liberality of the publishers, and their anxiety to meet the urgency of patrons for its early appearance—yet the gentlemen have not allowed me to mention their names. That of one, however, whose ill health prevented further aid, appears p. 596, in a valuable note on Luke 24: 36—48. That the LORD may prosper these, and all other labors for extending the knowledge, and the intelligent and practical use of his sacred Truth, in the establishment of the Redeemer's kingdom, is the wish and prayer of the Editor,

WM. JENKS.

* introd. to N. T.

† 'Commentaries on the Scriptures may be divided into two classes, of which the first may be called learned, being designed to promote the critical study of the Scriptures. The circle to which this species of commentary must be confined, is that of critical students, who design to obtain a knowledge of the original. This was not the plan of Doddridge. He states his main design to be that of "promoting family religion, and to render the reading of the New Testament pleasant, and profitable to those who had not the benefit of a learned education." Of course it is the second sort of commentary, i. e. the popular, at which the author aims. To judge of his performance, then, by the rules we would apply to the commentaries of Rosenmüller, Gesenius, Hengstenberg, and others of the same cast, would be to judge of it by unfair analogy, and est inæqually.' Remarks on Doddridge's Fam. Exp.

I If any reader of this work desires to become better acquainted with Mr. Henry, let him consult his Life, written (as also that of his father, the memorable Philip Henry, and sister, Mrs. Savage) by my respected correspondent and friend, J. B. WILLIAMS, of Shrewsbury, Eng. Esq. LL. D. and F. A. S. I fully agree with Prof. STUART, that the quaintness, &c., observable in Henry is not a desirable model for our theological students; but the Professor will unquestionably agree with me, that it is desirable every student of Divinity should possess what our venerated Dr. ALEXANDER so aptly calls Henry's 'ubiquity' in the Scriptures—in every part of which he seems continually at home, and fresh. The quaintnesses, which belonged to his age, have, for the most part, been eliminated from the present text.

Note. If, in the references, any deficiency be found, the reader is requested to consult the Exposition.

GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST. MATTHEW,

WITH AN EXPOSITION AND PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

OF Matthew, surnamed Levi, the author of this Gospel, little is known, except what he has recorded of himself (1: 3. Notes, 9: 9—13.) It appears he was a Jew by birth, and by calling a publican, till Christ commanded his attendance; when he left the receipt of custom to follow the Savior, and was of those who accompanied Him all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out, beginning from the baptism of John unto that same day that he was taken up. Acts 1: 21, 22. This made him a competent witness.

Some of the early Fathers have asserted that this Gospel was written in Hebrew, or Syriac; [meaning, as is supposed, the Syro-Chaldaic dialect of Palestine,* prevailing after the Jewish captivity;] and within eight years from the ascension of Christ. But it is not pretended that we are in possession of such a copy. Nor are the learned ready to admit that we have but a translation in Greek. Dr. Whitby, to whom both Henry and Scott refer with approbation, and who is followed by Dr. Hales, has labored to disprove the early tradition, and establish a Greek original only. But, on the other hand, Dr. Campbell vindicates at large, and with much show of argument, this opinion of the primitive Church,† which, nevertheless, has manifestly authorized our present Greek.

It is, however, generally granted, that this portion of the New Testament was the first committed to writing. Its priority in order is of very early date. But great diversity of opinion has prevailed respecting the time of its composition. Some assign it to the year 37 or 38† of the Christian era, others to between 61 and 65||; and there are those who apply the former date to the Hebrew copy, and the latter to the Greek: for, to reconcile the different opinions, the hypothesis is maintained,§ that this Gospel was written by its author in both languages.

Matthew is supposed to be distinguished from the other Evangelists by the frequency of his references to the Old Testament, having written his Gospel, as is presumed, for Jewish Christians. He also records more of our Lord's parables, than they; and seems, on the whole, as is thought, more observant of the order of events. He begins with the genealogy of Christ in the line of Joseph, husband of Mary, his mother; relating circumstances concerning his miraculous conception, birth and infancy. He gives a brief account of the ministry of John the Baptist, and records the temptation of Christ, and entrance on his own public ministry. He then proceeds with a narrative of his miracles and discourses, and the manner of his crucifixion, death and burial; and, having borne witness to his glorious resurrection, and appearance to his disciples, closes the history with some most important words spoken by the Lord Jesus, immediately, as is supposed, before his ascension into heaven. V. 1—17.—Of this genealogy of our Savior, observe,

I. The title. It is the book (or account, as the corresponding Hebrew word sometimes signifies) of the generation, or ancestry, of Jesus Christ: or, the narrative of his birth,† a book of Genesis. The Old Testament begins with the book of the generation of the world; and this is its glory: but the glory of the New excels in this, that it begins with the book of the generation of Him that made the world. As God, his outgoings were of old, from everlasting, (Mic. 5. 2.) and none can declare his generation; but, as Man, He was sent forth in the fulness of time, of a woman, as is here declared.

II. Its principal intention. This genealogy is neither endless nor needless; nor is it vain-glorious, as are commonly those of great men. Of what avail are ancient pedigrees? Its design is, to prove that our Lord Jesus is the Son of David, and the Son of Abraham; hence of that nation and family out of which the Messiah was to arise. (2) Of this promise Abraham and David were, in their day, the great trustees. The promise of the blessing was to Abraham and his seed; of the dominion, to David and his seed; and they who would have an interest in Christ, as the Son of Abraham, in whom all the families of the earth are to be blessed, must be subject to him as the Son of David, by whom all the families of the earth are to be ruled. See Gen. 12: 3. and 22: 18. for the first promise; and 2 Sam. 7: 12. Ps. 89: 3, &c. 132: 11. for the second. Therefore, unless it can be proved that Jesus is a son of David and a son of Abraham, we cannot admit Him to be the Messiah. Now this is here proved from authentic records, as if o' heralds. The Jews were very exact in preserving pedigrees. (3) In this there was a providence, to clear up the descent of the Messiah from the fathers; and, since his coming, the nation is so dispersed and confounded, that it is doubted if any one can legally prove himself a son of Abraham: it is certain, however, that no one can prove himself a son of Aaron, or a son of David. Hence the priestly and kingly office must be given up, as lost forever, or belong to our Lord Jesus. Christ is here first called the Son of David, as expected, and commonly spoken of, under that title, among the Jews. They who owned Him as the Christ, called Him the Son of David; ch. 15: 22. 20: 31. 21: 16. The Evangelist, therefore, undertakes to show, that He is not only a son of David

NOTES.—Verse 1.

(1) The title, 'book of the generation,' is, by most commentators, applied only to the genealogy, yet the opinion is not universal; for some, as Calnet, Hammond, L'Enfant and Beausobre, and Dr. A. Clarke, consider it applicable also to the whole book, including the history of our Lord's birth, acts, sufferings, death, resurrection and ascension. Eo.
(2) The inspired writer, having mentioned the promised Savior, (long foretold as the son of Abraham and of David,) by his name Jesus, and his office as the CHRIST, Messiah, Anointed of God, introduces the genealogy, by which the claim would in part be authenticated. (Marg. Ref.) The whole of the New Testament, however, shews, that this was not considered as the only or main proof. For the genealogies a o not once referred to in the argument; but the appeal is made to the ancient prophecies, his own miracles, and his resurrection from the dead. (Acts 13: 23, 31—37. Rom. 1: 3, 4. 2 Tim. 2: 8.) SCOTT.

(3) From the Acts of the Apostles it appears, that they, in exhibiting the history of Christ, generally pursued the method of commencing with the confirmation of his resurrection, of which they were the faithful and credible witnesses. ROBERTSON.

(3) That even to the time of Christ, they [the Jews] had genealogical tables [both of their families and tribes, is evident from Josephus, who, having given us the genealogy of his family, says, "I give you this succession of our family as I found it written in the public tables." WILKINSON.]

a different hypothesis is followed, in making Salathiel son-in-law of Nerī, which was adopted by BARRETT, though contrary to that of GROTJUS. ERB. The marginal references contain nearly all the information to be obtained on the subject of this genealogy. It is conceded, that it does not prove Jesus to be 'the son of David,' but merely that Joseph, husband of Mary, and father-in-law of Jesus, was descended from David. But Jewish custom required the genealogy of Joseph to be produced: and it leaves the proof, arising from Mary's descent from David, as stated by St. Luke, in full force; and that is perfectly conclusive. For, if 'Jacob, the son of Matthan, the son of Eleazar, begat Joseph' (v. 15, 16) Joseph could not be 'the son of Heli, the son of Matthan, the son of Levi,' (Luke 3: 23, 24,) by marrying Heli's daughter, and by legal adoption.

(7) As there have been found difficulties almost insuperable in attempting to make out the even number of lunar generations of each of these periods, the English editor of Calver's (Fragment, no. 330) ingeniously suggested a method, by considering generations as denoting a period of time, or mean of calculation, by the general (not individual) course of human life. In pursuing this thought, he has made it appear probable, that, allowing for the gradual diminution of human longevity, each of these divisions may have occupied the number of lunar periods of time, equivalent, each of them, to the ordinary convenience of a generation of mankind at the periods, respectively. ROSENMÜLLER effects the object by reckoning David and Josiah twice, each at the end of one series and at the beginning of the next; but see (NOTE 6) Dr. A. CLARKE; who also remarks, or, the 17th verse, from SCHOETGEN, that the Jews had a 'technical method of summing up generations in this way; as in one of their books: "From the time when the moon first appeared, and the first man was created, the moon was at full. From Solomon to Zedekiah were after fifteen generations;" "rations;" the moon was then in the wane, and Zedekiah's eyes were "put out." That is, the regal state came to its zenith or light and glory in the time of Solomon, but decreased gradually till it became "nearly extinct in the days of Zedekiah."

give the perplexity of the blessed virgin. She herself knew the divine original of this conception; but how prove it? She would be dealt with as with a harlot. Note, After much advancement, lest we be puffed up, we must expect something to humble us; some reproach, as a thorn in the flesh, nay, as a sword in the bones. No daughter of Eve was ever so dignified, as was the virgin Mary, and yet in danger of incurring the imputation of one of the worst of crimes; still, conscious of her innocence, she committed her cause to him that judgeth righteously. Note, Those who keep a good conscience, may cheerfully trust God with the keeping of their good names; and have reason to hope that He will clear up, not only their integrity, but their honor, as the sun at noon.

III. Joseph's perplexity, what to do. Great, doubtless, was his trouble and disappointment, on finding one he so valued come under suspicion of a crime so heinous. 'Is this Mary?' he began to think; 'how may we be deceived in those we esteem best! how disappointed, where we expect most!' A thing so ill he is loth to believe of one whom he thought so good; still, the matter, too bad to be excused, is too plain to be denied. What a struggle, between that jealousy which is the rage of man, and is cruel as the grave, on one hand, and the affection he has for Mary, on the other.

V. 18-25. The mystery of Christ's incarnation is to be adored, not pried into. If we know not the way of the Spirit in the formation of common persons, (Eccles. 11:5.) much less do we know how the blessed Jesus was formed. When David admires how he himself was made in secret, and curiously wrought, (Ps. 139:13-16.) perhaps he speaks, in spirit, of Christ's incarnation. We have some circumstances here attending the birth of Christ, not recorded by Luke, though he writes of it more largely, as:

I. Mary's espousals to Joseph. The mother of our Lord was espoused, or contracted, not completely married to Joseph: a purpose of marriage was solemnly declared, and a promise of it made, if God permit. (8) We read of a man who has betrothed a wife, and has not taken her, Deut. 20:7. Christ was born of a virgin, but a contracted virgin, 1. To put respect on the married state, as honorable among all, against that doctrine of devils which forbids to marry, and places perfection in the single state. 2. To save the credit of the blessed virgin, her conception being protected by a marriage, and so justified in the eyes of the world. An ancient says, It was better it should be asked, Is not this the son of a carpenter? than, Is not this the son of a harlot? 3. That the blessed virgin might have a guide of her youth, a companion of her solitude and travels, a partner in her cares, and a help meet for her. Some think that Joseph was now a widower, and that those who are called brethren of Christ, (ch. 13:55.) were Joseph's children by a former wife. So thought many of the ancients. Joseph was a just man, she a virtuous woman. Believers should not be unequally yoked with unbelievers; but let those who are religious choose to marry with those who are so, as they expect the comfort of the relation, and God's blessing in it. It is good also to enter into the married state with deliberation, not hastily; to preface the nuptials with a contract. Better take time to consider before, than find time to repent after.

II. Her pregnancy of the Promised Seed; before they came together, she was found with child, which really was of the Holy Ghost. Probably, it was after her return from her cousin Elisabeth, with whom she continued three months, (Luke 1:56.) that she was perceived by Joseph to be in this state, and did not herself deny it. Note, Those in whom Christ is formed will shew it: it will be found to be a work of God, which He will own. We may well imagine the perplexity of the blessed virgin. She herself knew the divine original of this conception; but how prove it? She would be dealt with as with a harlot. Note, After much advancement, lest we be puffed up, we must expect something to humble us; some reproach, as a thorn in the flesh, nay, as a sword in the bones. No daughter of Eve was ever so dignified, as was the virgin Mary, and yet in danger of incurring the imputation of one of the worst of crimes; still, conscious of her innocence, she committed her cause to him that judgeth righteously. Note, Those who keep a good conscience, may cheerfully trust God with the keeping of their good names; and have reason to hope that He will clear up, not only their integrity, but their honor, as the sun at noon.

Verses 18, 19.

(8) St. Luke relates a variety of circumstances here omitted; but this succinct narrative was deemed sufficient to introduce that history of Christ, which was first given to the church. His mother Mary, a virgin of the house of David, contracted or betrothed to Joseph, had, before the completion of the intended marriage, by a most extraordinary miracle, continuing yet a virgin, conceived by the power of the Holy Spirit; that the promised Saviour might be 'the Seed of the woman' (the strictest sense; and though truly man, our Brother and Redeemer, yet he not be conceived and born in sin. Scott. (Notes. Gen. 3:14, 15. 15:7. 14. Jer. 31:21, 22.) 'No woman of Israel,' says Lightfoot, 'was married, unless she had been first espoused.' This espousal was at her own or her father's house; and generally some time elapsed before she was taken home to that of her husband. Deut. 20:7. Judg. 14:7, 8. Between the time of her espousal and the marriage, there frequently passed a considerable time; nor could this contract, says Selden, be broken, but by a real divorce. If, during the time of it, the bride should trespass against her fidelity she owed to her bridegroom, she was treated as an adulteress.

GALMET, CLARE

Observe, 1. The extremity he would avoid. He was not willing to make her a public example. By the law, a betrothed virgin, who played the harlot, was to be stoned to death. Deut. 22:23, 24. But he was not willing, though able, to take advantage of the law against her, if she be guilty, it is not known, nor shall it be from him. How different was his spirit from that of Judah, who, in a similar case, hastily decreed, Bring her forth, and let her be burnt! Gen. 38:24. How good is it to think on this, as Joseph did here! Had our censures and judgments more of deliberation, there would be more of mercy and moderation in them. Bringing her to punishment, is here called making her a public example: which shews the end to be aimed at in punishments—warning to others; that all may hear and fear. Smile the scorner, and the simple will beware. Some of rigorous temper would blame Joseph for his clemency, but it is here spoken of to his praise. He was a just man, a religious, good man; and therefore inclined to be merciful, as God is, and to forgive as one forgiven. (9) The law charitably supposed that a betrothed damsel, if defiled in the field, cried out, (Deut. 22:26, 27.) and she was not to be punished. Some charitable construction or other Joseph is disposed to make, and herein is just, tender of another's unblemished good name. Note, It becomes us, in many cases, to be gentle toward such as are suspected of having offended, and make the best of what at first appears bad, in hope it may prove better. The rigor of law is (sometimes) the height of injustice. That court of conscience which moderates the rigor of law we call a court of equity. Perhaps the faulty were overtaken in the fault, and are therefore to be restored in the spirit of meekness.

2. His expedient. He was minded to put her away privily, that is, to give a bill of divorce into her hand before two witnesses, and so stifle the matter. Being a just man, a strict observer of the law, he would not marry, but resolved to put her away; yet, in tenderness for her, as privately as possible. Note, Necessary censures should be managed without noise. The words of the wise are heard in quiet. Christ himself shall not strive nor cry. Christian love and prudence hide a multitude of sins, even great ones, so far as may be done without having fellowship with them.

IV. Joseph's release from perplexity by an express from heaven; (v. 20, 21.) While he thought on these things, and knew not what to determine, God graciously directed him. Note, Those who would have direction from God, must think on things, and consult with themselves. God will guide the thoughtful, not the unthinking. When he had gone as far as he could, in his own thoughts, God came in with advice. Note, God's time to instruct his people is, when they are oppressed, and at a stand. His comforts most delight the soul, in the multitude of its perplexed thoughts.

The message was sent to Joseph by an angel of the Lord; probably the same that brought tidings to Mary—even Gabriel. Intercourse with heaven by angels, with which the patriarchs had been dignified, begins now, after long disuse, to be revived; for when the First-Begotten is to be brought into the world, the angels are ordered to attend his motions. How far God

(9) It is without reason that the word rendered just, as applied to Joseph, is by some rendered merciful, or good-natured. If we consider the information he might have received from persons of such an extraordinary character as Zacharias and Elisabeth, (who would certainly think themselves obliged to interpose on such an occasion, and whose story so remarkably carried its own evidence with it.) besides the intimation the prophecy of Isaiah gave, and the satisfaction he undoubtedly had in the virtuous character of Mary herself, we must conclude that he had acted a very severe and unrighteous part, had he proceeded to extremities without serious deliberation, and that putting her away privately would, in these circumstances, have been the least measure justice would suffer him to take. — By the original word we may suppose is expressed the infamy of a public divorce, though she had not been stoned, which was the legal punishment. But there was besides a private kind of divorce, in which no reason was required, and the dowry was not forfeited, as in the former case; and by this she would not have been so defamed. See Selden, Is Heb. 14. c. xvi. 11. Lightfoot, Hor. Heb.

thou shalt call his name JESUS: for he shall save his people from their sins.

22 Now all this was done, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet, saying,

23 Behold, a virgin shall be with child, and shall bring forth a son, and they shall call his name Emmanuel, which, being interpreted, is, God with us.

24 Then Joseph being raised from sleep, did as the angel of the Lord had bidden him, and took unto him his wife;

25 And knew her not till she had brought forth her first-born son: and he called his name JESUS.

1 Luke 1:31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 341, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 447, 448, 449, 450, 451, 452, 453, 454, 455, 456, 457, 458, 459, 460, 461, 462, 463, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 471, 472, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, 500, 501, 502, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, 511, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537, 538, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 544, 545, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 555, 556, 557, 558, 559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564, 565, 566, 567, 568, 569, 570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575, 576, 577, 578, 579, 580, 581, 582, 583, 584, 585, 586, 587, 588, 589, 590, 591, 592, 593, 594, 595, 596, 597, 598, 599, 600, 601, 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 608, 609, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, 618, 619, 620, 621, 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 627, 628, 629, 630, 631, 632, 633, 634, 635, 636, 637, 638, 639, 640, 641, 642, 643, 644, 645, 646, 647, 648, 649, 650, 651, 652, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657, 658, 659, 660, 661, 662, 663, 664, 665, 666, 667, 668, 669, 670, 671, 672, 673, 674, 675, 676, 677, 678, 679, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 685, 686, 687, 688, 689, 690, 691, 692, 693, 694, 695, 696, 697, 698, 699, 700, 701, 702, 703, 704, 705, 706, 707, 708, 709, 710, 711, 712, 713, 714, 715, 716, 717, 718, 719, 720, 721, 722, 723, 724, 725, 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, 731, 732, 733, 734, 735, 736, 737, 738, 739, 740, 741, 742, 743, 744, 745, 746, 747, 748, 749, 750, 751, 752, 753, 754, 755, 756, 757, 758, 759, 760, 761, 762, 763, 764, 765, 766, 767, 768, 769, 770, 771, 772, 773, 774, 775, 776, 777, 778, 779, 780, 781, 782, 783, 784, 785, 786, 787, 788, 789, 790, 791, 792, 793, 794, 795, 796, 797, 798, 799, 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, 805, 806, 807, 808, 809, 810, 811, 812, 813, 814, 815, 816, 817, 818, 819, 820, 821, 822, 823, 824, 825, 826, 827, 828, 829, 830, 831, 832, 833, 834, 835, 836, 837, 838, 839, 840, 841, 842, 843, 844, 845, 846, 847, 848, 849, 850, 851, 852, 853, 854, 855, 856, 857, 858, 859, 860, 861, 862, 863, 864, 865, 866, 867, 868, 869, 870, 871, 872, 873, 874, 875, 876, 877, 878, 879, 880, 881, 882, 883, 884, 885, 886, 887, 888, 889, 890, 891, 892, 893, 894, 895, 896, 897, 898, 899, 900, 901, 902, 903, 904, 905, 906, 907, 908, 909, 910, 911, 912, 913, 914, 915, 916, 917, 918, 919, 920, 921, 922, 923, 924, 925, 926, 927, 928, 929, 930, 931, 932, 933, 934, 935, 936, 937, 938, 939, 940, 941, 942, 943, 944, 945, 946, 947, 948, 949, 950, 951, 952, 953, 954, 955, 956, 957, 958, 959, 960, 961, 962, 963, 964, 965, 966, 967, 968, 969, 970, 971, 972, 973, 974, 975, 976, 977, 978, 979, 980, 981, 982, 983, 984, 985, 986, 987, 988, 989, 990, 991, 992, 993, 994, 995, 996, 997, 998, 999, 1000.

Fruit of her womb, Luke 1: 42. His conception must be otherwise than by ordinary generation, that so, though partaking of the human nature, He might escape the corruption and pollution of it, and not be conceived and shapen in iniquity. Some, as the mother of Alexander, have vainly pretended to conceive by a divine power; none ever really did, except the mother of our Lord. His name in this, as in other things, is Wonderful. We do not read that the virgin Mary did herself proclaim the honor done her; she hid it in her heart; therefore God sent an angel to attest it. Those who seek not their own glory have honor from God; this is reserved for the humble.

Joseph is told, secondly, that Mary should bring forth the Savior of the world; (v. 21.) She shall bring forth a Son. What he shall be is intimated, [1.] In the name to be given him; Thou shalt call his name Jesus, a Savior. This is the same with Joshua, changing only the termination, to conform it to the Greek. Joshua is called Jesus, (Acts 7: 45. Heb. 4: 8.) from the Seventy. There were two of that name under the Old Testament, both illustrious types of [11] This seems to be the evangelist's observation on these extraordinary events: yet it is probable, the angel shewed Joseph, that this child was He, to whom all the prophets bore witness. The prophecy has already been explained. (Note, Luke 1: 14.) This prophecy was strictly fulfilled, when the virgin Mary's Son was called Jesus; for Jehovah-Salvation and Immanuel. God with us, are expressions of similar signification. If God be with us sinners in Jesus Christ, he is 'become our Salvation.'—But the Savior has been known to vast multitudes, through successive generations, and been peculiarly dear to them by his name EMMANUEL: and will be so to the end of time, yea, to all eternity.—They shall call—(23) 'Thou shalt call'—Sept. 7: 14, which accords to the Hebrew. Some copies read it so here. (See Griesbach.) SCOTT.

There are more references in this than in any other Gospel to Jewish customs; and St. Matthew seems studiously to have selected such circumstances as were calculated to conciliate or strengthen the faith of the Jews. That he published his Gospel in Palestine for the immediate use of the Jews, was the opinion of all ancient ecclesiastical writers, confirmed by the contents of the book itself: for he omits no opportunity of explaining the Scriptures, and of pointing out the fulfilment of prophecy, which was known to have greater weight with the Jews than any other species of evidence. TOMLINE. Matthew is also, observes BENGEL, the only evangelist who has made special mention of dreams or visions: as that of the wife of Pilate, of the magi, or wise men, and those of Joseph, here and in ch. 2. This course, as he remarks, well became the primitive periods of the Gospel. Ed. On the application of the prophecy cited from Isaiah, and its fulfilment in Jesus Christ, for misapplying which, the excellent DOMINICUS has admonished on GORIUS, [see his note,] it has been well observed: 'That a virgin shall bear a son, is the very spirit and meaning of the original text, independently of the illustration given by the prophet: and the fact recorded by the evangelist is the proof of the whole. But now could that be a sign to Ahaz, which was to take place so many hundreds of years after? I answer, the meaning of the prophet is plain, not only Rezin and Pekah should be unsuccessful against Jerusalem at that time, which was the fact; but Jerusalem, Judah, and the house of David, should be preserved, notwithstanding their depressed state, and the multitudes of their adversaries, till the time should come, when a virgin should bear a son.' Until then, the house of David could not fail, nor did it: but when that unprecedented and miraculous fact did take place, the kingdom and house of David became extinct! This is an irrefragable confutation of every argument a Jew can offer in vindication of his opposition to the Gospel of Christ.—The prophecy could not fail.

Christ; Joshua, Captain of Israel at their first settlement in Canaan, and Joshua, their High-Priest at their second settlement after the captivity, Zech. 6: 11, 12. Christ is our Joshua; but 'Captain of our salvation, and High-Priest of our profession, and, in both, our Savior;—a Joshua instead of Moses, doing that for us, which the law could not do, in that it was weak. Joshua had been called Hoshea, but Moses prefixed the first syllable of the name Jehovah, making it Jehoshua, (Num. 13: 16,) to intimate that the Messiah, who was to bear that name, should be Jehovah. He is therefore able to save to the uttermost, neither is there salvation in any other. [2.] In the reason of that name; For He shall save his people from their sins; not the nation of the Jews only, (for his own received Him not,) but all who were given Him by the Father's choice, and all who have given themselves to Him by their own. He is a King who protects his subjects, and, as Israel's Judges of old, works salvation for them. Note, Those whom Christ saves, He saves from the guilt of sin by the merit of his death, and from the dominion of sin by the Spirit of his grace. Saving them from their sins, He saves them from wrath, and the curse, and all misery here and hereafter. (Marg. Ref. h.) Christ came to save his people, not in their sins, but from their sins; to purchase for them not a liberty to sin, but a freedom from sins, to redeem them from all iniquity; (Tit. 2: 14.) and so, to redeem them from among men, (Rev. 14: 4.) to Himself, who is separate from sinners. Those, therefore, who leave their sins, and give up themselves to Christ as his people, are interested in the Savior, and the great salvation He has wrought out, Rom. 11: 26. (10)

V. The fulfilling of Scripture. Matthew, writing among Jews, more frequently observes this, than any other of the evangelists. In our Lord Jesus, Old-Testament prophecies were accomplished, shewing that this was He that should come, to whom all the prophets bear witness, and we are to look for no other. Now, in the birth of Christ was fulfilled that promise of a sign given to Ahaz, (Isa. 7: 14.) Behold, a virgin shall conceive; when the prophet, encouraging the hope of deliverance from Sennacherib's invasion, directs the people of God to look to the Messiah, who should come of the Jews, and of the house of David: whence it was easy to infer, that, though afflicted, neither of them could be abandoned to ruin, while God reserved for them such an honor and blessing. (See note 11.) Deliverances wrought of God for the Old-Testament church were types and figures of Christ's great salvation; and if God will do the greater, He will not fail to do the less.

This prophecy is justly ushered in with Behold, commanding both attention and admiration; for here is the mystery of godliness, which is, without controversy, great, that God was manifested in the flesh.

1. The sign, that the Messiah shall be born of a virgin. A virgin shall conceive, and, by her, He shall be manifested in the flesh. A virgin is signified by o-mah, in the strictest sense, as Mary professes to be, Luke 1: 34. I know not a man; nor had the sign been wonderful, if it had

Who ^a came from the east, guided by a star to see Jerusalem, inquiring for a King, who was born King of the Jews. 1. 2. Jerol. being alarmed, because that Christ should be born at Bethlehem, a. sends the wise men thither, 3-8. The star guides them to Jesus, when they honor and worship, and, being warned by God, they return before another way, 9-12. Joseph is directed to go, with the child and his mother, into Egypt, 13-15. Herod murders the children at and near Bethlehem, 16-18. After Herod's death, Joseph returns from Egypt, with Jesus and Mary, and goes to dwell at Nazareth, 19-23.

NOW when ^a Jesus was born in ^b Bethlehem of Judea, in the days ^c of Herod the king, behold, there came Thus, a step is taken toward peace and correspondence between God and man, the two natures uniting in the person of the Mediator—an unexceptionable Reference, a Days-man, fit to lay his hand upon them both, as partaking the nature of both. Behold, in this, the deepest mystery, and the richest mercy, that ever was. By the light of nature, we see God as a God above us; by the light of the law, as a God against us; but by the light of the gospel, as Immanuel, God with us, in our own nature, and (which is more) in our interest. Herein the Redeemer commended his love. With Christ's name, Immanuel, we may compare the name given to the gospel church, (Ezek. 48:35.) Jehovah Shamamah—the Lord is there; the Lord of hosts is with us.

Nor is it improper to say, that, when He was called Jesus, the prophecy that styled Him Immanuel was fulfilled; for if He had not been God with us, He could not have been a Savior. In the bringing of God and man together, consists his salvation; and this He designed, to bring God to be with us, which is our great happiness, and to bring us to be with God, which is our great duty.

VI. Joseph's obedience. Being raised from sleep, by the impression of his dream, he did as the angel of the Lord had bidden him, though it was contrary to his previous sentiments and intentions. He took unto him his wife without delay, and without dispute. Extraordinary direction like this we are not now to expect; but God still has ways of making known his mind in doubtful cases, by hints of providence, debates of conscience, and advice of faithful friends. By each of these, applying the general rules of the written word, we also should, in all, specially the most important steps and turns of our life, like this of Joseph, take direction from God; and we shall find it safe and comfortable to do as He bids us.

VII. The accomplishment of the divine promise; (v. 25.) She brought forth her first-born son. The circumstances are related more at large, Luke 2:1, &c. Note, What is conceived of the Holy Ghost is never abortive. What is of the will of the flesh, and of the will of man, often fails. But if Christ be formed in the soul, God himself has begun the good work which He will finish; and what is conceived in grace, will, no doubt, be brought forth in glory.

Further, Joseph, though he solemnized the marriage with Mary, his espoused wife, yet knew her not till the birth of her son, that holy thing. Much has been said concerning the perpetual virginity of the mother of our Lord; and been otherwise. In calling the Messiah the seed of the woman, it had ever been intimated He should be born of a virgin, so as not to be the seed of any man. Nor was Christ to be born, only as supernaturally, but because his birth was to be spotless, pure, and without stain of sin. Christ would be born not of an empress, or queen, in outward pomp or splendor, but of a virgin; to teach us spiritual purity, and deadness to delights of sense—so to keep ourselves unspotted from the world, as to be chaste virgins of Christ.

2. The truth proved by this sign, that He is the Son of God, and Mediator between God and man. They shall call his name Immanuel, that is, He shall be Immanuel; so, He shall be called, that is, shall be, the Lord, our Righteousness. Immanuel signifies God with us; a mysterious name, but very precious; God incarnate among us, so reconcilable to us, at peace with us, and taking us into covenant and communion with Himself. The Jewish people had God with them, in types and shadows, dwelling between the cherubim; but never so as when the Word was made flesh—a blessed Shechinah.

Jerome was very angry with Helvidius for denying it. Certainly, it cannot be proved from Scripture. (12) Dr. Whitty inclines to think, that, from the phraseology used, it is intimated, that, after the birth of her first-born, the reason ceasing, Joseph lived with her, according to the law Exod. 21:10. Observe, Christ was the First-Born; and so He might be called, though his mother had not any other children after him, according to Scripture language. Nor was it without a mystery that He is so called; for He is the First-Born of every creature, that is, the Heir of all things; and He is the First-Born among many brethren, that in all things He may have the pre-eminence. Joseph, also, called his name Jesus, as directed. God having appointed Him to be the Savior, which was intimated in giving Him the name Jesus, we must accept of Him to be our Savior, and, in concurrence with that appointment, call Him Jesus, our Savior. [Pract. Obs.]

CHAP. II. V. 1-8. It was a mark of humiliation put upon the Lord Jesus, that, though He was the desire of all nations, yet his coming into the world was little observed, and his birth obscure; herein He made Himself of no reputation. If the Son of God must be brought into the world, one might justly expect that He should be received with all the ceremony possible; that crowns and sceptres should have been immediately laid at his feet; and that the mighty princes of the world should have been his humble servants. Such a Messiah the Jews expected, but we see nothing of all this. He came into the world, and the world knew Him not; nay He came unto his own, and his own received Him not; for, having undertaken to make satisfaction to his Father for the wrong done Him in his honor by the sin of man. He did it by despoiling Himself of the honors undoubtedly due to an incarnate Deity; yet, as afterwards, so in his birth, some rays of glory darted forth amidst his greatest debasement. Though there was the hiding of his power, yet He had beams coming out of his hand. (Hah. 3:4.) enough to condemn the world, and the Jews especially, for their stupidity.

The first, who took notice of Christ after his birth, were the Shepherds, (Luke 2:15.) who saw and heard glorious things concerning Him, and published them to the amazement of all that heard, v. 17, 18. After that, Simeon and Anna spake of Him by the Spirit, to all who were disposed to heed what they said, Luke 2:38. Now, one would think, these hints should have been taken by the men of Judah, and Jerusalem, and they should, with both arms, have embraced the long looked for Messiah; but, for aught that appears, He continued nearly two years after at

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 18-23. Let us often recollect how the Son of God entered this lower world, and learn to despise the distinctions of rank, birth, and affluence, in comparison with the real dignity which piety and holiness confer. A poor, obscure virgin, espoused to a carpenter, was chosen to be the honored mother of Him, 'by whom kings reign,' and before whom they are to appear in judgment! Doubtless He could have assumed our nature in an imperial palace, as well as in a cottage, or rather stable. But his dignity and honor, like his 'kingdom,' were not 'of this world.' Indeed, 'the honor that cometh from God' is seldom unattended with trials. She, whom God pronounced 'highly favored,' and 'blessed among women,' was exposed to suspicions of criminality, and indeed to infamy, and most terrible punishment. Let us not expect to escape calumny and suspicion, even when most conscientious, or from those we most love. Keeping a clear conscience, let us leave to God the protection of our characters; nor, if appearances be against us, fail to keep on in the path of duty, not over anxious to vindicate ourselves, but waiting till He shall justify us from undeserved reproaches. In due season, He will appear for us; yet if, in the mean time, we have severe mortifications, these are necessary, as 'thorns in the flesh,' to keep down our pride, which else might tarnish all our endowments and services.—In dubious cases, a pious man should deliberate; and he who desires to know, that he may do, the will of God, and uses proper means of instruction, shall not be left to fall into any fatal error.—Whilst we make observations on the incarnation, in such an extraordinary manner, of the Son of God, let us not overlook its object. Men may pervert, abuse, or dislike the sacred truths of God's Word; but surely none can be encouraged to continue in sin, by a free and gracious salvation from sin. None can have evidence that they are the people of Christ, who are not now saved from the dominion of their sins, and are not seeking continually for deliverance from the remaining power and pollution of them. Every time that we name the sacred name of Jesus, we should be reminded to rely on Him for this complete salvation; that we may be delivered from guilt, and from sin, experience daily the fulfilling of the Scriptures, and be saved in EMMANUEL, 'the Lord our righteousness,' 'with an everlasting salvation.'

the kingdom and house of David have failed—the virgin, therefore, must have borne forth her son—and this son is Jesus the Christ. Thus Moses, Isaiah and Matthew concur; and facts the most unperishable have confirmed the whole. Behold the wisdom and providence of God!

(12) This heavenly vision fully satisfying the mind of Joseph, he rendered implicit obedience, and delayed not to take Mary home to him as his wife.—As to the terms on which, after the birth of her Son,

Joseph and Mary lived together, or whether she had more children, as some have said, did not seem good to the Holy Ghost to gratify men's foolish curiosity. They who have contended for, and those who have denied, Mary's perpetual virginity, have alike indulged in uncertain and useless conjectures. It is true, that some of the zealous champions for the affirmative intended the support of their antichristian worship of the virgin Mary, and antichristian admiration of virginity and celibacy; but we want no additional proof that God alone ought to be worshipped, and that marriage is honorable in all, and the bed undefiled. men of what would follow, when those who were afar off should be made nigh by Christ. They were scholars; they dealt in curious arts; good scholars should be good Christians, and then they complete their learning when they learn Christ. They were men of the east, who were noted for their sooth-saying. Isa. 2: 6. Arabia is called the land of the east, (Gen. 25: 6.) and the Arabians are called men of the east, Judg. 6: 3. The presents they brought are the products of their own land; the Arabians had done homage to David and Solomon as types of Christ. Jethro and Job were of that country. (2)

3. As they were in their country in the east, they saw an extraordinary star, such as they had not seen before, which they took to be an indication of an extraordinary person born in Judea, over which land this star was seen to hover, in the nature of a comet, or meteor rather, in the lower regions of the air. Note, Extraordinary appearances of God in the creatures, should put us upon inquiring after his mind and will therein. Christ foretold signs in the heavens. The birth of Christ was notified to the Jewish shepherds by an angel, to the gentile philosophers by a star; to whom God spake in their own lan-

Bethlehem, unknown till these wise men came. Note, Nothing will awaken those that are resolved to be regardless. Oh the amazing stupidity of these Jews! And no less that of many professing Christians. Observe,

1. This inquiry was made in the days of Herod the King. This Herod was an Edomite, made king of Judea by Augustus and Antony, then rulers of Rome, a man made up of falsehood and cruelty, yet complimented with the title of Herod the Great. Christ was born in the 35th year of his reign. (1) The scripture was now departed from Judah, and the lawgiver from between his feet; and therefore now was the time for Shiloh to come, and to Him shall the gathering of the people be, witness the wise men. Gen. 49: 10.

2. Who were these wise men, here called Magi? Some take the name in a good sense; the Magi among the Persians were their philosophers and priests; nor would they admit any one for their king, who had not first been enrolled among the Magi. Others think they dealt in unlawful arts. The word is used of Simon, the sorcerer, Acts 8, 9, 11, and of Elymas, the sorcerer, Acts 13: 6; nor does the Scripture use it in any other sense; thus it was an early instance and presage of Christ's victory over the devil, when those who had been his devotees became the adherents of Jesus; so soon were the trophies of his victory over the powers of darkness erected. Well, whatever sort of wise men they were before, now they began to be wise men indeed.

This we are sure of, that they were gentiles. The Jews regarded not Christ, but these gentiles inquired Him out. Note, Often those who are nearest to the means are farthest from the end, see ch. 8: 11, 12. The respect paid to Christ by these gentiles was a happy presage and specimen of what would follow, when those who were afar off should be made nigh by Christ. They were scholars; they dealt in curious arts; good scholars should be good Christians, and then they complete their learning when they learn Christ. They were men of the east, who were noted for their sooth-saying. Isa. 2: 6. Arabia is called the land of the east, (Gen. 25: 6.) and the Arabians are called men of the east, Judg. 6: 3. The presents they brought are the products of their own land; the Arabians had done homage to David and Solomon as types of Christ. Jethro and Job were of that country. (2)

3. As they were in their country in the east, they saw an extraordinary star, such as they had not seen before, which they took to be an indication of an extraordinary person born in Judea, over which land this star was seen to hover, in the nature of a comet, or meteor rather, in the lower regions of the air. Note, Extraordinary appearances of God in the creatures, should put us upon inquiring after his mind and will therein. Christ foretold signs in the heavens. The birth of Christ was notified to the Jewish shepherds by an angel, to the gentile philosophers by a star; to whom God spake in their own language, and in the way they were best acquainted with. Some think that the very night, which the shepherds saw the night after Christ was born, was the same, which to the wise men, who lived at such a distance, appeared as a star; which we cannot easily admit, because the star they had seen in the east, they saw some time after, leading them to the house where Christ lay, as a candle set up on purpose. The idolaters, especially the eastern nations, worshipped the stars as the host of heaven, whence the planets have the names of their idol gods. We read of a particular star they had in veneration, Amos 5: 26. Thus the stars, that had been misused, came to be put to the right use, to lead men to Christ; the gods of the heathen became his servants. Some think this star put them in mind of Balaam's prophecy, that a star should come out of Jacob, pointing to a seigneur that shall rise out of Israel; see Num. 24: 17. Balaam came from the mountains of the east, and was one of their wise men. Others impute their inquiry to the general expectation, in the east, of some great prince to appear. Tacitus takes notice of it, l. 5. of his history. 'Many had the belief, that the ancient writings of the priests predicted, that about that time an eastern power would prevail, and that persons proceeding from Judea would obtain dominion.' Suetonius also, in his life of Vespasian, speaks of it; so that this extraordinary phenomenon was construed as pointing to that king; and we may suppose that a divine impression enabled them to interpret this star as a signal pointing to Christ. (3)

4. They came from the east to Jerusalem. Whither should they come to inquire for the King of the Jews, but to Jerusalem, the mother city, whither the tribes go up, the tribes of the Lord? They might have said, 'We shall hear of this prince shortly in our own country, and it will be time enough then to pay our homage to Him.' But so impatient were they, that they took a long journey to inquire after Him. Note, Those who truly desire to find Christ, will not regard perils in seeking Him. Then shall we know, if we follow on to know the Lord. The question is, Where is He that is born King of the Jews? They do not ask, whether there was such an one born, they are sure of that, but, Where is He born? Note, Those who know something of Christ, cannot but covet to know more of Him. They call Christ the King of the Jews, for so the Messiah was expected to be, and He is protector and ruler of all the spiritual Israel, He is born a king. To this question they expected a ready answer, and to find all Je-ru-

NOTES. Verses 1, 2.

(1) Herod, an Edomite by descent, yet proselyted to the Jewish religion, was king of Judea by means of the Romans, and after much war and bloodshed. Though long prosperous, horrible cruelties tarnished his whole administration. With many others, he had put to death Mariamne, his wife, and two of his own sons, and, though old, was full of ambition and jealousy, and prompt to acts of tyranny and cruelty, as ever, at the time when these wise men came to inquire about the birth of Christ. Several of this name being mentioned in the New Testament, a genealogical notice of them may be useful. Herod, improperly called the Great, son of Antipater, an Idumean, married ten wives, of whom Doris was mother of Antipater, his eldest son, executed, by his order, five days before his own death. Mariamne, daughter of Hircanus, the last of the Asmonean race, was his second wife, and mother of Alexander and Aristobolus—all three executed by Herod. The last, however, left two sons and a daughter; Agrippa, the eldest, called Herod, who put James, the Apostle, to death, and imprisoned Peter, Acts 12, whose son Agrippa, tetrarch of Galilee, sat with Felix, husband of Drusilla, the elder Agrippa's daughter, and his other sister Bernice, when Paul pleaded, Acts 26. Herod, second son of Aristobolus, was king of Chalcis, and had a son, Aristobolus, to whom Nero gave Armenia, heless, and who married Salome, the dancer, mentioned by Mark, ch. 6: 22, daughter of Herodias. This Herodias was the third child and only daughter of Aristobolus, married her uncle Philip, and then his brother Antipater, while Philip yet lived, and procured the death of John the Baptist, who had reproved this incestuous marriage. Matt. 14: 3. Mark 6: 17. Luke 3: 19. By another Mariamne, his third wife, Herod had Herod-Philip, (first husband of Herodias,) and Salome. By his fourth wife he had Archelaus, mentioned in v. 22, who reigned, with the title of Tetrarch, nine years, and Philip, who was the first husband of the dancer, Salome, above. Herod's fifth wife was mother of Herod Antipater, who married Herodias, his brother Philip's wife, was the prince to whom Pilate sent our Lord, Luke 13: 31-32, and died in exile, according to Josephus, with his infamous wife. The elucidation of the sacred history does not require a further acquaintance with this family.

JOSEPHUS, CALMET, DR. A. CLARKE.

2, 'These wise men, or Magi, are by many supposed to have belonged to the celebrated priesthood of Persia, which was much respected among the eastern nations, and had the pre-eminence in politics and natural philosophy, as well as religion, "having," as Bp. Porteus observes, "juster sentiments of God and his worship, than any of the ancient heathens, and fittest of them all to have the first knowledge of the Son of God, and of salvation by Him imparted to them." But probably these were of the class mentioned by Daniel the prophet, as magicians, astrologers, Chaldeans and soothsayers, who had nearly the same character as the Persian magi; and were held in great esteem by the old monarchs of Babylon, being consulted by them in all cases of difficulty. The prophet was indeed, appointed their master, Dan. 5: 11, 12. This order of men retained their influence in the east to the time of our Savior; though it is probable they did not come, on the occasion of his birth, from Persia, but from some neighboring part of Syria, Arabia, or Mesopotamia. They were particularly famous for their skill in astronomy, and had kept a regular account of the most remarkable phenomena of the celestial bodies for some centuries before the reign of Alexander the Great.' HENLETT. Doubtless, the opinion prevailing at that time in the east, that in Judea an extraordinary person would arise, who should have dominion over the nations, originated from a partial acquaintance with the writings of the ancient prophets, and from Jews dispersed in great numbers in all these countries. Such an event was expected by these 'wise men,' or sages, who looked for intimations of its taking place; and it is probable they were divinely apprised of its speedy approach, and shewn something of the Redeemer's real glory, and the nature of his kingdom. Many think they came out of Arabia; and from the opinion that the prophecy of David was fulfilled by them, (Ps. 72: 9, 10, 15,) the popish legend that they were three kings seems to have arisen. (This representation, however, is countenanced by a name so respectable as that of Bp. Porteus, Lect. II. on Matt.) Remote regions of Arabia extended far south of Judea; and the queen of Sheba called 'the queen of the south,' (2: 42,) is supposed to have come thence. (Note, 1 Kings 10: 1, 2.) SCORR.

(3) An extraordinary luminous appearance in the heavens, which they noticed, and gathered from it, instructed, doubtless, of God, perhaps in a supernatural dream, that One was born to be the King of the Jews, induced them to take a long and expensive journey, to pay their homage. Probably they supposed the inhabitants of Jerusalem well acquainted with the event, and came thither, inquiring openly, and

5 And they said unto him, "In Bethlehem of Judea: for thus it is written by the prophet,

6 And "thou Bethlehem, in the land of Juda, art not the least among the princes of Juda, for out of thee shall come a Governor, that shall rule my people Israel.

7 Then Herod, when he had privily called the wise men, inquired of them diligently what time the star appeared.

8 And he sent them to Bethlehem, and said, "Go, and search diligently for the young child; and, when ye have found him, bring lem worshipping at the feet of this new King; but no man can give them any information. Note, There is more gross ignorance in the world, and in the church too, than we are aware of. Many that we think should direct us to Christ, are themselves strangers to Him. They ask, as the spouse of the daughters of Jerusalem, Say ye him, whom my soul loveth? But they are never the wiser. However, like the spouse, they pursue the inquiry, Where is He that is born King of the Jews? Are they asked, 'Why do ye make this inquiry?' It is because they have seen his star in the east. Are they asked, 'What business have ye with Him? What have the men of the east to do with the King of the Jews?' They have their answer ready, We are come to worship Him. They conclude that He will be at length their King, and therefore they will sometimes ingratiate themselves with Him and with those about Him. Note, Those in whose hearts the day-star is risen, to give them any knowledge of Christ, must worship Him. Have we seen Christ's star? Let us study to give Him honor.

5. News of this inquiry at last came to court. And when Herod heard it, he was troubled, v. 3. He could not be a stranger to the prophecies concerning the Messiah and his kingdom, and the times fixed for his appearing by Daniel's weeks; but having himself reigned long and successfully, he began to hope that those promises would fail, and that his kingdom should be perpetuated, in spite of them. What a damp therefore must it shed on him to hear of this King's birth, now, when the time fixed for his appearing had come. Note, Carnal hearts dread nothing so much as the fulfilling of the Scriptures. But though Herod, an Edomite, was troubled, one would have thought Jerusalem should rejoice to hear that her king comes; yet, it seems, all Jerusalem, except the few that waited for the consolation of Israel, were troubled with Herod, apprehensive of I know not what ill consequences; that it would involve them in war, or restrain their lusts. They, for their part, desired no king but Herod; no, not the Messiah himself. Note, The slavery of sin is foolishly preferred by many to the glorious liberty of the children of God, only because they apprehend difficulties from the necessary revolution in the government of the soul. Herod and the Jews were thus troubled, apprehending that the kingdom of the Messiah would clash with the secular powers; whereas the star that proclaimed Him King, plainly intimated that his kingdom was heavenly. Note, The reason why the kings and people of the earth oppose the kingdom of Christ, is, because they do not know it. (4)

6. No one pretends to tell where the King of the Jews is, but Herod inquires where it was expected He should be born. The persons he consults are, the chief priests, teachers by office, and the scribes, who made it their business to study the law; their lips must keep knowledge, but then the people must inquire the law at their mouth, Mal. 2: 7. It was generally known that Christ should be born at Bethlehem; (John 7: 42.) but Herod would have counsel's opinion upon it, and applies to the proper persons; and, to be better satisfied, has them all together—the chief priests and scribes, and demands of them the place, according to the Scriptures, where Christ should be born. Many a good question is put with an ill design; so was this by Herod. The priests and scribes need no long time to give an answer, but agree that the Messiah must be born in Bethlehem, the city of David, here called Bethlehem of Judea, to distinguish it from another city in the land of Zebulun. Josh. 19: 15. Bethlehem signifies the house of bread; fit place for Him to be born in, who is the true Manna, the bread which came down from heaven, given for the life of the world. The proof they produce is taken from Micah 5: 2, where it is foretold, that though Bethlehem be little among the thousands of Judah, (so it is in Micah,) no very populous place, yet it shall be found not the least among the princes of Judah; (so it is here:) (5) for Bethlehem's honor was not, as that of other cities, the multitude of people, but the magnificence of the princes it produced. Though, on some accounts, Bethlehem was little, yet herein it had pre-eminence over all the cities of Israel, that the Lord shall count, when he writeth up the people, that this Man, even the Man Jesus Christ, was born there, Ps. 87: 6. Out of thee shall come a Governor, the King of the Jews. Note, Christ will be a Savior to those only who will be willing to take Him for their Governor. Bethlehem was the city of David, and David the glory of Bethlehem; there, then, must David's Son and Successor be born. Of the famous well at Bethlehem, by the gate, David longed to drink; (2 Sam. 23: 15.) in Christ we have not only bread enough and to spare, but may take of the water of life freely. Observe here, how Jews and gentiles compare notes about Jesus Christ. The gentiles know the time by a star; the Jews knew the place by the Scriptures; and so they are capable of informing one another. Note, It would contribute much to the increase of knowledge, did we thus mutually communicate what we know. Men grow rich by bartering; so, if we have knowledge to communicate to others, they will communicate to us; thus many shall discourse, shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased.

7. Herod was now old; had reigned thirty-five years; this King was but lately born, and not likely soon to commence any important design; yet Herod is jealous of Him. Kings cannot endure to think of successors, much less of rivals; and therefore nothing less than the blood of this infant King will satisfy him. He will not reflect, that, if the child be indeed the Messiah, in opposing Him, he would be found fighting against God, than which nothing is more vain, or dangerous. Passion has mastered his reason and conscience. Now, see how cunningly he laid his project. He privily called the wise men, not openly owning his fears; it would declaring both what they had seen, and why they had come. It was an early intimation of the calling of the gentiles into the church of Christ, even when the Jews would neglect Him, and be rejected by Him. 'Christ,' says Beza, 'a poor child, laid in a crib, and neglected by his own people, has, notwithstanding, a noble witness of his divinity from heaven, and of his kingly estate from strangers.' It is plain these wise men did not arrive at Bethlehem till after the presentation of Christ at the temple, (Notes, 9–12. Luke 2: 36–39.) and likely that Joseph and Mary purposed settling at Bethlehem, and had procured a residence there.

VERSES 3–6.

(4) As a suspicious trait, Herod no sooner heard of 'the king of the Jews' than the dread of a rival haunted him. He neither understood the spiritual nature of the Messiah's kingdom, nor considered that, being now old, a new-born infant was not likely to give him disquietude, and was therefore greatly troubled. The citizens of Jerusalem also, not having formed a proper judgment of blessings to be expected from the Messiah, were in consternation. They had witnessed so many of Herod's cruelties, whenever a competitor was suspected, that they seem to have dreaded new scenes of confusion and bloodshed; and thus were troubled at that event, which should have given them joy. Herod, however, by a strange mixture of regard for the word of God, and contempt of it, supposing that ancient prophecies were about to be fulfilled, yet hoping to defeat them, framed his plan for the purpose. First, he convened the priests and scribes, or the heads of the twenty-four courses, with the high priest at their stated superior, and the professed interpreters of the law, to know assuredly from them at what place the promised Messiah was to be born. Using this information to direct the wise men where to find Him, he might by their means discover and cut Him off; rendering abortive, by one blow, God's purposes and prophecies, from the beginning! To Herod's question they returned a proper answer, referring in confirmation of it, to a prophecy already considered. Note, Micah 5: 2. That prophecy differs in the quotation from our version of the prophet, especially as it is here said, 'Thou art not the least,' &c. Some, [as Surenhusius, in his elaborate examination of the two passages,] propose reading the clause in Micah interrogatively, 'Art thou little among the thousands of Judah?' It is, however, plain that the sense, rather than the exact words of the Old Testament prophecies, is quoted in many parts of the New Testament; and that though these quotations are often taken from the Septuagint, yet that is not uniformly nor exactly adhered to: 'And thou, Bethlehem, the house of Ephraim, art one of the least to be among the thousands of Judah; out of thee shall one come forth to me, to be for a ruler of Israel.' Sept. (Though thou be a small town, yet thou shalt be famous and noble, through the birth of the Messiah, who shall be born in thee.' SCOTT. Both by ancient and later Jews this prophecy (6.) is owned as pointing out the Messiah's birthplace. Bethlehem Ephratah was 'in the land of Judah,' as appears from Micah's prophecy, from Ruth 1: 2, and the Septuagint version of Josh. 15: 60, and so described by Matthew, partly to distinguish it from another Bethlehem in the land of Zebulun. Josh. 19: 15, and partly because its other name, Ephratah, being now disused, was not familiar to Herod.

(5) What Micah calls thousands, Matthew calls princes; the Israelites being divided into thousands, and each thousand having its prince. [Thus, in England, as Hammond remarks, the hundreds contained originally so many families, and retain the name, in reference to the first distribution.] Micah speaks of a Ruler in Israel, Matthew of a Governor that shall rule or feed my people Israel. [See Rev. 19: 15, in Gr. since, as Beza observes, 'Kings are fully called feeders and shepherds of the people.' Hence says Scott, He shall rule, as a shepherd does his flock, who, in feeding, rules, and in ruling, feeds.] It should also be noticed, that the evangelist is giving the version of the chief priests and scribes.

VERSES 7, 8.

(6) The sages were called to an interview by Herod privily; lest the Jews themselves should ascertain the time of the Messiah's birth, or understand the tyrant's plot, or give these travelers better information. He wished also not to appear too solicitous respecting their object: nor me word again, 'that I may come and worship him also.

[Practical Observations.]

9 When they had heard the king, they departed: and, lo, *the star which they saw in the east, went before them, till it came and stood over where the young child was.

10 When they saw the star, they rejoiced with exceeding great joy.

11 And when they were come into the house, *they saw the rise up in judgment with that generation, and with this too, and will condemn them; for they came from a far country to worship Christ, while the Jews, his kinsmen, would not go to the next town to bid Him welcome. It might have been a discouragement to these wise men, to find Him, whom they sought, thus neglected at home. Are we come so far to honor the King of the Jews, and do the Jews themselves so slight Him and us? Yet they persist in their resolution. Note, We must continue to attend upon Christ, though we be alone. Whatever others do, we must serve the Lord; if they will not go to heaven with us, yet we must not go to hell with them.

1. Now, observe, by the first appearance of the star, v. 9, 10. it was intimated where they might inquire for this King; then it disappeared, and they were left to take the usual methods for such an inquiry. Extraordinary helps are not to be expected where ordinary are to be had. Well, they were upon their journey to Bethlehem, but that is a considerable town, where shall they find Him? Here they were at their wit's end, but not at their faith's end: they believed that God, who had brought them there, would not leave them; and lo, the star, which they saw in the east, went before them. (7) Note, be his disgrace to let the wise men know them, and dangerous to let the people know. (8) Sinners are often tormented with secret fears. Herod learn of the wise men when the star appeared, that he might act accordingly; then employs them to inquire further, and bring him an account. All this might look suspicious, if he had not covered it with a show of religion—that I may come and worship Him also. Note, The greatest wickedness often conceals itself under a mask of piety. Absalom cloaks his rebellious project with a vow. But see how strangely Herod was infatuated, in trusting it with the wise men, and not choosing managers that would be faithful to him. It was but seven miles from Jerusalem; how easily might he have sent spies to watch the wise men, and destroy the Child they worshipped. But God can hide from the enemies of the church those methods by which they might easily destroy it; when He intends to lead princes away spoiled, his way is, to make the judges fools.

V. 9-12. We have here the wise men's humble attendance upon Christ, and the honors they paid Him. From Jerusalem they went to Bethlehem, resolving to seek till they find; but it is strange that not one person of the court, church, or city, should accompany them, if not in conscience, yet in civility to them, or in curiosity to see the new-born Prince. As the queen of the south, so the wise men of the east, will be his disgrace to let the wise men know them, and dangerous to let the people know. (8) Sinners are often tormented with secret fears. Herod learn of the wise men when the star appeared, that he might act accordingly; then employs them to inquire further, and bring him an account. All this might look suspicious, if he had not covered it with a show of religion—that I may come and worship Him also. Note, The greatest wickedness often conceals itself under a mask of piety. Absalom cloaks his rebellious project with a vow. But see how strangely Herod was infatuated, in trusting it with the wise men, and not choosing managers that would be faithful to him. It was but seven miles from Jerusalem; how easily might he have sent spies to watch the wise men, and destroy the Child they worshipped. But God can hide from the enemies of the church those methods by which they might easily destroy it; when He intends to lead princes away spoiled, his way is, to make the judges fools.

If we go as far as we can in our duty, God will enable us to do that which we of ourselves could not do. Up, and be doing, and the Lord will be with thee. The law adds the active, not the idle. The star had long left them; yet now returned. They who follow God in the dark, shall find that light is soon for them. Israel was led by a pillar of fire to the promised land, the wise men by a star to the promised Seed, who is himself the bright and morning Star. Rev. 22:16. God would rather create a new thing, than desert those who faithfully seek Him. This star was the token of God's presence with them; for He is Light, and gives before his people as their guide. Note, If we by faith eye God in all our ways, we may see ourselves under his conduct; He guides with his eye, (Ps. 32:8.) and saith to them, This is the way, walk in it. There is a day-star that arises in their hearts, 2 Pet. 1:19. When they saw the star, v. 10, they rejoiced with exceeding great joy. Now they saw that they had not undertaken this long journey in vain. When the desire comes, it is a tree of life. Now they knew that God was with them; and the tokens of his presence cannot but fill with joy unspeakable those souls that know how to value them. Now they could laugh at those in Jerusalem, who, probably, had laughed at them, as coming on a fool's errand. The watchmen can give the spouse no tidings of her beloved; yet it is but a little she passes from them, and finds him. Cant. 3:4. We cannot expect too little from man, nor too much from God. How transported with joy these wise men were, on seeing the star, none know so well as those, who after a long, melancholy night of temptation and desertion, under the power of a spirit of bondage, at length receive the spirit of adoption, witnessing with their spirits, that they are the children of God. This is light out of darkness, and life from the dead. Now they might hope to see the Lord's Christ speedily, the Sun of righteousness; for they see the morning star. Note, We should be glad of every thing which will direct us to Christ. This star was sent to conduct the wise men into the presence-chamber of the King; by this master of ceremonies they were

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-8. It is often found, that they who live distant from means of grace, are led to use double diligence; and thus first get acquainted with Christ and his salvation.—But neither natural science, abstruse speculations, nor curious arts, avail in this great concern. The Sacred Scripture must be searched, with attentive diligence, obedient faith, and fervent prayer. This is 'a light shining in a dark place;' and they who follow its holy direction will spare no labor or expense in inquiring after Jesus, our Prince and Savior; they will render Him honor and submission, will devote their talents to his service, and not be reluctant to avow their expectations from Him and obligations to Him. But, alas! should eastern sages, or strangers from distant nations, come to many of those cities where Christianity is now professed, purposely to inquire after Christ and his religion; how much would they be surprised at the ignorance and inattention of those, who have the best opportunities of instruction, respecting the truths and duties of their holy profession! Such inquirers would not indeed excite consternation in either rulers or people; but would probably occasion astonishment, and incur the derision of those, who never acquainted themselves with Him, whose disciples they profess to be. In few places would rulers and teachers assemble, to consider and answer their inquiries: and were this done, it would perhaps arise rather from profane policy, than a cordial desire to promote the knowledge of Christ and his salvation!—The Scripture must be fulfilled; and they who are acquainted with the Bible, and believe its testimony, are likely to find the right way, and point it out to others: and all who are related to Christ, and submit to Him as the Governor and Shepherd of Israel, will be numbered with 'the princes of his people,' however little in other respects. But let us beware of a dead faith. Facts prove, that a man may have a prevailing persuasion of many truths, and yet hate them violently, because they interfere with his ambition, interests, or sinful indulgence. Such belief produces uneasiness, and strengthens his resolution of opposing the cause of God: and so great is human inconsistency, that a man may deliberately form projects to defeat those purposes, which he cannot but perceive are from God; and may vainly hope for success in his impious, infatuated attempts! Indeed this is the enmity, malignity and misery of Satan from age to age. But 'He who sitteth in heaven will laugh' at these puny enemies; yea, 'the Lord will have them in derision: yet will He speak to them 'in his wrath, and vex them in his sore displeasure.' He can infatuate or crush them when He sees good; but they often for a time impose on the unsuspecting simplicity of pious men, and, by pretending to join them in honoring Christ, draw them in to forward their base designs.

Verses 9-12.

7) (The town being built on the ridge of a hill overlooking a valley that extends to the Dead sea, any phenomenon elevated over it must be seen afar. Ed. of Calmet.) What appeared, however, was no star, planet, or comet, properly so called; but a luminous meteor in our atmosphere, which at a distance looked like a star. 1) Now any appearance of a body of light in the air is called by Greek and Latin authors a 'star,' though it be only a meteor, that is, a transient accidental luminous vapor: neither of considerable height, nor long continuance; in which sense also the Scripture speaks of stars falling from heaven. Matt. 24:29. Mark 13:25. And such was that which the wise men saw.—2) Ps. Porcius, and which was formed by God for the purpose; as the cloudy pillar pointed out the spot, where Israel was to encamp in the wilderness.—It is evident that Joseph and Mary resided at this time in Bethlehem, 1) because if Christ had been now at Nazareth, He could hardly have been carried into Egypt, without passing through Herod's dominions.' Doddr.] and that they fed thence into Egypt. SCOTT.

(8) 1) Perhaps they expected this great Prince would have been born in the family of Herod; at least it must have surprised them to find Him accommodated only like a carpenter's child; but, wisely considering that such miraculous honors as the star gave Him, were far beyond any external circumstance, they paid Him their homage as readily as if they had found Him in the richest palace. An amiable example of that humble, ingenious temper, which fits a man for the reception of the gospel.' Doddr.] Opening their treasures, they presented Him the choicest productions of their country, brought with them for the purpose. The fathers have generally supposed that, by these gifts, they acknowledged the deity and royalty of Christ. We must, however, conclude, that God, who directed and prospered their journey, gave them also some knowledge relating to the person and office of the new-born King; that their worship was of the same nature with that of other believers in every age; and that their abundant joy arose from young child with Mary his mother and fell down and worshipped him: and when they had opened their treasures, they presented unto him gifts, gold, and frankincense, and myrrh.

12 And being warned of God in a dream, that they should not return to Herod, they departed into their own country another way.

13 ¶ And when they were departed, behold, the angel of the Lord appeareth to Joseph introduced. Now God fulfils his promise of meeting those who are disposed to rejoice, and work righteousness, (Isa. 64:5.) and they fulfil his precept, Let the hearts of those rejoice who seek the Lord, Ps. 105:3. Note, God is sometimes disposed to favor young converts with very encouraging tokens of his love, in reference to the difficulties they meet at their first setting out in the ways of God. Further,

2. We may well imagine their expectations were raised to find this royal Babe, v. 11, though slighted by the nation, yet honorably attended at home; and what was their disappointment, when they found a cottage was his palace, and his poor mother all the retinue He had! Is this the Savior of the world? Is this the King of the Jews, nay and the Prince of the kings of the earth? Yes, this is He, who, though He was rich, yet, for our sakes, became thus poor. However, these wise men were so wise as to see through this veil, and in this despised Babe to discern the glory as of the Only-begotten of the Father.⁽⁸⁾ They did not think themselves baffled; but, as having found the King they sought, they presented themselves first to Him, and then their gifts. They fell down and worshipped Him, though he was not read that they so honored Herod, though he was in the height of royal grandeur; but to this Babe they gave this honor, not only as to a king, but as to a God. Note, All that have found Christ adore Him and submit themselves to Him. He is thy Lord, and worship thou Him. It will be the wisdom of the wisest, and by this it will appear that they know Christ, themselves, and their true interests, if they be the faithful worshippers of the Lord Jesus. In the east, when they did homage to their kings, they made them presents.⁽⁹⁾ Thus the subjection of the kings of Sheba to Christ is spoken of, Ps. 72:10. They shall bring presents and offer gifts. Isa. 60:6. Note, With ourselves, we must give up all that we have to Jesus Christ; and if we be sincere in the surrender of ourselves to Him, we shall be willing to part with what is dearest to us and most valuable to Him; nor are our gifts accepted, unless we first present ourselves to Him as living sacrifices. God had respect to Abel, and then to his offering. Their gifts were gold, frankincense, and myrrh, money, and money's worth. Providence sent this to Joseph and Mary for relief in their present poor condition. These were the products of their own country; what God favors us with, we must honor Him with.

3. Herod appointed them to inform him of their discoveries; and, it is probable, they would have done so, if not countermanded, not suspecting their thus being made tools in a wicked design. Those who are honest themselves, easily believe that others are too, and cannot think the world so bad as it really is; but the Lord knows how to deliver the godly out of temptation. It does not appear that they promised to return to Herod, and if they had, it must have been with the usual proviso, If God permit; God did not permit them, and prevented the mischief Herod designed to the child Jesus, and the trouble in which it would have involved the wise men. They were warned of God, by an oracular intimation. Some think it implied that they asked counsel of God, and that this was the answer. Note, Those who act cautiously, and are afraid of sin, if they ask direction of God, may expect to be led in the right way. They were warned not to return to Herod, or to Jerusalem: these were unworthy to hear concerning Christ, whom they might have seen with their own eyes, and would not. They departed to their own country by another way, to bring the tidings to their countrymen. It is strange we hear no more of them, and that they or theirs did not return to attend Him in the temple, whom they had worshipped in the cradle. However, the direction they had from God in their return, would further confirm their faith in this Child, as the Lord from heaven.

the persuasion, that they had found the salvation of God for their souls, as well as 'the King of the Jews.' Probably, on arriving in their own country, they reported what they had seen, heard, and learned; and this would be a preparation for the future preaching of the gospel in those regions. Scott. 'It occurred unquestionably by the infinitely wise providence of God, that these foreigners should come to adore the new born King. This was designed to excite and admonish the Jews to prepare their minds for the reception of the Messiah, whom at that time all were expecting. It tended also to cherish and confirm the hope, which the parents and other pious persons, instructed of God had entertained concerning the Child.' Rosenm. 'And if, as early antiquity reports, some messengers of extraordinary respect were afterwards sent from Abgarus, king of Edessa, in Arabia, (which might be fact, though the letters now remaining be spurious,) it is very possible, the report of these sages, preserved by tradition, (if they were the dead,) might add weight to that of Christ's miracles, (about thirty years after,) and dispose that prince to take the greater notice of Him.' Dodd.

(9) Worship—gifts. The original word rendered worship, is so compounded as to signify crouch and adore, as a dog at his master's foot: meaning to prostrate one's self to another, according to the eastern custom, still in use. In this act the person kneels, puts his head between his knees, and with his forehead touches the ground. This is used to express both civil and religious reverence. In Hindostan this homage is paid by prostrating the body at full length. Dr. A. Clarke, at the interview of Dr. Judson with the emperor of Burmah, he says, [10]

V. 13-15 We have here Christ's flight into Egypt, to avoid the cruelty of Herod, which was the effect of the wise men's inquiry; for, before that, his obscurity was his protection. Little respect, compared with what should have been, was paid to Christ in his infancy; yet even that, instead of honoring, did but expose Him. Now observe,

1. Joseph knew neither the danger of the Child, nor how to escape it, but God, by an angel, tells him in a dream, as He did before, ch. 1:20. Joseph, before his alliance, had not been wont to converse with angels as now. Note, Those who are spiritually related to Christ, have that communion with heaven, to which they were before strangers. Joseph is here told their danger. Herod will seek the young Child to destroy Him. Note, God knows all the cruel purposes of the enemies of his church. I know thy rage against Me, says God to Sennacherib, Isa. 37:28. How early was the blessed Lord Jesus involved in trouble! Usually, even those whose riper years are attended with toils, have a quiet infancy; but the life of Jesus and his sufferings began together. He was born a man stricken with, as Jeremiah was, Jer. 15:10. Both Christ, the head, and the church, his body, agree in saying, Many a time have they afflicted me from my youth up. Pharaoh's cruelty fastens upon the Hebrews' children, and the great red dragon stands ready to devour the man child as soon as it should be born, Rev. 12:4.

Take the young Child, and flee into Egypt. Thus early must Christ give an example to his own rule, When they persecute you in one city flee into another, ch. 10:23. He that came to die for us, when his hour was not yet come, fled for his own safety. Self-preservation, being a part of the law of nature, is eminently a part of the law of God. But why flee into Egypt? Egypt was infamous for idolatry, tyranny, and enmity to the people of God, to whom it had been a house of bondage, and particularly cruel to the infants of Israel. In Egypt, as much as in Ramah, Rachel had been weeping for her children; yet that is appointed a place of refuge to the holy child Jesus. Note, God can make the worst of places serve the best of purposes. For the earth is his, and He makes what use of it He pleases; sometimes the earth helps the woman, Rev. 12:16. God, who made Moab a refuge to his outcasts, makes Egypt such for his Son.⁽¹⁰⁾

Joseph and Mary might be tempted to think, 'if this Child be the Son of God, has He no other way to secure Himself from a man that is a worm, than by such a mean retreat?' Cannot He summon legions of angels as his life guard, or cherubim with flaming swords to keep this tree of life? Can He not strike Herod dead, or wither the hand that is stretched out against Him, and so save us the trouble of this remove? They had been lately told, that He should be the glory of his people Israel; and is the land of Israel so soon too hot for Him? But we find not that they made any such objections. Their faith, being tried, was found firm; and they be-every head, excepting ours, was now in the dust. Monse Zah read the petition of the missionaries, and, on the emperor's stretching out his hand, 'crawled forward,' and presented it. Similar prostrations belong to the court ceremonies of China and Japan; and, throughout all the East, it is believed, even to the islands, no one comes before a superior without a present. 'No mark of esteem,' says Prof. Paston, is more common through all the oriental regions, none more improperly required by the rules of good breeding, than a present.' See Gen. 32:13, 43:11. 1 Sam. 9:7. 10:27. Prov. 15:16, &c. Ed.

(10) The Lord easily defeated the subtle malice of Herod, directing Joseph, by his angel in a dream, to flee without delay into Egypt, in a dream, saying, 'Arise; and take the young child and his mother and flee into Egypt, and be thou there, *until I bring thee word: 'for Herod will seek the young child to destroy him.

14 When he arose, he took the young child and his mother by night, and departed into Egypt;

15 And was there until the death of Herod: 'that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet, saying, 'Out of Egypt have I called my son.

Jid, with an implicit confidence upon God, not knowing whether he went. Heb. 11:8. Joseph and Mary, having little, had little to take care of. Abundance encumbers a necessary flight. If the rich have the advantage of the poor, while they possess what they have, the poor have the advantage of the rich when they are called to part with it.

Joseph took the young Child and his mother. The young Child may be put first, as the principal person, and Mary is called, not the wife of Joseph, but, which was her greater dignity, the mother of the young Child. This was not the first Joseph driven from Canaan to Egypt, as a shelter from the anger of his brethren. This Joseph ought to be welcome there for the sake of that.

They continued in Egypt till the death of Herod, which some think was seven years, others, not seven months. They were at a distance from the temple, and among idolaters; but God sent them there, and will have mercy and lieve this is the Son of God, though no miracle appears, but they must use ordinary means to preserve Him. Joseph had great honor in being the husband of Mary, but it has trouble attending it, as all honors in this world have. He must carry the young child into Egypt; and now it appears how well God had provided for the young child and his mother, in appointing Joseph to stand in so near a relation to them. Now the gold, which the wise men brought, stands them in stead to bear their charges. God foresees and provides against his people's distresses. He intimates the continuance of his care in saying, Be thou there, until I bring thee word. He must expect to hear again from God, and not stir until he fresh orders. God will keep his people still in dependence upon Him. Our Lord's going into Egypt is an instance of his humiliation. As there was no room for Him in the inn, so there was no quiet room for Him in the land of Judea. Thus was He banished from the earthly Canaan, that we, who for sin were banished from the heavenly Canaan, might not be forever excluded. If we and our infants be ever brought into straits, let us remember the straits into which Christ was brought, and be reconciled to them.

We see also here, that God justly leaves the Jews, who had slighted Him. We see too an earnest of his favor to the Gentiles, to whom the apostles were to bring the Gospel, when the Jews rejected it. If Egypt entertain Christ, cast out of Judea, it will be here long said, 'Blessed be Egypt my people,' Isa. 19:25.

2. The journey would be inconvenient and perilous, both to the Child and his mother. They were but poorly provided for, and likely to meet cold entertainment in Egypt; yet Joseph was not disobedient to the heavenly vision. He immediately arose, and went away by night, the same night, probably, in which he received the order. Note, Those, who would make sure work of their obedience, must make quick work of it. Joseph went out, as Abraham his father:

V. 9—15. The Lord will guide with his counsel those who follow the teaching of his word, and wait on Him for further light: He can help them even by means of ungodly men, who know more than they practise; and none shall ever seek his face in vain.—Every indication of obtaining an interest in Christ will give great and sincere joy to the humble inquirer after Him: he will not be stumbled at finding the Savior or His disciples in obscure cottages, after having in vain sought them in palaces and populous cities; he will never fear honoring the Lord of glory too much, or being too devoted to his service. 'So let us rejoice in every thing which may be a mean of leading our souls to Christ, and of disposing us to cast ourselves down before Him with humility and self-resignation.' Happy they who consecrate not only their gold and other possessions, but also their souls and bodies to that Great Ruler, whose office it is to feed and govern the Israel of God; under whose conduct and care they shall receive blessings infinitely more valuable than all the treasures of the East or West! Doddg.] Our Father also, who knows what his not sacrifice. Though far from the temple of the Lord, yet they had with them the Lord of the temple. A forced absence from God's ordinances, and a forced presence with the wicked, may be the lot, are not the sin, yet cannot but be the grief of good people.

3. Out of Egypt have I called my son, &c. 11:1. This word of the prophet undoubtedly referred to the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt, in which God owned them for his son, his first-born, (Exod. 4:22.) but it is here applied, by way of analogy, to Christ, the Head of the church. Note, The Scripture has many accomplishments, so copious is it, and so well ordered in all things! God is daily fulfilling the Scripture. Scripture is not of private interpretation, we must give it its full latitude. When Israel was a child, then I loved him; and thou, h I loved him. I suffered him to be a great while in Egypt, but because I loved him, I called him out of Egypt. They that read this, must, in thought, not only look backward, but forward. That which has been shall be again, Eccl. 1:9. and the manner of expression intimates this; for it is not said, I called him, but I called my son, out of Egypt. Note, It is no new thing for God's sons to be in Egypt, a strange land, and house of bondage; but they shall be fetched out. They may be hid in Egypt, but not left there. All the elect of God, by nature children of wrath, are born in a spiritual Egypt, and in conversion effectually called out. It might be objected against Christ, that he had been in Egypt. Must the Sun of Righteousness arise out of that land of darkness? No strange thing, as this shews; Israel was brought out of Egypt to be advanced to the highest honors; and this is but doing the same thing again. [Pract. Obs.]

V. 16—18. 1. Herod waited long for the return of the wise men; he hopes, though slow, they will be sure, and he shall crush his rival at his first appearing; but he hears that they are gone off another way, which, increasing his jealousy, makes him suspect they are in the interest of this new king. He is exceeding wrath, and the more desperate for being disappointed. Note, Inevitable corruption swells the higher for the obstruction it meets.

2. If he could not reach this king of the Jews by a particular execution, he doubted not but to involve him in a general stroke, which, like the sword of war, should devour one as well as another. This would be sure work; as they who would destroy their own iniquity, must be sure to destroy all their iniquities. Herod was an Edomite; enmity to Israel was bred in the bone with him. Doeg was an Edomite, and, for David's sake, slew all the priests of the Lord.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

children need, uses some as his stewards to supply the wants of others, and He will provide for them in every emergency, though the provision come from the ends of the earth.—Let us remember, that this event was an indication, that Jesus was 'the Light of the Gentiles,' as well as 'the glory of Israel; [—] let us look on it as a beautiful emblem of that more glorious state of the Christian church, when the Gentiles shall come to its light, and sages and kings to the brightness of its rising; when the abundance of the sea shall be converted to it, and the wealth of the Gentiles consecrated to its honor; Doddg.] and, whilst we are thankful for our mercies, let us recollect, that if we do not honor and worship, as our Lord and Savior, Him, who now reigns on his glorious throne, these eastern sages will rise up against us too in judgment; for they came from far, to worship Him as an infant in the arms of his mother.—But if we sincerely follow his guidance, He will by various interpositions direct our conduct; and He has unnumbered methods of defeating the most subtle and best concerted machinations of his enemies. Scott.

with the young Child and his mother, and there to wait till he had orders to return. Immediately he obeyed, and set out that night on his journey. Thus was 'the King of the Jews' driven, as an exile, out of his own land. 'He came to his own, but his own received Him not.' Shelter was sought for Him in a country, which had ever been most hostile to the people of God. Here they remained till the death of Herod, which seems to have taken place a few months after.—Many prophecies seem to have had a double meaning, both respecting the church, and Christ the Head of the church. In reference to this from Hosea, (Note. Hos. 11:1.) there appears to have been a particular intention of Providence in Christ's going into Egypt, that He might come up at the divine call from the same place, whence the nation of Israel had been brought. 'The same love of God, which had moved Him to free Israel from Egyptian bondage, so operated that He would not leave Christ in Egypt, but bring Him back to his own people, whom He was to instruct 'in the knowledge of divine truth.' Rosenm.] Every circumstance favors the conclusion, that Joseph was warned to flee, immediately after the departure of the wise men, and considered the case too urgent to admit delay. Numbers of Jews were settled in Egypt, which would render his situation more comfortable, than it would else have been. Out of Egypt, &c. (15.) This is rendered in the LXX, 'Out of Egypt have I called his children;' but the evangelist gives the sense of the Hebrew. Scott.

Herod, finding the wise men did not return to him, and supposing himself deceived, was, by jealousy, disappointment and in wroth, and sent forth, and slew all the children that were in Bethlehem, and in all the coasts thereof, from two years old and under, according to the time which he had diligently inquired of the wise men.

17 Then was fulfilled that which was spoken by Jeremy the prophet, saying,

18 In Rama was there a voice heard, lamentation, and weeping, and great mourning, Rachel weeping for her children, and would not be comforted because they are not.

19 But when Herod was dead, behold, of little children are proofs of their martyrdom. How early did persecution against Christ and his kingdom commence! Think ye that He came to send peace on the earth? No, but a sword, such a sword as this, ch. 10, 34, 35. A passive testimony was here given to the Lord Jesus. When in the womb He was witnessed to, by a child's leaping in the womb for joy at his approach; so now, at two years old, He had contemporary witnesses. They shed their blood for Him, who afterwards shed his blood for them. These were the infancy of the noble army of martyrs. If these infants were thus baptized with blood, though their own, into the church triumphant, it could be said, that what they got in heaven, abundantly compensated them for what they lost on earth. Out of the mouth of these babes and sucklings God did perfect praise; otherwise, it is not good to the Almighty that He should thus afflict.

There is an absurd tradition, that there were 14000 children slain. But, in one of the most populous cities in the world, there would not be found so many male children under two years old; much less in Bethlehem, having not near a fortieth part. It is strange that Josephus does not mention this fact. It is probable that, writing after Matthew, he would not relate it, because, being a zealous Jew, he would not thus far countenance the Christian history. But, had it not been true, he would have contested it. Macrobius, a heathen writer, says, that when Augustus Cæsar heard that Herod had slain his own son, among the children put to death, he observed, it was better to be Herod's swine than his son. Usage forbade his killing swine, but nothing restrained him from killing his son. Some think he had a young child at Bethlehem; others, that two events are confounded—the murder of the infants and of his son Antipater.

Some observe another design of Providence; that, as by the Old Testament prophecies, Bethlehem was the place, and this the time, for the Messiah's birth, and all the children of Bethlehem, &c. at the time, being murdered, none but Jesus, who alone escaped, could pretend to be the Messiah. Herod thought he had baffled all the Old Testament prophecies, defeated the indications of the star, and devotions of the wise men. Having burnt the hive, he thinks he has killed the master bee; but God in heaven has him in derision. Whatever crafty, cruel devices are in men's hearts, the counsel of the Lord shall stand.

3. Then was fulfilled that prophecy, (Jer. 31: 15.) A voice was heard in Ramah. See the fullness of the Scripture! That prediction was accomplished in Jeremiah's time, when Nebuzaradan, after destroying Jerusalem, brought all his prisoners to Ramah, and assigned them to the sword, or captivity. Then was the cry in Ramah heard to Bethlehem; for the two cities, one in Judah's lot, the other in Benjamin's, were not far apart. Now the prophecy was again fulfilled. The noise was heard from Bethlehem to Ramah; for Herod's cruelty extended to all the coasts of Bethlehem, even into the lot of Benjamin, among the children of Rachel. Some think the country about Bethlehem was called Rachel, because there she died, and was buried. Rachel's sepulchre was nigh Bethlehem, comp. Gen. 35: 16, 19. and 1 Sam. 10: 2. Rachel's heart was set upon children; the son she died in travail of, she called Benoni, the son of her sorrow. These mothers were like Rachel, lived near her grave, and many of them descended from her; and therefore their lamentations are elegantly represented by Rachel's weeping.

It was lamentation, and weeping, and great mourning; all little enough to express their sense of this aggravated calamity. There was a great cry in Egypt when the first-born were slain; so here, when the youngest were, for whom we naturally feel special tenderness. Here was a representation of this world. We hear in it lamentation, and weeping, and mourning, and see the tears of the oppressed. Our way lies through a vale of tears. This sorrow was so great that they would not be comforted. They hardened themselves in grief. Blessed be God, there is no occasion of grief in this world, no, not that which is supplied by sin itself, that will justify us in refusing to be comforted. They would not be comforted, because they are not, are not living, are not in their mother's embraces. If, indeed, they were not, there might be an excuse for sorrowing as without hope; but we know they are not lost, but gone before; if we forget they are, we lose the best ground of comfort, 1 Thess. 4: 13. Some make this great grief of the Bethlehemites a judgment upon them for their contempt of Christ. They that would not rejoice for the birth of the Son of God, are justly made to weep for the death of their own sons. They only wondered at the tidings the shepherds brought, but did not welcome them. The quoting of this prophecy might serve as an answer to those who would say, 'Can He, who is to be the consolation of Israel, be introduced with all that lamentation?' Yes, for so it was foretold, and the Scripture must be fulfilled; and besides, the bitter weeping in Ramah, was but a prologue to the greater joy; for it follows, thy work shall be rewarded, and there is hope in thy end. The ignation, wrought up to a rage bordering on madness. Determining to make sure the destruction of his competitor, he sent forth, as is probable, some of the soldiers of his guard, and slew the male children of Bethlehem and its dependent villages, under two years of age, (that is, says Doddridge, from their entrance upon the second year, and under.) having regard to the appearance of the star. Thus was the date of Christ's birth publicly marked, and the pretension of any other, as born about the same time at Bethlehem, cut off. This event formed another accomplishment of the prophecy of Jeremiah, already considered. (Note. Jer. 31: 15-17.)—Rachel, who was buried betwixt Ramah and Bethlehem, might be poetically represented on this occasion to weep for the slaughter of her children. Descendants of Joseph and Benjamin were, doubtless, murdered, as well as those of Judah, in this massacre. It may be observed, the evangelist does not say, 'that it might be fulfilled;' but 'then was fulfilled.' It was a fulfilment of the words, though not the event immediately predicted.—No pen can describe the horrors of a scene so brutal, nor the anguish of mothers over their butchered offspring; and we have objected to the authenticity of the narrative on this account. But the last act of Herod's life, as related by Pridaure, must convince the reader that he could perpetrate any wickedness. For that tyrant, knowing how hated he was, concluded that none would mourn his death, but rejoice at it. To prevent this, he collected at Jericho, where he then was, the principal Jews of his kingdom, shut them up in the circus, and commanded that, as soon as he should die, they should be put to death; this, said he, 'will provide mourning for my funeral.' But the wicked order was not executed. Scott. Mr. Henry remarks: 'For the church of Rome to put the Holy Innocents into their calendar, and observe a day in memory of them, while they have so often, by their barbarous massacres, justified, and even outdone Herod, is but to do as their predecessors did, who built the tombs of the prophets, while they themselves 'slew up the same measure.' It is probable he referred to the then recent slaughter of the persecuted Vandois and Huguenots. Ed. 'As for the silence of Josephus, it is to be considered, that Bethlehem was but a small place; and therefore, in a reign of so much cruelty, the slaughter of its infants might not be greatly noticed. Josephus was not old enough to remember it himself; and if he did not find it in the memoirs of Nicholas of Damascus, (that flattering historian, of whom we know he made great use in compiling the life of Herod,) he might be unwilling to introduce it, if known to him: lest the occasion should lead him to mention what, generally at least, he is solicitous to decline, I mean Christian affairs. And if we compare contemporary historians of every age, we shall find some material fact or other omitted by each of them; yet that silence of one is never used as an argument against admitting the express testimony of the rest.' whether the Lord, and many a one has the church in like manner weathered. They are dead—Herod and his son Antipater, who, though mutually jealous, yet probably concurred in seeking the death of Jesus. If Herod first kill Antipater, and then die himself, the coast is cleared, and the Lord is known by the judgments He executes, when one wicked instrument destroys another. Joseph, according to his orders, returns to the land of Israel, not pleading worse things are, the sooner they will mend. Unto them a Child was born, sufficient to repair their losses.

V. 19—23. Christ was sent to the lost sheep of the house of Israel; therefore He must return from Egypt. Observe,

1. Herod dies. Such quick work did divine vengeance make! Note, Herods must die; proud tyrants, the terror of the mighty, the oppressors of the godly, in the land of the living, down to the pit they must go. Who art thou then, that thou shouldst be afraid of a man that shall die? (Isa. 51:12, 13.) Of all sins, the guilt of innocent blood fills the measure soonest. It is a dreadful account which Josephus gives of the death of this same Herod, (Antiq. b. xvii. ch. 6, 7, 8.) that he was seized with a disease which burned him inwardly with inexpressible torture; that he was insatiably greedy of meat; had the colic, gout, and dropsy; such an intolerable stench attended his disease, that none could come near him; and so passionate was he, that he was a torment to himself, and a terror to all that attended him; his innate cruelty being thus exasperated, made him more barbarous than ever; having ordered his own son to be put to death, he imprisoned many of the nobility and gentry, and ordered that, as soon as he was dead, they should be killed. But that execution was prevented. See what kind of men have been the enemies and persecutors of Christ and his followers! Christianity has been opposed by few, but such as have divested themselves of humanity, as Nero and Domitian.

2. God had sent Joseph into Egypt, and there he stayed till God ordered him thence. Note, In all our removes, it is good to see our way plain, and God going before us; we should not move one way or the other without order. These orders were sent by an angel. Note, If our intercourse with God be kept up on our part, it shall be on his, wherever we are. No place can exclude God's gracious visits. Angels come to Joseph in Egypt, to Ezekiel in Babylon, and to John in Patmos. They are dead which sought the young Child's life. They are dead, but the young Child lives. Persecuted saints sometimes live to tread on the graves of their persecutors. Thus did the church's King the conveniences: Egypt, or the difficulties of the journey, it being, as is thought, the beginning of winter when Herod died. God's people follow his direction, whithersoever He leads them, wherever He lodges them. Did we look upon the world as our Egypt, a place of bondage and banishment, and heaven only as our Canaan, we should as readily arise, and depart thither, when called for, as Joseph did out of Egypt.

3. God reveals his mind to his people by degrees, to keep them still waiting on Him, and expecting to hear further from Him. Joseph received his orders in a dream, probably as before, through the ministration of an angel. God could have signified his will by the Child Jesus, but we do not find that the Child had any thing to do with these events. In all things it behoved Him to be made like his brethren; he is a child, He spake as a child, and did as a child; and drew a veil over his infinite knowledge and power; as a child He increased in wisdom.

Joseph might think that Jesus, being born in Bethlehem, must be brought up there. Yet he is prudently afraid, for he hears that Archelaus reigns in Herod's stead, not over all the kingdom, as his father did, but only over Judea, the other provinces being in other hands. See, then, if one enemy of Christ and his church drops off, another presently appears, to keep up the old enmity. Joseph must, therefore, not take the young Child into Judea. Note, God will not thrust his children into danger, but when necessary for his glory and their trial, Precious in the sight of the Lord are the life and death of his saints; precious is their blood to Him.

The family settle in Galilee, where Philip, a mild man, ruled. Note, Providence so orders it commonly, that his people shall not want a quiet retreat from the storm. When one climate becomes too hot, another shall be kept cool. Galilee was far north; Samaria between it and Judea; thither they were sent, to Nazareth, a city upon a hill, in the centre of the lot of Zebulun. There the mother of our Lord lived, when she conceived that holy thing; and probably Joseph lived there too, Luke 1:26, 27. Thither they were sent, there they were well known, and there was the most proper place for them, among their relations. Thence our Savior was called Jesus of Nazareth, which was to the Jews a stumbling block, for, can any good thing come out of Nazareth? In this is said to be fulfilled what was spoken by the prophets, He shall be called a Nazarene. This may be regarded,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 16—23. We can assign no limits to the wickedness of the human heart, when furious passions and great authority combine; and when sinners are callous, by habit, and daring, y^e impunity in atrocious crimes. The near approach of death, instead of weakening the ambition, malice, or cruelty of such men, hurries them, apparently, to seize the fleeting moment for perpetrating their enormities, as if afraid of not treasuring up wrath enough; or as if they would set death, and even God Himself at defiance! No wonder, then, they are unmoved with compassion for bleeding infants, and inconsolable parents, and seem to delight in 'lamentation, weeping, and great mourning,' occasioned by their cruelties; yet are they more wretched by their own vile passions, than they can render others.—From such scenes let us avert our eyes, to contemplate the reception which the Lord of glory met, when He condescended to 'visit His in great humility,' and from his early persecutions learn what usage we must expect, if we are children of God, in this world which lieth in wickedness; and at what price all our hopes and comforts were purchased for us by our Surety. As the early honors He received proved an occasion of peril and fatigue; so those who belong to Him cannot reasonably expect honor from God, without meeting trouble and contempt from men. Let it suffice us to be as our Master, hoping to have the promises of Scripture fulfilled to us, as the prophecies were in Him. But we must not expect uniform comfort from ever dear relations; as our children are far more frequently the occasion of care and distress, than of abiding satisfaction: yet we should not 'refuse to be comforted,' when they are taken from us. For though they die, as sinners, according to the righteous sentence of God, and not in the peculiar circumstances of these infants, martyrs, as they may be termed, for Christ; yet we may comfortably conclude, that when they cease to be with us on earth, they are only gone before us to heaven, through 'the second Adam,' the Lord of life and salvation.—We must expect to share 'the reproach of Christ,' and to be branded with some opprobrium for his sake: yet, if this be because we are consecrated to God through Him, and copy his example of truth and righteousness, we may glory in the distinction; assured that 'as we suffer with Him, we shall also be glorified together.'

SCOTT.

Verses 19—23.

Joseph, informed by an angel in a dream that Herod and Antipater were dead, and being admonished to return, came immediately into the land of Judah: but finding that Archelaus, the son of Herod, who 'in the very beginning of his reign massacred three thousand Jews at once in the temple, and was afterwards, in the tenth year of his government, banished by Augustus,' Doddridge had obtained from the Romans that part of the country in which Bethlehem was situated, and perhaps learning his jealous, cruel disposition, he was afraid to settle there. Hence he fixed his residence at Nazareth, where, as we find from the evangelist, Luke, he had formerly dwelt. Scott. 'Being thus returned to his own city, Jesus was there brought up and educated in a place so very contemptible among the Jews, that it was grown into a proverb with them, That no good thing could be expected thence; John 1:42 7, 59' so that 'y^e his way was further opened by the 'providence of God, that [there] might be fulfilled what had been spoken in effect by many of the prophets, "He shall be called a Nazarean," that is, he shall appear in mean and despicable circumstances, and be treated as the mark of public contempt and reproach.'—'If this solution be not allowed, I must acquiesce in Chrysostom's opinion, that the passage referred to is lost: [which supposition, however, is rejected as erroneous by Rosenmüller, who considers the evangelist as referring to passages like Ps. 22. Isa. 52. 63.] for it is very unnatural to explain this text by Samsu's being appointed a Nazarene, Judg. 13. 5. of the Messiah's being spoken of as the branch, [meszar,] Isa. 11: 1. or, as Wisdom, by God's being called [meszar] the preserver of men, Job 7: 20. The joint sense of many Scriptures is similarly referred to, John 7: 38, and James 4: 5. And that the Messiah should be treated in a very contemptuous manner, was foretold by David, Ps. 22. 6, &c. 69. 9. b. by Isaiah, ch. 52. 12 and by Zechariah, ch. 11: 12, 13.'

In those days, after what was recorded in the last chapter; in the time appointed of the Father, for the beginning of the Gospel; the fulness of time, often mentioned in the Old Testament. Now the latter half of the last week of Daniel began, when the Messiah was to confirm the covenant with many, Dan. 9: 27. Christ's appearances are all in their season. The glorious things, spoken of John and Jesus, before and at their birth, would have led us to expect some extraordinary tokens of the divine presence with them while very young. But nothing uncommon appears in regard to either, (except Christ's disputing with the doctors in the temple,) until they were thirty years of age. The greatest part of their life is wrapped in obscurity. In outward appearance they differed little from other children, as the heir, while under age, differs nothing from the servant, though he be lord of all. This shews that even when God is acting as the God of Israel, the Savior, He is verily a God that hideth Himself, Isa. 45: 15. The Lord is in this place, and I knew it not. Gen. 28: 15. Our beloved stands behind the wall long, before He looks forth at the

John entered on his public ministry, as some think, about his thirtieth year; but such as assign a longer time for his ministry before the baptism of Jesus, must conclude that he began to preach at an earlier period; for Jesus, who was born but six months after him, was baptized when thirty years old. The mortified spirit and conduct of John, who, in retirement and by contemplation, doubtless, had attained uncommon degrees to the work of a holy fortitude, zeal, humility, and devotedness to God, were peculiarly suited to that severe ministry of the law, and God of humbling reformation, by which he was to prepare the Jews for receiving their expected Messiah. But, as a priest, and son of one so distinguished as Zechariah, his birth miraculous and greatly noticed, and himself a person so excellent and remarkable; he could not be very obscure in his retirement. Probably, his reputation was considerable before he entered on his public work, and this conduced to his popularity. He was called the Baptist, or Baptizer, because he admitted the Jews into the number of his disciples by the external rite of baptism, as a sign of profession of repentance. His ministry was not at Jerusalem, but in the wilderness, or less populous parts of the country. He came down as a herald, the first approach of the Messiah, to preach, or proclaiming as a herald, the near approach of the Messiah, their expected King. "By those days," says Beza, "he meant, while Jesus yet remained in private at Nazareth." SCOTT. "After the history of the nativity and infancy of Christ, follows now the second part of the Gospel, containing an account of the words and actions of John, and of Jesus preparatory to his public appearance as the Messiah, ch. 3: 4-11." ROSEN. "This phrase, in those days, is the same with in those years. It is an ordinary thing in the Hebrew, to confound the words signifying a day and a year; and the Greeks did the same, as appears by the Seventy interpreters, 1 Sam. 1: 3, 7." POOLE. "The ministry was short, says Dr. A. Clarke; 'for, he appears to have been put to death in the 27th year of the Christian era.'" E. V. 2.

The Jews, thinking the blessings of the Messiah's kingdom their own exclusively, and expecting temporal deliverance from the Romans, with victory, prosperity, and pre-eminence, were disposed to prepare for his coming by levying armies and making insurrections. But John simply preached 'Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand;' which, doubtless, he enlarged on, explained, and applied to his hearers. The kingdom of heaven signifies the gospel dispensation; so called, because the God of heaven then began to set up that kingdom, which will fill length all the earth. (Marg. Ref.—Notes Dan. 2: 34, 35, 44, 45. 7: 9-14.) It is set up in opposition to the power of the devil, 'the god,' and 'prince of this world;' and in the person of Christ, the Son of God, manifested to destroy the works of the devil. Sinners enter it [14] windows. Cant. 2: 9. It shows also, that faith must have an eye principally to Christ his office and undertaking, for there is the display, while in his person is the hid-eg, of a power. All this while, Christ was God-mag yet we are not told what He said or did, till He appeared as a Prophet; and then, hear ye Him. Young men, though well qualified, should, as we forbear, to put themselves into public service but be humble and self-diffident, swift to hear, and slow to speak. Matthew says nothing of the conception and birth of John, but finds him at full age, as if dropped from the clouds, to preach in the wilderness. For above three hundred years, the church had been without prophets; those lights had been long put out, that He might be more desired, who was to be the great Prophet. From Malachi to John there had been no pretender to prophecy. To John, therefore, Malachi points more directly than any of the Old Testament prophets, Mal. 3: 1. Behold, I send my messenger.

2. John did not appear in an uninhabited desert, though it be called a wilderness; but in a part of the country thinly peopled, not so much inclosed and cultivated as cities and towns. It was like the six cities and their villages mentioned Josh. 15: 61, 62. John preached in the cities and villages near his birth place, Hebron. His active life began where he had spent his time in contemplation; yet still he showed how well he loved retirement, as far as would consist with his business. The word of the Lord found him in a wilderness. Note, Commonly the sweetest intercourse the saints have with Heaven is when they are farthest from the noise of this world. In a wilderness, the law was given, and as the Old Testament so the New Testament Israel, was first found in a desert land, and there God led him about, and instructed him. Deut. 32: 10. John Baptist was a priest of the order of Aaron, yet we find him preaching in a wilderness, not officiating in the temple; but Christ, who was not a son of Aaron, is often found in the temple, sitting there as one having authority. So it was foretold, Mal. 3: 1. The Lord, whom ye seek, shall suddenly come to his temple; not the messenger, who was to prepare his way. This intimated that the priesthood of Christ was to thrust out that of Aaron, and drive it into a wilderness. The by faith in Christ: then, their rebellions being pardoned, they return to their allegiance, are willing subjects, and enjoy all the immunities and privileges of the kingdom. These are all of a heavenly nature; they come from heaven, prepare the soul for heaven, and at length issue in the felicity of heaven; which sometimes also is meant by 'the kingdom of heaven.' 'It is plain that the Jews understood it of a temporal monarchy, which God would erect, the seat of it Jerusalem, the capital of the world instead of Rome; and the expected Sovereign of this kingdom, whom they learned from Daniel to call the Son of men; understanding by it the promised Messiah, or Christ, or Anointed One of God. Both John the Baptist, then, and Christ, used this phrase—and gradually taught the Jews to affix right ideas to it, a lesson they were remarkably unwilling to learn. This very demand of repentance shewed, that 'it was a spiritual kingdom; and that no wicked man, how politic or brave, how learned or renowned soever, could possibly be a member of it.' DOUGL. This 'kingdom of heaven,' a term peculiar to Matthew, to which, however, 'the kingdom of God,' in other parts of the New Testament, appears synonymous, was at hand. The King was about to appear, to collect followers, finish his work, ascend his throne, and abrogate the legal dispensation, terminate the national covenant of Israel, admit the Gentiles into the church, and introduce the dispensation of Christianity. If the Jews, then, meant to share its blessings, they must prepare for them by repentance; trust no longer in outward distinctions; but, comparing their temper and conduct with the law of God, must judge and condemn themselves, be sorry and humbled for their sins, and turn from them all to the love and service of God.—This word rendered 'repentance' implies a total revolution in the mind, a change in the judgement, dispositions and affections, another and better bias to the soul. Without it, the people could neither understand the nature of the kingdom of heaven, welcome Christ, become his subjects, nor desire his salvation. SCOTT. Repent ye. 'A doctrine must fit for the gospel, and most suitable to the time, and a word or phrase agreeable to the doctrine. A nation, leavened with the error of the Pharisees concerning justification by the works of the law, was necessarily to be called off to the contrary doctrine of repentance, or could not receive the Gospel.'—And, 'however the schools of the Pharisees had ill defined repentance,—in which, 'for the most part, it was thought to consist in the confession of the mouth only; yet they asserted that repentance itself was necessary to the reception of the Messiah.' It is worthy of observing, also, that John said not 'Repent and believe the Gospel,' which our Savior did, ch. 4: 17. yet John preached the Gospel, Mark 1: 2. John 1: 7-9, for his office, chiefly was to make Christ known, who, when he should come, was to be the great Prophet of the Gospel.

3 For this is he that was spoken of by the prophet Esaias, saying, The voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths straight.

4 And the same John had this raiment of camel's hair, and a leathern girdle about his loins; and his

but must do it in repentance. His business was to call men to repent of their sins. Bethink yourselves; as the original implies. Admit a second thought, to correct the errors of the first. Change your minds. Ye have thought amiss, now think aright. Note, True penitents have other thoughts of God and Christ, sin and holiness, this world and the other, than they have had. This change of the mind, produces a change of the way. Those who are truly sorry for what they have done, will be careful not to do so more. This repentance is a necessary duty, in obedience to the command of God, Acts 17:30, and a necessary qualification for the comforts of the Gospel. If man's heart had continued upright, divine consolations might have been received without this painful operation preceding; but being sinful, it must first be pained, before it can be laid at ease. The sore must be searched, or it cannot be cured. I wound and I heal.

The kingdom of heaven is at hand. The ancient prophets called people to repent for the obtaining and securing of temporal blessings, and for preventing and removing temporal national judgments. But now, though the duty is the same, the reason is new, and purely evangelical. Men are now considered personally, not so much in a social or political capacity. Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand; the Gospel dispensation of the covenant of grace, the opening of the kingdom to all believers, by the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ. It is a kingdom of which Christ is the sovereign, and we must be the willing, loyal subjects of it. It is a kingdom of heaven, not of this world, a spiritual kingdom: its original from heaven, its tendency to heaven. John preached this kingdom as at hand; to us it is come by the pouring out of the Spirit, and the full exhibition of Gospel grace. This is a great inducement to repent. There is nothing like the consideration of divine grace to break the heart, both for sin, and from sin. Evangelical repentance flows from a sight of Christ, from a sense of his love, and the hopes of pardon and forgiveness through Him. Kindness in conquering; abused kindness, humbling and melting. What a wretch was I to sin against such grace, against the law and love of such a kingdom! It is a great encouragement to repent. Return to God in a way of duty, and He will, through Christ, return to you in a way of mercy. The proclamation of pardon discovers and fetches in the malefactor, who before fled and absconded. Thus are we drawn to it with the cords of a man, and the bands of love.

4. The prophecies respecting John, as Isa. 40:3, 4, the voice of one crying in the wilderness. John owned it, John 1:23. I am the voice, and that is all. God is the speaker, who makes known his mind by John, as a man does by his voice. The word of God must be received as such. 1 Thess. 2:13. What is Paul or Apollos but the voice? John is called the voice of one crying aloud, which is startling and awakening. Christ is called the Word, which, being distinct and articulate, is more instructive. John, as the voice, roused men. Then Christ, as the Word, instructed them. Rev. 14:2. The voice of many waters, and of a great thunder, made way for the melodious voice of harpers, and the new song, v. 3. Some observe that, as Samson's mother must drink no strong drink, yet he was designed to be a strong man; so John Baptist's father was struck dumb, and yet he was designed to be the voice of one crying. When the crier's voice is begotten of a dumb father, it shows the excellency of the power to be of God, and not of man. John was Christ's harbinger and forerunner. It was said of him, before he was born, that he should make ready a people prepared for the Lord, Luke 1:17. He intimated the nature of Christ's kingdom, for he came not in the gaudy dress of a herald at arms, but in the homely one of a hermit. Officers are sent before great men to clear the way; so John prepares the way of the Lord. In the Jewish nation, at that time, all was out of course. The vitals of religion were eaten out by the traditions of the elders. The scribes and Pharisees, that is, the greatest hypocrites in the world, had the key of knowledge and of government at their girdle. The people, in general, were very proud of their privileges, confident of justification by their own righteousness, insensible of sin; and though now under the most humbling providences, being lately made a province of the Roman empire, were yet unhumiliated. They were, as in Malachi's time, insolent and haughty, and ready to contradict the word of God. John was sent to level these mountains, to take down their high opinion of themselves, and to show them their sins, that the knowledge of Christ might be more acceptable and effectual. This doctrine is still as necessary as then. Note, There is a great deal to be done, to make way for Christ into a soul, to bow the heart for the reception of the Son of David. There must be a discovery of sin, and a conviction of the insufficiency of our own righteousness; prejudices must be removed, high thoughts brought down, and rendered obedient to Christ. Bars of iron must be shattered, ere the everlasting doors be opened for the King of glory to come in. The law of sin and Satan is a crooked way; the law must be made straight. Heb. 12:13.

5. They, who expected the Messiah, as a temporal prince, would think that his forerunner must come in great splendor; but though great in the sight of the Lord, he was mean in the eyes of the world; and, as Christ himself, having no form nor comeliness; to intimate betimes, that the glory of Christ's kingdom was to be spiritual, and its subjects, ordinarily, poor and despised. John did not go in long clothing, as the Scribes, or soft clothing, as the courtiers,

V. 3.

The ministry of John fulfilled a prophecy already considered. (Note, Isa. 40:3-5.) He was 'a voice,' that conveys the mind of the speaker, and then vanishes: he declared the mind of God concerning his Son, and ended his short ministry. He proclaimed Christ, as the Son of God, the King of Israel, and the Savior of the world. (Notes, John 1:29-34. 3:27-36.) and thus prepared the way of JEMOAH, for so is the word in Isaiah, and made his paths straight. 'The idea is taken,' observes Dr. A. Clarke, 'from the practice of eastern monarchs, who, whenever they entered upon an expedition, or took a journey through a desert country, sent harbingers before them, to prepare all things for their passage; and pioneers to open the passes, level the ways, and remove all impediments.' So John's preaching, by humbling the proud, detecting hypocrites, counteracting the prejudices of the people, rectifying their judgment, and raising them, from low and grovelling pursuits, to aspire after things truly great and excellent, prepared the way for the reception of Christ. 'Make straight the paths of our God,' says the Sept. Scotts. The prophecy here fulfilled is of the kind termed 'typical'; as it is first related to the liberation of the Jews, by Cyrus, from the Babylonish captivity, and then to the deliverance of the church, by Christ, from the thralldom of Satan. For, it would have been preposterous in the prophet to promise deliverance to far distant generations, as a consolation to the afflicted soon after the times of Hezekiah; although the fulfilment of the one by no means precludes that of the other, which is, indeed, the foundation of all deliverances.

Verse 4.

This extraordinary man, who was 'great in the sight of the Lord,' was very homely in his attire, wearing a coarse and rough garment, (Note, 2 Kings 1:8.) wrought in a rude manner, and girted about him with a piece of undressed leather, and frugal in his diet; faring as a poor person, desiring neither abundance nor delicacies; (his food consisting, that is, frequently, of locusts, allowed as clean by the law, (Marg. Ref.) and the honey made by bees in the uncultivated lands) taking any thing that came to hand in his retirement, to satisfy his wants, and in important matters of a more important, spiritual nature. As he could live on little, and was inured to hardship, he was independent of the rich and great, and might more plainly reprove them: a circumstance not without effect in forming other parts of his character. SCOTT. Chardin states that garments of camels' hair are worn by the modern dervishes; a coarse cloth being made of it in the east, and used for manufacturing the coats of shepherds and camels-drivers, and also to cover tents. John, doubtless, wore this kind, and was thus distinguished from those residents in palaces, who wore soft raiment. CALMET. There has been, from an early period, a diversity of opinion with respect to the sustenance of the Baptist. Our countryman, the learned author of 'The Natural History of the Bible,' does not admit that insect-food is here meant, though 'locusts were eaten in the east,' since 'previous dress, &c.' is needed—which does not seem an employment worthy of one, whom the Scripture represents as sufficiently occupied in devout meditation, and therefore would have buds and pods of trees, which the original may signify, intended; but says Prof. PAXTON, 'however disgusting that kind of meat may appear to us, the orientals entertain a different opinion.' 'A monk, who had travelled into Egypt, asserts, that in the country they subsisted on them four months in the year. In feeding on that insect, the Baptist submitted to no uncommon privation, and practised no savage rigor, like many hermits who inhabit deserts; but merely followed the abstemious mode of living, to which the people were accustomed, in the less frequented parts of the country. His food appears particularly mentioned to show, that he fared as the poorest of men, in a manner corresponding with the meanness of his dress.' MORIER is quoted as saying that in Bussire locusts are

finds with his loins girt, Luke 12: 35. 1 Pet. 1: 13. His diet was plain. It was locusts and wild honey; not as if he never ate anything else, but these he frequently fed upon, when he retired into solitary places. Locusts were a sort of flying insect, very good for food, and allowed as clean, Lev. 11: 22. They required little dressing, were light and easy of digestion; whence it is reckoned among the infirmities of old age, that the grasshopper or locust is then a burden to the stomach, Eccl. 12: 5. Wild honey was that which Canaan flowed with, 1 Sam. 14: 26. Either it was gathered immediately as it fell in the dew, or rather, as it was found in the hollows of trees and rocks, where bees built, that were not, like those in hives, under the care of men. This intimates that a little served his turn; a man would be long ere he filled his belly with locusts and wild honey. John came neither eating nor drinking, ch. 11: 18. not with the delicacy and formality of others. He could seldom find time for a set meal. Now this agreed with the doctrine he preached, repentance, and fruits meet for repentance. Note, Those who call others to repentance, should themselves live a life of seriousness and mortification. John thus showed his deep sense of the badness of the times, in which he lived, and of the need of repentance. Every day was a fast day to him. This agreed with his office as Christ's forerunner. He showed that he had experienced the powers of the kingdom of heaven. Note, Those who know spiritual pleasures, cannot but look upon the delights of sense with a holy indifference. By giving others this example, he made way for Christ. A conviction of the vanity of the world; is the best preparative for the entertainment of the kingdom of heaven in the heart. Blessed are the poor in spirit.

6. Great multitudes came to him from the city, and from all parts of the country; some of all sorts, men and women, young and old, rich and poor, Pharisees and publicans. They went out to hear of him, what they had heard so much about. This was a great honor put upon John. Note, Frequently those have most real honor, who least court the shadow of it. Those who live a mortified life, command respect. Men have a secret reverence for them, more than we imagine. This gave John a great opportunity to do good, and showed that God was with him. Now people begin to press into the kingdom of heaven. Luke 16: 16. A blessed sight it was to see the net cast where were so many fish. It showed that it was now a time of great expectation. It was generally thought the kingdom of God would soon appear; Luke 19: 11. therefore, when John lived and preached at this rate, so very different from the Scribes and Pharisees, they were ready to say of him, that he was the Christ. Luke 3: 15. This occasioned the crowd. Those who would have the benefit of his ministry, must go out to him in the wilderness, sharing his reproach. Note, They who truly desire the sincere milk of the word, if it be not brought to them, will seek it. They who would learn the doctrine of repentance, must go out from the hurry of this world. It appears that of the many who came to John's baptism, there were but few that adhered to it; witness the cold reception that Christ had. Note, There may be many forward hearers, where there are but few true believers. Curiosity may bring many to attend upon good preaching, and to be affected with it for a while, who yet are never subject to the power of it. Ezek. 33: 31, 32.

John's disciples were baptized of him in Jordan, thus professing their repentance, and belief that the kingdom of heaven was at hand. They confessed their sins; a general confession, it is probable, they made to John, that they were polluted by sin, and needed cleansing; but to God a confession of particular sins, for He is the party offended. The Jews had been taught to justify themselves; but John teaches them to accuse themselves, and not to rest in the general confession of sin made for all Israel, once a year, upon the day of atonement; but to make a particular acknowledgement, every one of the plague of his own heart. Note, A penitent confession of sin is required, in order to peace and pardon. Those only are ready to receive Christ as their Righteousness, who are brought with shame to own their guilt, 1 John 1: 8. The benefits of the kingdom of heaven, now at hand, were thereupon sealed to them by baptism. He washed them with water, to show that from all their iniquities God would cleanse them. It was usual with the Jews to baptize those whom they admitted proselytes to their used as food by the lowest peasantry. Burckhardt also mentions that the Bedouins eat them entire. After many similar statements, the American editor of Calmet observes, 'there can surely be no difficulty in admitting locusts to have been

Verses 5, 6.

Through a divine influence on their minds, multitudes resorted to John, from all parts of Judea, and from Jerusalem, so that city and country, as it were, went out to him; specially the inhabitants of those regions which lay on each side of the Jordan, where, after a time, he commonly exercised his ministry. His celebrity at length drew the Jews of all ranks and parties to him; and when they were brought to confess their sins, profess repentance, a purpose of submitting to the Messiah who was at hand, and leading a new life, they were baptized by John, in or at the river Jordan. The law of Moses prescribed 'divers washings,' or baptisms, in which water was variously used, as an emblem of the purging of the soul from the pollution of sin, in order that the priests or people might attend acceptably on the service of God. (Note, Heb. 9: 8-10.) By degrees it became customary in the Jewish church to baptize those, who were proselyted to their religion from the Gentiles, both male and female, as well as to circumcise the males, denoting that they deemed them unclean in themselves, and not meet to join the congregation of the Lord, till they were washed from the filthiness of their gentile state. The prophets also often alluded to this emblem of the soul's being cleansed from sin; and some passages of the

New Testament intimate, that both the cleansing from guilt by the blood, and from pollution by the Spirit of Christ, were comprised under this outward sign; yet is the latter more generally intended. (Marg. Ref. n. o.) Baptism had been before in use, but John was singular in baptizing all his disciples, though Jews, and without distinction of previous character, intimating that by nature and practice they were all polluted, and could not be admitted among the true people of God, except washed from their sins in the fountain about to be opened by the Messiah. He had express divine direction for this: (John 1: 33.) but, though his use of baptism was introductory to the appointment of that ordinance to be the initiatory sacrament and seal of the new dispensation, as circumcision had been of the old; yet we should not consider it as the same with Christian baptism; but rather as an institution for the time being, introductory to the change which was gradually to take place, when the old dispensation should be abrogated, and the new established. Baptism, as used by John, was not to supersede circumcision; for it seems he baptized none but circumcised persons, except women, as appears highly probable, though not mentioned. We cannot suppose he 'baptized in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost,' or that Jesus was thus baptized; nay, the contrary is clear: (Notes, Acts 19: 1-6.) and probably Christ's disciples did not use that peculiar form of Christian baptism before his ascension.—Some, at least, whom John baptized, received Christian baptism also, when admitted into the Christian church; for, doubtless, several who heard Peter on the day of Pentecost had been John's disciples; yet he exhorted them all to be baptized in the name of the Lord (Acts 2: 38-41.) John's baptism and Christian baptism were not, then, exactly the same, and inferences from one respecting the other are inconclusive. Adults only, it appears, were baptized by John, circumcision continuing still the initiatory ordinance, and seal of the covenant. Hence we never read that he baptized households, as did the apostles.—Water was the outward sign; but whether administered by immersion or not, is incapable of decisive proof. The use of it is essential, because water is the universal purifier; the quantity and mode of application circumstantial, varying as occasion may require. The inward, spiritual signification is the same as that of circumcision, that is, regeneration and sanctification by the cleansing power of the Holy Spirit. Some contend zealously that baptism always signifies immersion; but the use of the words baptize and baptism, in the New Testament, 20: 23. 23. Mark 7: 4. 10: 38, 39. Luke 3: 16. 11: 36. 14: 35. Acts 1: 5.

Sadducees come about him, he found it necessary to deal more closely. These were two of the three noted sects among the Jews; the third was the Essenes, not mentioned in the Gospels, for they lived in retirement. The Pharisees were zealous for ceremonies, for the power of the church, and the traditions of the elders. The Sadducees ran to the other extreme, and were little better than deists, denying the existence of spirits and a future state. It was strange that they came to John's baptism, but their curiosity brought them; some of them probably submitted to be baptized, but the generality did not; for Christ says, (Luke 7: 29, 30.) that when the publicans justified God, and were baptized of John; the Pharisees and lawyers rejected the counsel of God against themselves, being not baptized of him. Note, Many come to ordi-religion, especially proselytes of the gate, who were not circumcised, as the proselytes of righteousness were. Some think it was also a custom for leaders, of religious character, to admit disciples by baptism. Christ's question concerning John's baptism, Was it from heaven, or of men? implied that there were baptisms of men, who pretended not to a divine mission; with this usage John complied, but his was from heaven, and it was distinguished from all others, in that it was the baptism of repentance, Acts 19: 4. All Israel were baptized unto Moses, 1 Cor. 10: 2. The ceremonial law consisted in divers washings or baptisms; (Heb. 9: 10.) but John's baptism refers to the remedial law, the law of repentance and faith. It was in Jordan, that river which was famous for Israel's passage through it, and Naaman's cure; yet, probably, John did not baptize in that river at first, but afterwards, when the people who came to his baptism were numerous, removed to Jordan. By baptism he obliged them to live a holy life, according to their profession. Note, Confession of sin must be accompanied with holy resolutions, in the strength of divine grace, not to return to it.

V. 7-12. Application is the life of preaching; so it was with John's preaching. Observe, To the people generally, he thought it enough to say, Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand; when he saw the Pharisees and Sadducees come about him, he found it necessary to deal more closely. These were two of the three noted sects among the Jews; the third was the Essenes, not mentioned in the Gospels, for they lived in retirement. The Pharisees were zealous for ceremonies, for the power of the church, and the traditions of the elders. The Sadducees ran to the other extreme, and were little better than deists, denying the existence of spirits and a future state. It was strange that they came to John's baptism, but their curiosity brought them; some of them probably submitted to be baptized, but the generality did not; for Christ says, (Luke 7: 29, 30.) that when the publicans justified God, and were baptized of John; the Pharisees and lawyers rejected the counsel of God against themselves, being not baptized of him. Note, Many come to ordinances, who feel not the power of them. Now to them John speaks with all faithfulness, and what he said to them, he said to the multitude (Luke 3: 7.) for they were all concerned. His application was plain, home, and to the conscience. He did not simply preach before them, but to them. Though his education was private, he was not bashful in public, nor did he fear the face of man; for he was full of the Holy Ghost and of power.

1. The title which he gives them is not one of honor; but he begins harshly, O generation of vipers! Christ gives them the same, ch. 12: 34. 23: 33. They were as vipers, though specious, yet venomous; full of enmity to every thing good. They were a viperous brood, the offspring of those that had the same spirit. They gloried in being the children of Abraham; but John showed them that they were of their father the devil. (Gen. 3: 15. John 9: 44.) They were all alike, though enemies to one another; they were confederate in mischief. Note, A wicked generation is a generation of vipers, and they ought to be told so. It becomes ministers of Christ boldly to show sinners their true character. Who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come? This shows that they were in danger of the wrath to come, and their case so nearly desperate, (the Pharisees by their parade of religion, and the Sadducees by their arguments against it,) that it was next to a miracle to do them any good. What brought you hither; what fright has led you to inquire for the kingdom of heaven? Note, There is a wrath to come; besides present wrath, there is future, the stores of which are treasured up for hereafter. It is the great concern of every one of us, to flee from that wrath. It is wonderful mercy that we are fairly warned; think, Who hath warned us? God, who delights not in our ruin; He warns by the written Word, by ministers, by conscience. These

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-6. The most eminent and useful servants of God often grow up and minister in retired situations; but, wherever stationed, He will bring those to attend on them whom He purposes to save by their labors: and can convene multitudes in the desert, as easily as in populous cities.—The world at large is 'the kingdom of the wicked one,' except as some are translated, by the grace of God, 'from the power of darkness into the kingdom of his dear Son.' These will soon be received into the realms of felicity, where their King now reigns in glory; but those who remain strangers or enemies to this deliverance, and consequently subjects of Satan, will have their portion with their prince, in the region of darkness and despair. This kingdom of God and heaven is 'come nigh to us;' but it must be in our hearts; nor can we understand its nature, excellency and glory, except we be broken in spirit with godly sorrow, humbled in repentance, taught to hate sin, and are longing for deliverance from its pollution as well as punishment. Preachers of salvation, therefore, must introduce their message of plenteous redemption by 'the ministration of condemnation,' shewing sinners the nature and necessity of 'repentance, and works meet for repentance.' Thus prophets and apostles; as well as John the Baptist, 'prepared the way of the Lord,' and led sinners to welcome his salvation and submit to his authority. Thus even the King of glory, when He humbled himself to be a 'Preacher of righteousness,' prepared the way for rendering Himself precious to the hearts of his hearers. Deviations, then, from this good old way will not be found improvements on it; and if repentance were more clearly preached, 'The Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world,' would not so often be pointed out in vain, nor would men so much neglect or pervert the Gospel.—They who preach repentance, mortification, and the renunciation of worldly interests and indulgences, will commonly succeed in proportion as they exemplify their own doctrine. If they seem nearly as much alive to the pursuit of wealth, or as desirous of the pleasures and decorations of life, as others, their declamations will have little influence. Nor can ministers in general be sufficiently independent to be faithful to all, and in all cases, except they learn to be content with slender accommodations, and frugal in expense. Indeed, it is no disgrace, but an honor, to the servant of God, to appear, and be willing to be, poor, in attire, table, furniture, and all belonging to him. External appendages may be needful to preserve from neglect and contempt those who have not superior wisdom or piety; but 'the man of God,' who is devoted to Him, and 'furnished for every good work,' has a more valuable distinction, and needs them not.—How small a portion of those, who attend the most faithful preachers, become true disciples of Christ! Novelty attracts many; some go because others do; and many are brought under transient convictions. They attend divine ordinances, confess their sins, and seem to be disciples; but having neither true repentance, nor the living faith of real Christians, in time of temptation they fall away.

SCOTT

Heb. 9: 10.) cannot accord with this exclusive interpretation. On the other hand, some, arguing perhaps too much from modern habits, have been sufficiently decided for the opposite interpretation. Vastly too much eagerness and acrimony have been employed in disputes on the subject, and far too little attention given to the instruction suggested by this ordinance. SCOTT. Such are the views of pedobaptists generally, but on the mode of baptism different sentiments are expressed by Campbell; and, more at large, with a valuable exemplification in passages from the Scriptures and several of the classics, by Prof. Stuart, Bibl. Repos. Ed. 'The warmest advocates for immersion, who are themselves partakers of the baptism of the Spirit, will confess that 'the outward sign, void of the inward effect, is nothing worth. And 'they who contend for infant baptism, if they know any thing of the Lord, must as readily allow, that nothing, short of the regeneration of the heart, can be profitable before God.'

HAWKER.

Verses 7-10.

Of the sect of the Pharisees, which professed the greatest strictness, were the most reputable of the Jewish scribes and elders. Some of them appear decent formalists of moral character, but inflated with spiritual pride. They dealt largely in ostentatious austerities and mortifications. Others of them were detestable hypocrites, making their reputation for sanctity a cloak of exorbitant avarice, and the occasion for oppression and iniquity.—The Sadducees, the scornful infidels of the time, professed to receive some parts of the sacred writings, and to reject others; but paid no proper regard to any of them. Some of them, at least, seem to have been mere philosophizing atheists; and the rest sceptics, who treated every thing relating to God and eternity as doubtful and disputable; consequently, with contemptuous indifference. Considering the rewards promised in the law as referring but to this world, they counted prosperity a proof of the divine favor, and poverty or distress an evidence of a man's being accursed of God; thus, to relieve the indigent and miserable was an attempt to counteract Him, and therefore sinful. A convenient opinion for a hard, selfish heart!—Whether transient convictions, or a regard to reputation, brought these Pharisees and Sadducees to desire John's baptism, is not clear; but evidently, they came with wrong views and feelings. The Sadducees were as proud of their superior discernment, as the Pharisees of their superior sanctity, and with as little reason. Instead, then, of sanctifying their characters or courting their favor, John addressed them plainly, and even roughly, as a race of subtle, designing men, of poisonous principles and practice, i.e. genuine children of the old serpent. (Marg. Ref. 6.) No doubt they deserved the coming wrath of God, but it is not his wheat, and not a grain of ripe fruits were gathered in. In heaven, the saints are separated from corrupt neighbors without, and corrupt affections within. They are not only gathered into the barn, (ch. 12:30,) but into the garner, thoroughly purified. Hell is the unquenchable fire, which will burn up the chaff, and will certainly be the portion, punishment, and everlasting destruction of hypocrites and unbelievers. So that here life and death, good and evil, are set before us; according as we are now in the field, we shall then be in the floor.

V. 13-17. Our Savior, from his childhood, had lain hid in Galilee, as it were, buried alive; but now, after a long and dark night, behold, the Sun of righteousness rises in glory. The fulness of time was come, that Christ should enter upon his prophetic office; and He chooses as with fire; the seven spirits of God appear as seven lamps of fire, Rev. 4:5. Is fire enlightening? So the Spirit is a spirit of illumination. Is it warming? And do not their hearts burn within them? Is it consuming? And does not the spirit of judgment, as a spirit of burning, consume the dross of their corruptions? Does fire make all it seizes like itself? And does it move upwards? So does the Spirit make the soul holy like itself, and its tendency is heavenward. Christ says, I am come to send fire, Luke 12:49.

Whose fan is in his hand. His ability and authority to distinguish, as the Person to whom all judgment is committed, is the fan in his hand, Jer. 15:7. Now He sits as a Refiner. Observe, the visible church is Christ's floor: O my threshing, and the corn of my floor, Isa. 21:10. The temple, a type of the church, was built upon a threshing-floor. In this floor there is a mixture of wheat and chaff. True believers are as wheat, substantial and valuable; hypocrites are as chaff, light and useless, carried about with every wind. Good and bad are now mingled together in the same external communion, but there is a day coming, when the floor shall be purged, and the wheat and chaff shall be separated. Something of this kind is often done in this world, when God calls his people out of Babylon, Rev. 18:4. But it is the day of the last judgment, the great winnowing day, which will infallibly determine concerning doctrines and works, (1 Cor. 3:13.) and concerning persons, (ch. 25:32, 33.) when saints and sinners shall be parted forever. Heaven is the garner into which Christ will shortly gather all it shall be lost. He will gather them as the reaper's scythe is used to gather them to their people.

In heaven, the saints are separated from corrupt neighbors without, and corrupt affections within. They are not only gathered into the barn, (ch. 12:30,) but into the garner, thoroughly purified. Hell is the unquenchable fire, which will burn up the chaff, and will certainly be the portion, punishment, and everlasting destruction of hypocrites and unbelievers. So that here life and death, good and evil, are set before us; according as we are now in the field, we shall then be in the floor.

V. 13-17. Our Savior, from his childhood, had lain hid in Galilee, as it were, buried alive; but now, after a long and dark night, behold, the Sun of righteousness rises in glory. The fulness of time was come, that Christ should enter upon his prophetic office; and He chooses

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 7-12. The servant of God must judge of the characters of men by the rule of Scripture, not by outward rank, profession, or reputation. [Happy he, who, imitating the impartiality of this faithful messenger, gives to every one "his portion of meat in due season," and abhors the thought of flattering men in their vices, or buoying them up with delusive hopes in their birth or profession, while they are destitute of real and vital religion? Dodd.] None are further from the kingdom of heaven, than formalists, proud of their own supposed goodness, and infidels, elated with an idea of their superiority to vulgar prejudices. They little suspect, that they are more the children of the wicked one, and better serve his cause, than the vilest of the profligates they disdain; or that they are likely to receive still deeper damnation. On reading such declarations, indeed, they clamor loudly of bigotry, uncharitableness, and fanaticism; yet will they find them true, except (which is not likely,) they take warning, and flee from the wrath to come; and all the miseries of death, effects of God's displeasure against the sins of men, are not worthy to be compared with this. Happy they, who flee for their lives to the Savior; for He will not reject them, whether they have heretofore been Pharisees, Sadducees, or publicans. Yet, unless we bring forth fruits meet for repentance, our profession of Christianity will not avail us. The Lord can raise up true disciples to Christ where his name has not yet been heard; and He will never spare any man who works iniquity, (nay, who does not work righteousness,) on account of his creed, sect, or forms of godliness: for 'now is the axe laid to the root of the trees; and every tree, not only which bringeth forth bad fruit, but which bringeth not forth good fruit, shall be hewn down, and cast into the fire.' But our hearts will not produce this good fruit, except the regenerating Spirit of Christ graft the good word of God on them. 'No outward forms can make us clean; no ordinances, by whomsoever administered, or in whatever mode, can supply the want of the baptism of the Holy Ghost and of fire;' this alone produces the purity of heart, and the exalted and holy affections, which uniformly accompany salvation. All professed Christians, who are destitute of this inward seal of the covenant, are but chaff amidst the wheat: and our Lord has 'his fan in his hand, and will thoroughly purge his floor.' For this, He employs various methods now; but the grand separation will be in the day of judgment, when 'He will gather the wheat into his garner, and burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire.' Scott.

John denotes a general benefit. (Marg. Ref. e-h. Note, Acts 1:4-6.)—The Savior would communicate to his disciples the divine Sanctifier, as purifying water, to wash away internal pollutions; and as refining fire, to consume their dross, kindle a holy flame of love and zeal, illuminate with heavenly wisdom, and convert their whole souls into his own pure and holy nature. At the same time, to use another emblem, He would come to his visible church, then containing a few believers and many hypocrites, as the husbandman to his heap of threshed corn—with his fan in his hand; and as the husbandman, by winnowing the heap, separates wheat and worthless chaff, so Christ, by his doctrine, the convicting Spirit, his omniscience, his providential dispensations, and at the last judgment, would separate believers and unbelievers.—The expression 'unquenchable fire,' as fully proves that the wicked will never be released from the place of torment, as 'their work that never dies' does that they will never be annihilated. (Marg. Ref. i-n. Notes, Mark 9:13-50.) Scott. Whose fan, &c. Fans, instruments used in the east for winnowing corn, are of two kinds; one a sort of fork, having teeth, with which they throw up the corn to the wind, the other may be blown away; the other formalists to produce wind when the air is calm, Isa. 30:24, Calmet. 'A winnowing shovel,' the first is called by Campbell, 'a implement very ancient, simple, and properly manual. The fan (or nan) (of the other kind) so called is more complex, contrived for raising an artificial wind, by the help of sails.' Elser notices, and it is very observable, a somewhat similar use of this image, in the explanation given by Servius of Virgil's 'mythic van' of the heathen rites; 'which rites pertained,' says he, 'to the purification of the soul, and by them men are purified, as corn by the van.' Ver. 13-15.

John having some time exercised his ministry, Jesus came to be baptized of him. Being free from sin, He could not repent; and He needed no forgiveness, regeneration, or newness of life: but He would honor baptism, as the ordinance of God, and use it as a solemn introduction to his most sacred work and offices; of which John's testimony, the descent of the Holy Spirit, and the voice from heaven, were many notifications. John, aware of his divine dignity and excellence, by immediate revelation, (Note, John 1:30-34.) hesitated to comply; declaring that he needed to be baptized of Christ with the baptism of the 14 But John fort ade him, saying, 'I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me?

15 And Jesus answering said unto him, 'Suffer it to be so now: for thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness. Then he suffered him.

16 And Jesus, when he was baptized, went up straightway out of the water: and, lo, the heavens were opened unto him, and he saw the Spirit of God descending like a dove, and lighting upon him:

17 And, lo, a voice from heaven, saying, 'This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.

Thus he was made sin for us, though He knew no sin. John's baptism is now a repute; that is the present dispensation, and now Jesus will be baptized with water; but his baptizing with the Holy Ghost is reserved for many days hence, Acts 1:5. Honor must now be put upon John's baptism. Note, Persons of the greatest attainments should yet bear testimony to ordinances by diligent attendance on them. What we see God owns, and while we see He does so, we must own. John was increasing, and, therefore, it must be thus yet; shortly he will decrease, and then it will be otherwise. Now there is a fair opportunity for Christ's appearing in public. See John 1:31-34. He must be signalized by wonders from heaven, in that act of his own, which is most condescending.

Thus it becomes us to fulfil all righteousness. Note, There was a propriety in every thing Christ did for us; (Heb. 2:10. 7:26.) and we must study to do not only that which behoves us, but that which becomes us. Our Lord looked upon it as well becoming Him to own every divine institution, and to show his readiness to comply with all God's precepts.—Thus it becomes Him to justify God in sending John his forerunner. Thus it becomes us to countenance and encourage every good thing by pattern as well as precept. Christ often mentioned John and his baptism with honor, which, that He might do the better, He must be baptized. Thus Jesus began first to do, then to teach, and his ministers must take the same method. Thus Christ fulfilled the righteousness of the ceremonial law, which consisted in divers washings; thus He recommended the gospel ordinance of baptism to his church, and showed what virtue He designed to put in it. It was proper for Christ to submit to John's washing with water, because it was a divine appointment; but, to oppose the Pharisees' washing with water, because it was a human invention.

John was entirely satisfied with the will of Christ; and then he suffered with the baptism of the Holy Ghost, as of fire, for that was Christ's baptism, v. 11. Though John was filled with the Holy Ghost from the womb, (Luke 1:15.) yet he acknowledges he had need to be baptized with that baptism. Note, They who have much of the Spirit of God, yet, while in this imperfect state, see they have need of more. Though John was the greatest ever born of woman, yet being born of woman, as others of Adam's race, he was polluted. Note, The purest souls are most sensible of their own remaining impurity, and most earnestly desire cleansing. The best and holiest of men have need of Christ, and the better they are, the more they see of that need. This was said before the multitude, who greatly venerated John, and were ready to embrace him as the Messiah; yet he publicly owns that he has need to be baptized of Christ. Note, It is no disparagement to the greatest of men to confess that they are undone without Christ. John was Christ's forerunner, and yet owns that he has need to be baptized of Him. Note, They, who were before Christ, depended on Him. While John was dealing with others about their souls, see how feelingly he speaks of his own. I have need to be baptized of Thee. Note, Ministers are concerned to look to it that they preach to themselves, and be themselves baptized with the Holy Ghost. Take heed to thyself first; save thyself, 1 Tim. 4:16.

Comest Thou to me? Does the holy Jesus come to be baptized by a sinner, as a sinner and among sinners? How can this be? Note, Christ's coming to us may be well wondered at. Jesus said, suffer it to be so now. Christ accepted his humility, but not his refusal. It is fit that Christ should take his own method, though we do not understand it, nor are able to give a reason for it. Suffer it to be so now.—Every thing happens in its season. But why now?

Christ is now in a state of humiliation. He is not only found in fashion as a man, but is made in the likeness of sinful flesh, as if He needed to be washed, though perfectly pure, and though He knew no sin. John's baptism is now a repute; that is the present dispensation, and now Jesus will be baptized with water; but his baptizing with the Holy Ghost is reserved for many days hence, Acts 1:5. Honor must now be put upon John's baptism. Note, Persons of the greatest attainments should yet bear testimony to ordinances by diligent attendance on them. What we see God owns, and while we see He does so, we must own. John was increasing, and, therefore, it must be thus yet; shortly he will decrease, and then it will be otherwise. Now there is a fair opportunity for Christ's appearing in public. See John 1:31-34. He must be signalized by wonders from heaven, in that act of his own, which is most condescending.

Thus it becomes us to fulfil all righteousness. Note, There was a propriety in every thing Christ did for us; (Heb. 2:10. 7:26.) and we must study to do not only that which behoves us, but that which becomes us. Our Lord looked upon it as well becoming Him to own every divine institution, and to show his readiness to comply with all God's precepts.—Thus it becomes Him to justify God in sending John his forerunner. Thus it becomes us to countenance and encourage every good thing by pattern as well as precept. Christ often mentioned John and his baptism with honor, which, that He might do the better, He must be baptized. Thus Jesus began first to do, then to teach, and his ministers must take the same method. Thus Christ fulfilled the righteousness of the ceremonial law, which consisted in divers washings; thus He recommended the gospel ordinance of baptism to his church, and showed what virtue He designed to put in it. It was proper for Christ to submit to John's washing with water, because it was a divine appointment; but, to oppose the Pharisees' washing with water, because it was a human invention.

John was entirely satisfied with the will of Christ; and then he suffered

Him. The same modesty which led Him to decline the honor, now induced him to perform the service Christ enjoined on him. Note, No humility must make us decline our duty.

2. Jesus, when He was baptized, went up straightway out of the water. Others that were baptized stayed to confess their sins; but Christ, having no sins to confess, went up immediately out of the water: so we read it, but not right, for it is from the water, from the brink of the river, to which He went down to be washed, that is, to have his head or face washed; (John 13:2.) for here is no mention made of putting off or on his clothes, which would not have been omitted, had He been baptized naked. Straightway, as one that went to work with the greatest cheerfulness; He would lose no time. How was He straitened till it was accomplished!

Now when He was coming up out of the water, lo! the heavens were opened unto Him, so as to discover something beyond the starry firmament, at least to Him. This was to encourage Him with the prospect that was set before Him. Heaven is opened to receive Him when He has finished his work. It was also to encourage us to submit to Him. Note, Sin shut up heaven; stopped all friendly intercourse between God and man; but now, Christ has opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers.

Divine light and love are darted down upon men, and we have boldness to enter into the holiest. We have mercies from God; we make returns of duty to Him, and all by Jesus Christ, who is the Ladder that has its foot on earth and its top in heaven; by whom alone it is that we have any comfortable correspondence with God, or hope of heaven at last. The heavens were opened at Christ's baptism, to teach us that when we duly attend on the ordinances, we may expect communion with God.

He saw the Spirit of God descending like a dove, or as a dove, and lighting upon Him.—Christ saw it, (Mark 1:10.) John saw it, John 1:33, 34. and it is probable that all the standers by saw it; for this was intended to be his public inauguration. Observe, The Spirit of God lighted on Him. In the beginning of the old world, the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters, hovered, as a bird upon the nest! (Gen. 1:2.) So here, in the beginning of the new world, Christ needed not, as God, to receive the Holy Spirit, but it was foretold that the Spirit of the Lord should rest upon Him, Isaiah 11:2. 61:1. He was to be a Prophet, and prophets always spake by the Spirit of God. Christ was to execute his prophetic office, not by his divine nature, says Dr. Whitby, but by the influence of the Holy Spirit. And the Spirit descended upon Him, by Him to be derived to all believers, in his gifts, graces and comforts. The ointment on the heart ran down to the skirts. Christ received gifts for men, that He might give gifts to men.

He descended on Him like a dove. Whether it was a real dove, or, as the representation in visions, is uncertain. If there must be a bodily shape, (Luke 3:22.) it must not be that of a man, for the being seen in fashion as a man was peculiar to the second Person. None therefore was so fit as the shape of one of the fowls of heaven, heaven being opened; and of all these, none so significant as that of a dove.

The spirit of Christ is a dovelike spirit, not

Holy Spirit, and could not be surprised that Jesus applied to him, an inferior, and a poor sinful man. Admitting this, Jesus still intimated his propriety; 'for,' says he, 'it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness.' As we find that Jesus never spake of Himself in the plural number. He meant John also, and all servants of God, in a subordinate sense. It became Christ, as our Surety and Example, perfectly 'to fulfil all righteousness'; and it becomes us to walk in all the commandments and ordinances of God, according to their meaning and intent, without exception, while they are in force. So far is Christ's example obligatory; but it does not bind us to do exactly as He did: for He was circumcised, kept the Passover, and observed the seventh day Sabbath, according to the dispensation under which He lived. Scott. There were two kinds of baptism among the Jews; one was that of the priests at their consecration, Lev. 8:6. the other that of heathens proselyted to the Jewish religion. The latter, indeed, is not expressly mentioned in Scripture, but there seems a plain allusion to it, Ez. 36:24, 25. Macknight. Now as Christ had submitted to circumcision, the initiatory ordinance of the Mosaic dispensation, it was necessary He should submit to the initiatory ordinance of the Baptist's dispensation, instituted by the same authority, and an introduction to his own dispensation of eternal mercy and truth. But it was necessary on another account. Our Lord represented the High Priest, and was to be the High Priest over the house of God;—now, as the High Priest was initiated into his office by washing and anointing, so must Christ be; hence He was baptized, or washed, and anointed by the Holy Ghost. Thus He fulfilled the righteous ordinance of his initiation into the office of High Priest, and thus was prepared to make an atonement for the sins of mankind.

Verses 16, 17.

Immediately on leaving the water, while Jesus prayed, (Note, Luke 3:21, 22.) 'the heavens were opened,' and the Holy Spirit descended like a dove, 'the emblem of purity, gentleness and love, and lighted upon Him,' in the form, probably, and with the hovering motion of a dove.—This visible descent of the Spirit upon Christ was a token of being endued with power with his sacred mission; and, to qualify Him as Man, for every part of his mediatorial work; and to be 'concomitant'

therefore are the tidings of peace with God brought by the Spirit as a dove. It speaks God's good-will toward men, that his thoughts toward us are of good and not of evil. By the voice of the turtle heard in our land (Cant. 2: 12), the Chaldee paraphrase understands the voice of the Holy Spirit. That God is in Christ reconciling the world to Himself, is a joyful message, that comes to us on the wings of a dove.

The voice from heaven explaining and completing this solemnity, was probably heard by all present. The Holy Spirit manifested Himself in the likeness of a dove, but God the Father by a voice; for when the law was given, they saw no manner of similitude, but only heard a voice: (Deut. 4: 12.) and so this Gospel came, the best news ever heard from heaven, for it speaks plainly and fully of God's favor to Christ, and us in Him.

This is my beloved Son. Observe the relation He sustains. Jesus Christ is the Son of God by eternal generation, as he was begotten of the Father before all worlds, (Col. 1: 15. Heb. 1: 3.) and by supernatural conception; He was therefore called the Son of God, being conceived by the power of the Holy Ghost; (Luke 1: 35.) yet this is not all; He is the Son of God by special designation to the office of the world's Redeemer. He was sanctified, and sealed, and sent upon that errand, brought up with the Father for it, (Prov. 8: 30.) I will make Him my first-born, Ps. 89: 27. He is my beloved Son; his dear Son, the Son of his love, (Col. 1: 13.) He had laid in his bosom from all eternity, (John 1: 18.) had been always his delight, (Prov. 8: 30.) but particularly as Mediator, He was his beloved Son. He is mine elect, in whom my soul delights. (Isa. 42: 1.) Because He consented to the covenant of redemption, and delighted to do that will of God, therefore the Father loved Him, John 10: 17. 3: 35. Behold, then, behold and wonder, what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that He should deliver up His own Son, who is the Son of His love, to die for those that were the generation of His wrath; nay, and that He therefore loved Him, because He laid down His life for the sheep. Now know we that He loved us, seeing He has not withheld His Son, his only Son, his Isaac, whom He loved, but gave Him to be a sacrifice for our sin.

See how ready He is to own us in Him. He is my beloved Son, not only with, but in whom, I am well pleased. Hitherto God had been displeased with men, but now his anger is turned away, and He has made us accepted in the that of a silly dove without heart, (Hos. 7: 11.) but like an innocent dove, without gall. The Spirit descended, not in the shape of an eagle, which, though a royal bird, is still a bird of prey; but in that of a dove, one of the most inoffensive of birds. Such was the spirit of Christ. He shall not strive nor cry. Such should Christians be; harmless as doves. The dove is remarkable for her eyes; we find that both the eyes of Christ, (Cant. 5: 12.) and the eyes of the church, (Cant. 1: 15. 4: 1.) are compared to doves' eyes, for they have the same spirit. The dove mourns much, (Isa. 38: 14.) Christ wept oft; and penitent souls are compared to doves of the valleys. The dove was the only fowl that was offered in sacrifice, (Lev. 1: 14.) and Christ, by the eternal Spirit, offered Himself without spot to God. The tidings of the decrease of Noah's flood were brought by a dove, with an olive leaf in her mouth; fitly Beloved, Eph. 1: 6. Let all the world observe that this is the Days-Man, who has laid his hand upon us both, and that there is no coming to the Father but by Him, John 14: 6. In Him our spiritual sacrifices are acceptable, for He is the altar that sanctifies every gift, 1 Pet. 2: 5. Out of Christ God is a consuming fire, but in Christ, a reconciled Father. This is the sum of the Gospel; it is a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptance, that God has declared by a voice from heaven, that Jesus Christ is his beloved Son, in whom He is well pleased, with which we must by faith cheerfully concur, and say that He is our beloved Savior, in whom we are well pleased.

CHAP. IV. V. 1-11. We have here a famous duel, fought between Michael and the dragon, the Seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent, nay, the serpent himself; in which the Seed of the woman suffers, being tempted, and his heel is bruised; but the serpent is baffled in his temptations, and his head is broken. Jesus comes off a conqueror, securing not only comfort, but conquest at last to all his faithful followers.

1. Immediately after the heavens were opened to Him, and the Spirit descended on Him, and He was declared the Son of God, the Savior of the world, the next we hear of Him. He is tempted; for then He is best able to grapple with the temptation. Note, Special tokens of divine favor will not secure us from being tempted. After great honors, we must expect something humbling. Paul had a messenger of Satan to buffet him, after he had been in the third heavens. God usually prepares his people for temptation; He gives strength according to the day, and more than ordinary comfort before a sharp trial. The assurance of our sonship is the best preparative for temptation. If the good Spirit witness to our adoption, that will furnish us with an answer to all the suggestions of the evil spirit, designed either to defile or disquiet us.

Then, after baptism, He was tempted. Note, After communion with God we must expect to be set upon by Satan. The enriched soul must double its guard. When thou hast eaten, and art full, then beware. Then, on commencing his public life, He was tempted as He never had been in privacy. Note, The devil has a particular spite against useful persons, especially at their first setting out. It is the advice of the son of Sirach, (Ecclesiastic. 2: 1.) My son,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 13-17. The most eminent saints have ever had the most exalting thoughts of themselves, and the most exalted apprehensions of Christ; have felt their need of his atoning blood and sanctifying Spirit more than others, and thought the meanest place in his service too high and honorable for them. As proof of this, he, who was 'filled with the Holy Ghost' from his birth, and was 'the greatest of all that had been born of woman,' declares himself unworthy to wear Emmanuel's shoes. Let us compare and contrast his character and language with those of self-sufficient Pharisees and Sadducees, ancient and modern; and of those especially, who derogate from the honor of Christ to exalt themselves. But 'before honor is humility;' and the Lord honors those who honor Him. While we admire the self-abasement of our Surety, in 'fulfilling all righteousness' for our justification, even while it made Him appear as if He had been a sinner; let us copy his example, and honor God in all his institutions, seeking his grace in the use of all appointed means. Thus we may wait for the 'supply of the Spirit of Christ,' to make us fruitful in works of righteousness, to receive communion with Him, as 'the Spirit of adoption, witnessing with our spirits that we are the children of God,' accepted in his 'beloved Son, in whom He is well pleased.' [And let us be earnest in our applications to our gracious Redeemer, that, as we are "baptized with water in his name," He would also "baptize us with the Holy Ghost and with fire;" that, by the operations of his Holy Spirit on our cold and stupid hearts, He would enkindle and quicken that divine 'life, that flaming, yet well governed zeal for his glory, which distinguishes the true Christian from the hypocritical professor, and is indeed the seal of God set upon the heart, to mark it for eternal happiness.' Dodd.] But let us remember, that the Spirit of Christ resembles the gentle, loving dove, and not any fierce bird of prey: furious contests therefore cannot spring from his influence; nay, they banish Him from our hearts and assemblies, weaken the evidences of our adoption, and mar our comfort. 'For the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance;' and by abounding in these, we best glorify the God of our salvation, to whose service we were devoted, and baptized in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; to whom be glory evermore, Amen. Scott.

ed the people from Him, as Head of the church. (Marg. Ref. x.)—A voice, at the same time, was heard from heaven, God the Father Himself acknowledging Jesus as his beloved Son, in whose person, character, righteousness and mediation, He was fully satisfied: intimating thus, that those who would find acceptance with the Father, must hear, believe and obey his Son, and seek blessings in his name, and for his sake. At the baptism of our Lord, there was a manifestation of the three Persons in the sacred Trinity, acting in their proper relations, according to the economy of our redemption: the Father appointing and sealing the Son as Mediator; the Son solemnly accepting, and entering on the work; and the Holy Spirit descending on Him, as, through his mediation, to apply salvation to the souls of his people. God. The most active men must find time to be alone with God. Those are not fit to speak the things of God in public who have not first conversed with Him in private. When Christ would appear as a Teacher come from God, it shall not be said of him, 'He has newly come from travelling. He has been abroad and has seen the world,' but, 'He is newly come out of a desert; He has been alone, and conversing with his own heart.' Christ withdrew that He might give Satan advantage. Note, Though solitude is a friend to a good heart, yet Satan knows how to improve it against us. Woe to him that is alone. Those who under pretence of sanctity retire into deserts find that they are not out of the reach of spiritual enemies, and that they want the communion of saints. Christ retired, that Satan might have leave to do his worst. To make the victory more illustrious, He gave the enemy sun and wind on his side, and yet baffled him. He might give Satan advantage, for the prince of this world had nothing in Him, but he has in us, and, therefore, we must pray not to be led into temptation. He retired, that He might have opportunity to do his best Himself, that He might be exalted in his own strength; for so it was written, I have trod the wine press alone, and of the people there was none with Me. Christ entered the lists without a second.

3. He did not wilfully thrust Himself upon the combat, but was led of the Spirit to be tempted of the devil. The spirit that descended upon Him like a dove made Him meek and yet bold. Note, Our care must be not to enter into temptation; but if God bring us into it for our trial, we must not think it strange, but double our guard. Be strong in the Lord; resist, steadfast in the faith; and all shall be well. If we tempt the devil to tempt us, we provoke God to leave us; but wherever God leads us, we may hope that He will go with us, and bring us off more than conquerors.

Christ was led to be tempted of the devil only. Others are tempted, when they are drawn aside by their own lust and enticed; (James 1:14.) The devil takes hold of that handle and ploughs with that beifer, but our Lord had no corrupt nature, and therefore He was led securely, as a champion into the field, to be tempted purely by the devil.

Temptations are fiery darts, thorns in the flesh, buffetings, siftings, wrestlings, combats, all which denote hardship and suffering; therefore Christ submitted to them, because He would humble Himself, in all things to be made like unto his brethren; thus He gave his back to the smiters. There is no conquest without a combat; Christ was tempted that He might overcome the tempter. Satan tempted the first Adam, and triumphed over him; but the second Adam shall triumph over him, and lead captivity captive. It thus appears, that our enemy is subtle, spiteful, and daring; but withal, he is not invincible. Though he is a strong man armed, yet the Captain of our salvation is stronger than he. It is some comfort to us to think that Christ suffered, being tempted; for thus it appears that temptations not yielded to are not sins; they are afflictions only, and such as may be the lot of real Christians. And we have a High Priest who knows what it is to be tempted, and who is therefore more tenderly touched with the feeling of our infirmities in an hour of temptation. Heb. 2:18. 4:15. But it is much more a comfort to think that Christ conquered for us, being tempted; not only that our enemy is conquered and disarmed, but that we are interested in Christ's victory over him, and through Him are more than conquerors.

He was dieted for the combat, as wrestlers, who are temperate in all things; (1 Cor. 9:25;) but Christ beyond any other, for He fasted forty days and forty nights, as did Moses the great lawgiver, and Elias the great reformer, in the Old Testament. John Baptist came as Elias in those things which were moral, not in those which were miraculous; (John 10:41.) That

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. It is generally computed that the birth of Christ was four years before the era from which we generally calculate. The chapters are dated according to the vulgar era, nevertheless; and as He was thirty years of age at his baptism, that event is dated after Christ 26; and the computation proceeds on the same principle, so far as the date is ascertainable.

VERSES 1, 2.

It is natural to suppose, that the public descent of the Holy Spirit on Jesus would have caused the Jewish nation without delay to acknowledge Him as the Messiah. Instead of this, He was immediately led up by the Spirit into the wilderness, to be tempted of the devil. He might be inclined to retire and prepare for his work by fasting, prayer, and other holy exercises, yet He was specially led forth by the Spirit to contend with the adversary of God and man. He went forth to be tempted. As our Surety, our Champion, our David, He went to meet the Goliath, who had so long defied the armies of the living God, and had never found a saint able wholly to vanquish him.—Satan assumed the first Adam in paradise, and so overcame him, that he eat the forbidden fruit, when he had free and innocent access to that of every other tree. But the 'second Adam' met the enemy in a dreary wilderness, and by a miracle sustained a fast forty days and nights, that the devil might not be interpreted. Satan knew that this was the Holy God of God, and for what end He came into the world; but from the private enemy with which he oppress the purposes of God, though honor was reserved for Christ. Christ fasted not for mortification, having no corrupt desires; but that He might humble Himself, and might seem as one whom no man seeketh after. He fasted, not only that He might give Satan an occasion; but also that He might recommend fasting to us, when God calls us to it, or when we are destitute of daily food, or when it is requisite for keeping under the body, or the quickening of prayer, those excellent preparatives for temptation. If good people are brought low, they may be consoled in reflecting that their Master was in like manner exercised. A man may want bread, and yet be a favorite of Heaven. Forty days' converse with heaven was instead of meat and drink to Him, but He was afterwards an hungered, to show, that He was really Man; and He took upon Him our natural infirmities that He might atone for us. Man fell by eating; in that way we often sin, and therefore Christ was an hungered.

That which Satan aimed at, in all his temptations, was to bring Him to sin against God, and so to render Him forever incapable of being a Sacrifice for the sin of others. Whatever the pretence was, he aimed to bring Him to despair of his Father's goodness, to presume upon his Father's power, and to alienate his Father's honor. In the first two, the temptation seemed innocent, and therein appeared the subtlety of the tempter; in the last, the temptation seemed desirous. The former two are artful, which there was need of great wisdom to discern; the last was a strong temptation, which there was need of great resolution to resist; yet Satan was baffled in the end.

The tempter came to Him. Note, The devil is the tempter, and, therefore, he is Satan, an adversary; for those are our worst enemies, who entice us to sin, and are Satan's agents.—He is emphatically the tempter, because he was so to our first parents, and is so still, and all other tempters are so on work by him. He came to Christ, in a visible appearance, not terrible, as afterwards, in darkness in the garden; no, if ever the devil transformed himself into an angel of light, he did it now, and pretended to be a good genius, a guardian angel.

Observe the subtlety of the tempter. Christ began to be very hungry, and, therefore, it seemed very proper to turn stones into bread for his necessary support. Note, It is one of Satan's wiles to take advantage of our outward condition. He is an adversary no less watchful than spiteful; and the more ingenious he is against us, the more industrious must we be in guarding against him. When He began to be hungry, and that in a wilderness, then the devil assailed Him. Note, Poverty is a great temptation to discontent, and the use of unlawful means for relief, and it is excused with this, that hunger will break through stone walls; which yet is no excuse, for the law of God ought to be stronger to us than stone walls.—Aur prays against poverty, not because it is an affliction and reproach, but because it is a temptation; lest I be poor and steel. Those, therefore, who are in straits, need to double their always baffled, he was desirous of assailing Him. Perhaps he had some expectation of success. He knew that, as Man, Jesus was like us in all things, except sin. If he could gain the advantage, the plan of redemption would be frustrated. As he had instigated Herod to murder Jesus in his infancy, so he now tried to draw Him into sin; and if unsuccessful, he would still have the pleasure of inflicting uneasiness, for our Lord 'suffered being tempted.' In proportion to his perfect holiness would He be distressed by the detestable suggestions of the tempter; and that which preserved Him from defilement, exposed Him to suffer. But to this He submitted, that He might have sympathy with his people in temptation, and be able to relieve them.—It is probable, that Satan repeated his temptations during the forty days, interrupting Christ's holy meditations by his hateful suggestions; (Luke 4:2.) but of this we are not informed. After his long abstinence, He became hungry in a place, where ordinary sustenance could not be had. Probably no distress is more severe, than extreme hunger, without the prospect of relief; and the tempter chose this crisis for his most artful and vehement assault. Scott. 'Man was overcome by the temptation of Satan, and so sin, death, and all evil entered; therefore our Redeemer must deliver us from sin, Satan, and misery, by conquering the tempter in his way of temptation, or which he conquered: to give us notice also, that the warfare preparatory to our future state is waged by overcoming temptations, or being overcome by them. There is no study of temptations and need once from a great part of the Christian life.—The sensual are never at war with.' BAYNES

3 And when the tempter came to him, he said, 'If thou be the Son of God, command that these stones be made bread.'

4 But he answered and said, 'It is written, "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God."

fictions could not consist with, when really they proceed from God's fatherly love. With Job they can answer, Though He slay me, though He starve me, yet will I trust in Him, and love Him as a friend, even when He seems to come forth against me as an enemy. The devil aims to shake our faith in the word of God. Thus he began with our first parents; Yea, has God said so and so? Surely He has not. So here, Has God said that Thou art His beloved Son? Surely He did not say so; or if He did, it is not true. We give place to the devil, when we question the truth of God's word. The devil carries on his designs very much by possessing people with hard thoughts of God, as if He were unfaithful, and had forgotten those who had ventured their all upon Him. He pretended that God forbade our first parents the tree of knowledge, because He grudged them the use of it. So here, he insinuates to our Saviour, that his Father had cast Him off. But if Christ seemed to be a mere man now, because He was hungry, why was He not confessed to be more than a man, when 'of forty days He fasted, and was not hungry'?

Secondly, 'If thou art the Son of God, prove it by this command that these stones—a heap of which probably lay near—be made bread.' John Baptist said, but the other day, that God can out of stones raise up children to Abraham; a divine power can, therefore, no doubt, out of stones, make bread for those children; is Thou hast that power, exert it now in a time of need for Thyself? He does not say, Pray to have it done, but command it to be done; thy Father hath forsaken Thee, set up for Thyself. The devil is for every thing which is assuming. He gains his point, if he can but bring men off from their dependence on God.

But Christ would not command these stones to be made bread. Not because He could not; He, who turned water into wine, could have turned stones into bread. And why would He not? Because the more plausible the temptation is, the more dangerous it is. Christ was soon aware of the snake in the grass, and would not do any thing which looked like questioning the truth of the voice which He had heard from heaven; nor distrust his Father's care of Him; nor limit Him to a particular way of providing for Him; nor do any thing that looked like setting up for Himself; nor gratify Satan. Some would have said, to give the devil his due, this was good counsel; but for those who relied upon God, to consult him, is more than his due; it is like inquiring of the god of Ekron, when there is a God in Israel.

He answered, it is written. Observe, Christ baffled all the temptations of Satan with, It is written. He is Himself the Eternal Word, and could have produced the mind of God, without having had recourse to the writings of Moses; but He put honor on the Scripture, and therein set us an example; and He says this to Satan, taking it for granted that he knew well enough

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-4 Retirement, fasting, meditation and devotion are suitable preparations for the ministry; and they, who are led by the Holy Spirit to take this office, will seek communion with God and a blessing from Him in the use of all means of grace. Yet we must not yield to discouragement, if, in thus seeking God, we should be peculiarly assailed by the devil.—This subtle enemy leaves the slothful unmolested; but when we seek to do good, to glorify God, or to enjoy communion with Him, Satan will surely assail us, as far as he is permitted; and the Lord often permits him to do this, either to counterbalance our comforts, or prove the power of our grace. The enemy knows how to avail himself of circumstances, and whether we be full or hungry, he can vary his temptations accordingly.—The Lord is able to suspend the cravings of appetite; but as this is not his ordinary method, they are presumptuous who attempt such abstinence, as renders their appetites unruly, and thus exposes them to temptation; yet the trial of our faith and love sometimes consists in patiently bearing the cravings of nature, rather than remove them by committing sin. Satan will not assail believers, in the full exercise of faith and love, with solicitations to gross iniquities. He is most dangerous, when most plausible, and when his temptations seem to be friendly hints, tending to something profitable without evident calamity. In a very specious manner he tempts men to unbelief, or harasses their minds by needless perplexities. To the poor or afflicted he suggests, that it they were the children of God, they would not be left to such sufferings; thus insinuating, that God is unkind, or unfaithful: or he excites them to affect independence even of God, by attempting sinfully to supply their own wants. He affrights the mind with prospects of greater difficulties, and represents a conscientious trust in the Lord, as leading to ruin. By his emissaries he persuades men, that compliances must be made, and deviations admitted, or else they must starve; or he tries to embolden them to some convenient, or gainful sin, as they are the children of God, and there is no danger of being cast off. In these, and numberless ways, he tempts to impatience, distrust, sinful deliverances from trouble, and to a preference of sin to suffering. And we often listen to his flatteries, and dishonor our profession, or honor it less than we ought to do. But the 'sword of the Spirit' is a warranted weapon, which Satan cannot stand against; and it is wise to answer all his suggestions with, 'Thus it is written.' 'Let God be true and every man a liar.' Our dependence is on the Lord; his promise is our support; his precept our rule. By these men live; and while we lean on a promise, and obey the plain precept, we must be safe, whatever appearances be against us. 'Our Father knoweth what things we have need of,' and sooner shall all nature recede from its course, than any of his promises fail. Scott.

Satan seems to have acted before invisibly, suggesting thoughts to Christ, as he does to his people; but now he took a visible form, not terrifying, but as a friend, and perhaps an 'angel of light.' In this character he proposed, that if Jesus were 'the Son of God, He should command the stones before Him to be made bread.' The subtlety of the tempter appears in not urging Him to create a feast, but merely to change a stone into a loaf for his necessity, and to show that He was the Son of God. Where was the harm in this, when He was ready to perish with hunger? Some think the temptation was chiefly designed to make Him question whether He were the Son of God; but this seems to have been assumed, as a principle, in much the same manner, as when Eve was tempted by the serpent, she was told, 'Thou shalt be as gods,' self-sufficient and independent. (Notes, Gen. 3:1-6.) He might here address Christ: 'What! art Thou the Son of God, and left 'in this desert to perish with hunger! Can it be! Is this the love of the Father! Wait no longer on Him for a supply, which has been so delayed, and of which there is no prospect. The case is urgent, and the power inherent in Thee. Exert Thyself, and show thy divinity, by commanding these stones to become bread.' This seems his meaning; but to satisfy the appetite by working a miracle, would have implied distrust in God, and a disposition to leave the path of duty, and to seek improper means of relief; like him, who said 'this evil is of the Lord, why should we wait for the Lord any longer?' Christ, as Man, was bound to obey the whole law. Whatever would have been in the least sinful for us, would have been utterly inconsistent with the end for which He came into the world. The gift of miracles in Christ was in many respects a talent. While He 'fulfilled all righteousness,' as I set us a perfect example, it was necessary for Him to use this talent exclusively to confirm his mission and doctrine, to good to men, and honor the Father; and not to accommodate or relieve Himself. This is the true difference between holiness and selfishness. It would have been the duty of a prophet, in such a condition, to wait, and not relieve himself by a miracle, unless directed by God. Jesus, therefore, would not listen to a proposal so insidious, but answered it by a text of Scripture. (Note, Deut. 8:2.) Man depends on God, and not on soul. He can sustain life without food, but food cannot sustain life without Him. To rely on his promise, obey his precepts, and thus commend our lives to his keeping; to suffer any extremity rather than break his commands, or question his Word, which alone secures our souls, constitutes our duty. This reply, therefore, repelled the temptation, and the tempter was overcome by the 'sword of the Spirit.' Scott.

Both Mr. Henry and Dr. Scott, with Michaelis, consider the wilderness of Sinai as most probably the place of our Lord's temptation. But Dr. Doddridge regards as preferable the opinion of Maimonides, that it might be the wilderness near Jordan, and he says he 'is a miserable'

5 Then the devil taketh him up into the holy city and setteth him on a pinnacle of the temple,

6 And saith unto him, If thou be the Son of God, cast thyself down: for it is written, He shall give his angels charge concerning thee: and in their

what was written. It is possible that the devil's children may yet know very well what is written in God's book; the devils believe and tremble. When tempted to sin, we must repel the temptation with, It is written. The Word of God is the sword of the Spirit, the only offensive weapon in all the Christian army; (Eph. 6: 17.) and we may say of it as David of Goliath's sword, none is like that in our spiritual conflicts.

All these answers are taken from the book of Deuteronomy, which signifies the second law, and in which there is very little ceremonial.—The Levitical purifications, though of divine institution, could not drive away Satan, much less holy water and the sign of the cross, which are of human invention; but moral precepts, and evangelical promises mixed with faith, are mighty through God, for vanquishing him.—This is quoted from Deut. 8: 3. where the reason given why God fed the Israelites was, that man shall not live by bread alone. This Christ applies to his own case. Israel was God's son whom He called out of Egypt; (Hos. 11: 1.) So was Christ; (ch. 2: 15.) Israel was then in a wilderness; Christ is so now; perhaps in the same wilderness. The devil would have Him question his sonship, because He is in straits. No, says He, Israel was God's son, a son whom He was very tender of, and whose manners He bore; (Acts 13: 18.) and yet He brought them into straits; (Deut. 8: 5.) As a man chasteneth his son, so the Lord thy God chasteneth thee. Christ, being a Son, thus learns obedience. The devil would have Him distrust his Father's love. 'No,' says He, 'that would be to do as Israel did, who, when they were in want, said, Is the Lord among us, and can He furnish a table in the wilderness? Can He give bread?' The devil would have Him immediately look out for supply; but God, for holier ends, suffered them to hunger before He fed them, to humble and prove them. God would have his children not only wait on Him but for Him. The devil would have Him supply Himself; 'no' says Christ, 'what need is there of that? It is a point long since settled, that man may live without bread, as Israel did forty years upon manna.' It is true, God in his providence ordinarily maintains man by bread out of the earth; (Job 28: 5.) but He can, if He please, make use of other means; any thing that God shall order will be as good a livelihood for man as bread. As we may have bread, and yet not be nourished, if God deny his blessing, (Hag. 1: 6, 9. Mic. 6: 14. for though bread is the staff of life, it is God's blessing that is the staff of bread,) so we may want bread, and yet be nourished some other way. God sustained Moses and Elijah without bread, and Christ Himself just now for forty days. He sustained Israel with bread from heaven, angel's food, and Elijah with bread miraculously supplied by ravens, and with the widow's meal, miraculously multiplied; therefore Christ need not turn stones into bread, but trust God, as He did the forty days before He hungered. Note, As in our greatest abundance we must not live without God, so in our greatest straits we must learn to live upon God; and when the fig-tree does not blossom, and the field yields no meat, yet then we must rejoice in the Lord; we must humbly pray for what He sees fit to give us, and be thankful for our allowance, though it be short.—Let us learn of Christ to be at God's finding, rather than our own; and not take any irregular course for our supply, though our wants are ever so pressing, (Ps. 37: 3.) Some way or other the Lord will provide; it is better to live poorly on God's goodness, than plentifully upon the products of sin.

See what an unwearied adversary the devil is; he would next draw Christ to presume upon the Father's care. Note, We are in danger on the right hand and on the left, therefore we must take heed lest when we avoid one extreme, we run into another; lest by overcoming our prodigality, we run into covetousness. No extremes are more dangerous than despair and presumption, especially in affairs of the soul. Some who are persuaded that Christ can save them from their sins, then presume that He will save them in their sins. Thus when people begin to be zealous in religion, Satan hurries them into ligotry and intemperate heats.

He took Christ, not by force, but moved Him to go with him to Jerusalem. Whether Christ went up the stairs to the top, or went in the air, is uncertain; but so it was, that He was set upon a pinnacle, or spire; upon the fane, or upon the battlements, or, as the word is, upon the wing of the temple. Observe, How submissive Christ was, that He might let Satan do his worst, and yet conquer him. The patience or Christ here, as in his sufferings and death, is more wonderful than the power of Satan, and his instruments; for neither of them could have any power against Christ, but what was given them from above. How comfortable, that Christ, who let loose this power of Satan against Himself, restrains it from us, for He knows our frame! The devil, intending to solicit Christ to an ostentation of his own power, and a vain-glorious reliance upon God's providence, fixes Him on a public place, in Jerusalem, a populous city, and the joy of the whole earth; in the temple, one of the wonders of the world. There He might be taken notice of by every body, and prove Himself the Son of God; not as formerly in the obscurities of a wilderness, but upon the most eminent stage of action.

Observe, That Jerusalem is called the holy city; so it was in name and profession, and there was in it a holy seed, the substance thereof. Note, There is no city so holy as to exempt us from the devil. The first Adam was tempted in the holy garden, the second in this holy city. Let us not in any place be off our watch. Nay, the holy city is the place where, with the greatest advantage, he tempts men to pride and presumption; but, blessed be God, into the Jerusalem above, that holy city, no unclean thing shall enter; there we shall be forever out of temptation. Josephus (Antiq. bk. 15. ch. 14.) describes the pinnacle of the temple as so very high, that it would make a man's head giddy to look down to the bottom. Note, Pinnacles of the temple are places of temptation. High places are slippery places; advancement makes a man a fair mark for Satan to shoot his fiery darts at. God casts down that He may raise up; the devil raises up that he may cast down: therefore they who would take heed of falling, must take heed of climbing.—High places in the Church are specially dangerous. Men in eminent stations, and of great reputation, need to keep humble; for Satan will be sure to aim at them; to puff them up with pride, that they may fall into the condemnation of the devil. Those that stand high must stand fast.

Cast Thyself down, and then Thou wilt be admired, as under the special protection of Heaven. When they see Thee fall unhurt from such a precipice, they will say, (as the barbarous people of Paul,) 'that Thou art a God.' Tradition says, that Simon Magus by this very thing attempted to prove himself a god, but that his pretensions were disproved, for he fell, and was miserably bruised. 'Nay, all Jerusalem will see and acknowledge, not only that Thou art more than a man, but that Thou art that Messenger, that Angel of the covenant, that should suddenly come to the temple, (Mat. 3: 1.) and thence descend into the streets of the holy city; and thus the work of convincing the Jews will be cut short.'

Observe, The devil said, Cast Thyself down. He could not cast Him down, though a little thing would have done it, from the top of a spire. Note, Satan's power is limited; hitherto he shall come and no further. Yet if the devil had cast Him down, that had been his suf-dry, barren place, consisting of high rocky mountains, so torn and disordered, as if the earth had suffered some violent convulsion.—Looking down into a steep valley as we passed along, we saw some ruins of small cells and cottages, which, we were told, were formerly the habitations of hermits retiring hither for penance and mortification; and certainly there could not be found in the whole earth a more comfortable and abandoned place for that purpose.' Ed.

Verses 5-7.

Fitting the confidence of Christ in his heavenly Father unshaken, the devil changed his mode of attack, converted Him (doubtless by his own permission) into Jerusalem, and placed Him on a pinnacle of the temple, upon the top of the high porch, or steeple, at the east end of it, which, with the other parts, was surrounded by a battlement to prevent any from falling; (Deut. 22: 8.) and then he proposed to Jesus, being the Son of God, 'to cast Himself down thence.' He might thus publicly prove Himself to be the Messiah, and also evince the highest confidence in God. The tempter endeavored to sustain this temptation by a reference to the Scripture. (Note. Ps. 91: 11, 12.) We must not suppose this passage relates to believers, or to Christ. Satan suggested that, if angels were sent, for if angels were charged to keep believers from falling, they would not be so much more would the Lord be prevented from injury by a fall. But he omitted the words 'in all ways,' knowing that an ostentatious exposure of Himself to such injury was not a way marked out for Christ, or any believer; and that the divine protection could not be depended on in doing it.—Satan could tempt Christ to cast Himself down, but he could not cast Him down. Perhaps he expected thus to induce Jesus to terminate his own life; at least, compliance with the proposal would have been an unwarrantable demand of a miracle for his preservation. Our Lord answered him by quoting Deut. 6: 16, which forbids men to tempt God. Some contend that this expression denotes diffidence, rather than presumption, and produce texts to prove it; but the meaning in every case seems to be, 'putting the power, truth and love of God to an unnecessary trial, dictating to Him what He shall do, running into needless danger, making improper requirements, and expecting unwarranted interpositions.' If our Lord had cast Himself from the temple, He would have demanded a needless miracle publicly to prove Himself 'the Son of God,' and would have put Himself into extreme danger, in expectation of an interposition for which He had no warrant, and thus would have 'tempted the Lord.' St. Luke mentions this temptation last, but St. Matthew seems to have followed the order of time. His narration scores 'Holy city.' A phrase frequently and properly used to express Jerusalem, says Doddridge, for which comp. 1. 27: 53. Neh. 11: 1. Isa. 52: 1. Dan. 9: 24. Such also was it called by Josephus and Philo, hands they shall hear thee up, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone.

Jesus said unto him, 'It is written again, 'thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God.

[Practical Observations.]

8 Again 'the devil taketh him up into an fering only, not his sin. Note, Whatever real mischief is done us, it is of our own doing; the devil can but persuade, he cannot compel.—Every man is tempted when he is drawn away of his own lust, and not forced, but enticed.—Let us not hurt ourselves, and then, blessed be God, no one else can hurt us, Prov. 9: 12.

But, is Satan among the prophets? Is Satan so well versed in Scripture, as to quote it so readily? Note, It is possible for a man to have his head full of Scripture notions, and his mouth full of Scripture expressions, while his heart is full of reigning enmity to God. The knowledge which devils have of the Scripture increases both their mischiefousness and their torment. Never did the devil speak with more vexation to himself than when he said to Christ, I know thee who Thou art. The devil would persuade Christ to throw Himself down, hoping that He would be his own murderer, and that there would be an end of Him and his undertaking; to encourage Him, he tells Him, there would be no danger, that the good angels would protect Him, for so was the promise, (Ps. 91: 11.) He shall give His angels charge over Thee. There was something right in this quotation. There is such a promise; the devil knows it by experience; for he finds his attempts against them fruitless; and he frets at it, as he did at the hedge about Job, Job 1: 10. He was also right in applying it to Christ, for to Him all the promises of the protection of the saints eminently belong, and to them, in and through Him. That promise, that not a bone of theirs shall be broken, (Ps. 34: 20,) was fulfilled in Christ, John 19: 36. The angels guard the saints for Christ's sake. There was also a great deal wrong in the quotation. Perhaps the devil had a particular spite against this promise, because it had often baffled his designs. Observe, how he misquoted it. They shall keep Thee. But how? In all thy ways; if we go out of our way, we forfeit the promise, and put ourselves out of God's protection. Now this made against the tempter, and he industriously left it out. If Christ had cast Himself down, He would have been out of his way. It is good for us, on all occasions, to consult the Scriptures for ourselves, so that we be not imposed upon by those who mangle the Word of God; we must do as the noble Bereans, who searched the Scriptures daily. How he misapplied it! Scripture is abused when it is pressed to patronize sin; when men thus wrest it to their own temptation, they do it to their own destruction, 2 Pet. 3: 16. This promise is firm, but the devil made an ill use of it, as an encouragement to presume upon the divine care. Note, It is no new thing for the grace of God to be turned into wantonness. But shall we continue in sin that grace may abound? throw ourselves down that the angels may bear us up? God forbid.

Christ overcame the temptation with, It is written. The devil's abusing Scripture did not prevent Christ from using it: Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God, Deut. 6: 16. The meaning of this is not, Therefore, thou must not tempt Me, but I must not tempt my Father. In the place whence it is quoted it is in the plural number, Ye shall not tempt; here it is singular, Thou shalt not. Note, We are then likely to get good by the Word of God, when we receive general promises, as speaking to us in particular. Satan said, It is written. Christ says, It is written; not that one Scripture contradicts another. God is One, and His Word one, and He in one mind, but that is a promise, this a precept, and, therefore, that is to be explained and applied by this; for Scripture is the best interpreter of Scripture; and they who expound it, must do it consistently with practical godliness, Rom. 12: 6.

If Christ should cast Himself down, it would be requiring confirmation of that, which was already so well confirmed. Christ was abundantly satisfied, that God was already His Father, and gave his angels charge concerning Him; and to put it upon a new experiment would be to tempt Him, as the Pharisees tempted Christ, demanding a sign from heaven, when they had so many on earth. This is limiting the Holy One of Israel. If we expect that because God has promised not to forsake us, therefore He should follow us out of the way of our duty; that because He has promised to supply our wants, therefore He should please our fancies; that we may expect the desired end, without using the appointed means; this is tempting God. It is an aggravation of the sin, that He is the Lord our God; it is an abuse of the privilege we enjoy in having Him for our God; we are very ungrateful, if we tempt Him. This is to affront Him whom we ought to honor. Note, We must never promise ourselves more than God has promised us.

He tempted Christ to the most horrid idolatry, with the proffer of the kingdoms of this world, and the glory of them. Observe, The worst temptation was reserved for the last.—Note, Sometimes the saint's last encounter is with the sons of Anak; therefore, whatever be the temptation, still we must prepare for worse; and be armed for all attacks, with the armor of righteousness on the right hand and on the left.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 5-7. When Satan sees men staying their hearts on God in faith, and adhering to duty in difficulties, determined rather to suffer, than to seek relief by sin; he can tempt them to neglect proper means, or thrust themselves uncalled into dangers, expecting the Lord to help them out. Through their reverence for the Scripture, he can support his suggestions by texts, which seem, to countenance this unwarranted confidence. 'The Lord will provide,' and the believer need not defraud, or break the Sabbath, for a maintenance; but Satan will tempt him to be negligent, improvident, or extravagant; and lead him to believe, even in this case, that God has engaged to provide for him.—Christians shall be kept from final apostasy, and they need not be deterred by consciousness of their weakness, or the prospect of strong temptations. But the enemy will suggest, that they need not watch and pray; that they may venture into peril, may court difficulty, and rush into danger, and expect God to preserve them.—Satan and his instruments have an advantage, by presenting partial, or distorted quotations of Scripture, when the comfort or privilege is separated from the character or duty annexed. The believer shall be preserved in 'all his ways';

but by omitting the last words, Christians are seduced, out of their way, and still expect to be preserved. Many are deluded into a persuasion that they are believers, by mutilated quotations. But let all beware of mangling the Scripture, and guard against those who produce part of a text, and leave out words, that contradict the end for which they quote it. Godly men may do this in the heat of argument, or through inattention, but they follow a hateful precedent. It tends to mischief, and is a powerful engine in the hands of those who oppose the truth.—The tempter has no objection to holy places, as the scene of his assaults. He often chooses them: he delights in high places, and would gladly exalt those, of whose labors he is afraid, that he may cast them down with a fatal fall; and he urges men to presumption and ostentation.—The frequent perversion of Scripture should not lead us to neglect it. By texts used in their obvious meaning, we must answer temptations founded in misapplication of them. We should remember, that we trust in the Lord, when we expect protection in the path of duty, but tempt Him, when we turn from it, presuming on his care.

as quoted by Eusebius, who remarks that heathens also named those statues, as where their gods were peculiarly worshipped, or which their fabulous deities were supposed to have built. On the shekel, which, as on the other 'Shekel of Israel.' The specimen is from Bp. Walton's Eo. Pinnace. 'Though this word agrees with the etymology of the Greek; yet, according to its use among us, it leads the English reader to imagine, that He stood on the point of a spire. The truth is, the roof of the temple was flat, and had a kind of balustrade round it; (see Deut. 22: 8,) and somewhere on the edge of this battlement, we may suppose that Satan placed Christ when attacking Him with this temptation.' Dodds. Yet others, as Spanheim, Ireland, Beausobre and Kuinoel, consider the place as not being a part of the temple itself, but rather a wing or extremity of the pericly, that overlooked the deep valley, at a height, which, according to Josephus, rendered one dizzy to look down. It was indeed reckoned to be seven hundred feet to the bottom.

Verses 8-11.

The devil, despairing of success by covert temptation, resolved on one bold effort, in which he relied on the vastness of the reward, to induce the Savior to sin. He, therefore, took Jesus to the top of a very high mountain, and shewed Him 'all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them.' This must have been an illusion of the imagination, over which Satan seems to have an influence; for it is impossible that all the kingdoms of the world should be seen at once. The greatest part of them must be below the visible horizon. They were, however, pre-

9 And saith unto him, All these things will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me.

10 Then saith Jesus unto him, Get thee hence, Satan: for it is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy

He took Him to an exceeding high mountain; in hopes of prevailing, as Balak with Balaam, he changed his ground. The pinnacle of the temple is not high enough. The prince of the power of the air must have Him higher up into his territories. Some think this mountain was on the other side Jordan, because there Christ was, next after the temptation, John 1: 23, 29. Perhaps it was Mount Pisgah, whence Moses, in communion with God, had all the kingdoms of Canaan showed Him. Hither the blessed Jesus was carried for the advantage of a prospect; as if the devil could show Him more of the world than He knew, who made and governed it. Thence He might discover some of the kingdoms about Judea, though not the glory of them; but there was doubtless a delusion of Satan in it. It is probable, that what he showed Him was but a landscape, an airy representation in a cloud, such as that great deceiver could easily put together, setting forth in lively colors the splendid appearance of princes, their robes and crowns, retinue, equipage and liegwards; the pomp of courts, thrones and stately palaces; the sumptuous buildings in cities, the gardens and fields about the country-seats, with the various instances of their pleasures, wealth and gaiety, so as might be most likely to strike the fancy, or excite admiration. Such was this show, and the taking Him up into a high mountain, was but to color the thing, and the blessed Jesus saw through the cheat, only He permitted Satan to take his own way, that His victory might be more illustrious. Satan's temptations often come in at the eye, which is blinded to the things it should see, and dazzled by the things it should not. The first sin began in the eye, Gen. 3: 6. we therefore need to make a covenant with our eyes, and to pray that God would turn them away from beholding vanity. The lust of the flesh, and of the eye, with the pride of life, are the topics from which the devil takes most of his arguments. He deceives, and so destroys; he shows men the glory of the world, but conceals the sin, and sorrow, and death which stain the pride of all this glory, the cares and calamities which attend great possessions, and the thorns which crown themselves are lined with thorn. The glory of the world is that by which men are most imposed upon. Satan's sons grudge Jacob all his glory.

excite the imagination. Yet the blessed Jesus saw through the cheat, only He permitted Satan to take his own way, that His victory might be more illustrious. Satan's temptations often come in at the eye, which is blinded to the things it should see, and dazzled by the things it should not. The first sin began in the eye, Gen. 3: 6. we therefore need to make a covenant with our eyes, and to pray that God would turn them away from beholding vanity. The lust of the flesh, and of the eye, with the pride of life, are the topics from which the devil takes most of his arguments. The glory of the world is that by which men are most imposed upon. Satan's sons grudge Jacob all his glory.

Satan seems to have taken it for granted that he had proved that Christ was not the Son of God, because He had not given him those evidences of it which he demanded; so that here he looks upon Him as a mere man. 'Come,' says he, 'it seems that the God, whose Son Thou thinkest Thyself to be, starves Thee; a sign that He is not thy Father; but if Thou wilt be ruled by me, I will provide better for Thee.' Note, Satan makes an easy prey of men, when he can persuade them to think themselves abandoned of God. All this will I give Thee; and what was all that? A mere map, a phantasm. Note, Multitudes lose the sight of that which is, by setting their eyes on that which is not. The devil's baits are all a sham; they are shadows, with which he deceives them, or rather they deceive themselves. The nations of the earth had been long promised to the Messiah; if He be the Son of God, they belong to Him; Satan pretends now to be a good angel, probably one of those set over kingdoms, and to have received commission to deliver them to Him according to promise. Note, We must take heed of receiving even God's promise out of the devil's hands; we do so when we precipitate the performance by catching at it in a sinful way.

If thou wilt fall down and worship me. Note, The devil is fond of being worshipped. All the heathen worship was directed to him. (Deut. 32: 17.) who is therefore called the god of this world, 2 Cor. 4: 4. 1 Cor. 10: 20. Fain would he persuade Christ, now that He had set up for a teacher, to preach the Gentile idolatry, and to introduce it among the Jews, and then the nations of the earth would soon flock in to Him. What temptation could be more black? Note, The best saints may be tempted to the worst sins, especially when melancholy; as, for instance, to atheism, blasphemy, murder, self-murder, and what not? This temptation is their affliction, not their sin, while they do not consent to it. Christ was tempted to worship Satan.

Christ rejected the proposal, and came off conqueror. This was so gross a temptation as not to bear a parley. It appears abominable at first sight, and is therefore immediately rejected. If our best friend say 'Go serve other gods,' he must not be heard with patience, Deut. 13: 6, 8. Some temptations have the wickedness written in their foreheads; they are not to be disputed, but rejected; 'Get thee hence, Satan! Away with it; I cannot bear the thought of it!' When Satan tempted Christ to do Himself a mischief, though He yielded not yet He heard it; but now that the temptation flies in the face of God, He cannot bear it.—Note, It is a just indignation that rises at any proposal that reflects on the honor of God; nay, whatever we are sure the Lord hates, we must abominate. Note, It is good to be peremptory in resisting temptation, and to stop our ears to Satan's charms.

In order to strengthen our resolutions against sins, it is good to see what reason there is for those resolutions. The argument, Deut. 6: 13 and 10: 20, is exactly to the purpose. Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and Him only shalt thou serve. Christ does not dispute whether he was an angel of light; but though he were, he must not be worshipped, because that honor is due to God only. Note, It is good to make our answer to temptations full and brief, so as not to leave room for objections. Our Savior refers to the fundamental law in this case, which is universally obligatory.—Note, Religious worship must not be given to any creature; it is a flower of the crown which cannot be alienated, a branch of God's glory which He will not give to another, and which He would not give to his own Son, by obazing all men to honor the Son, as they honor the Father, if He had not been God, equal to Him, and one with Him. Christ quotes this law respecting worship, to show that, in his humiliation, He was worshipped under this law. Though as God He was worshipped, yet as man He worshipped God, both privately and publicly; He obliged us to no more than He was pleased to oblige Himself to. Thus it became Him to fulfil a righteousness. He also showed that the law of religious worship is of eternal obligation; though He altered and abrogated many institutions of worship, yet this fundamental law of nature, that God only is to be worshipped, He came to ratify and enforce.

5. Though the children of God may be exercised with many and great temptations, yet God will not suffer them to be tempted above the strength which either they have, or He will give them, 1 Cor. 10: 13. It is but for a season that they are in heaviness, through manifold temptations.

Then the devil leaveth Him, forced to do so by the power that went along with that command, get thee hence, Satan. He made a shameful retreat; and the more daring his attempts had been, the more mortifying his repulse. Then, when he had tempted Him, by all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them, and found He was not influenced by that bait with which he had taken so many of the children of men, he gives Him over as more than a man. He begins to conclude that He is the Son of God, and that it is in vain to tempt Him any farther. Note, The devil will yield, if we keep our ground, as when Naomi saw that Ruth was steadfast, she left off speaking to her. When the devil left our Savior, he acknowledged himself fairly beaten; his head was broken by the attempt he made to bruise Christ's heel. He left Him because he had nothing in Him, nothing to do with him. Note, The devil is an enemy to the saints, but he is a conquered enemy; the Captain of our salvation has disarmed him; we have nothing to do but pursue the victory.

Behold, angels came and ministered unto Him, in a visible appearance, as the devil had done in the temptation. While the devil made tempted to the mind of Christ, as if He had seen them with his eyes, and beheld the wealth, magnificence, and honor, which appear glorious to men. And Satan vowed, that all these were at his disposal; and that he was so pleased with Jesus, as to be ready to give Him the possession of them for one single prostration, one transient act of worship.—Doubtless Satan can use worldly things as baits to allure his votaries; but nothing could be more false, than to pretend that God had retired from the government of the world, in order that the devil might dispose of it as he pleased. And nothing could be more arrogant than to require the incarnate Son of God to worship him. Whatever disguise this ambition of spirit had before assumed, (for we suppose him to be the leader of the army of apostate angels,) his diabolical designs were now manifested, and Christ addressed him by his name, 'Satan,' adversary of God and men, and commanded him to depart, for it was written 'thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and Him only shalt thou serve. (Mat. 22: 37.) The Savior here spake as Man, who is forbidden to worship any other than God.—Thus the enemy was baffled, left the Redeemer, and for a time did not renew his temptations. Then angels came, as if to congratulate Him, do Him honor, and supply his wants. SCOTT.

Kingdoms of the world. (8.) If these words are taken literally, this must, of necessity, have been a visionary representation; and is so contemplated by Henry, Doddridge and Scott. Bengel remarks, that Satan 'exhibited to the eye what the horizon embraced, and probably described or indicated the rest.' But, observes Dr. A. Clarke, 'we take the word to mean only the land of Judea and some of the surrounding nations, as it appears sometimes to signify, (see on Luke 2: 1.) then the mountain described by the Abbe Martini, could have afforded the prospect.' 'Here,' says he, 'we enjoy, in the most beautiful

God, and him only shalt thou serve.

11 Then *the devil leaveth him, and, 'behold, angels came and ministered unto him.

Christ was thus succored for his encouragement, that He might see the powers of heaven siding with Him, and also for our encouragement to trust in Him; for as He knew what it was to suffer, being tempted, so He knew how comfortable it was to be succored; and thus we may expect that He will not only sympathize with, but relieve his tempted people; as our great Melchisedec met Abraham returning from battle, and, as the angels here, ministered to him.

Christ having been thus signalized in the invisible world by the voice of the Father, the descent of the Spirit, his victory over devils, and his dominion over angels, was doubtless qualified to appear in the visible world as the Mediator between God and man; for consider how great this man was!

his assaults, the angels stood at a distance, that it might appear that Christ vanquished Satan in his own strength, and that afterward when Michael makes use of his angels, in fighting with the dragon and his angels, it might appear that it is not because He needs them, but because He is pleased to honor, by employing, them. One angel might have served, but here are many, ready to testify their respect, and receive his commands. Observe, That as there is a world of malicious spirits fighting against Christ and his church, so there is a world of blessed spirits engaged for them. In our war with devils, we may have abundant comfort from our communion with angels. Christ's victories are the angel's triumphs. The angels came to congratulate Christ on his success, and to give the glory due to his name; for that was sung with a great voice in heaven when the dragon was cast out, (Rev. 12: 9, 10.) Now is come salvation and strength. The angels ministered not only food, but whatever else He wanted. See how Christ's humiliation was balanced with tokens of his glory, as when He was crucified in weakness, yet He lived by the power of God; so when He was tempted by hunger and weariness, by his divine power He commanded the ministration of angels. The Son of man did eat angel's food; thus Elias is fed by an angel in the wilderness, 1 Kings 19: 4, 7. Note, Though God may suffer his people to be brought into straits, yet He had rather send angels to feed them, than see them perish. Trust in the Lord, and verily thou shalt be fed, Ps. 37: 3.

Some passages, particularly in John's Gospel, are supposed to intervene between Christ's temptation and his preaching in Galilee. His first appearance after his temptation was, when John Baptist said, Behold the Lamb of God! John 1: 29. After that, He went up to Jerusalem to the passover, (John 2.) discourse with Nicodemus, (John 3.) with the woman of Samaria, (John 4.) and then returned into Galilee, and preached. But Matthew, residing in Galilee, begins the story of his public ministry with his preaching there. Observe,

1. When Jesus had heard that John was cast into prison, then He went into Galilee, v. 12.-- Note, The cry of the saints' suffering, comes up into the ears of the Lord Jesus. If John be cast into prison, Jesus hears it, takes cognizance of it, and steers his course accordingly; He remembers the bonds and afflictions that abide his people. Observe,

1. Christ did not go into the country till He heard of John's imprisonment, for he must have time given him to prepare the way of the Lord, before the Lord Himself should appear. Providence wisely ordered it that John should be eclipsed before Christ shone forth; otherwise the minds of people would have been distracted between the two; one would have said, I am of John, and another, I am of Jesus.— John must be Christ's harkener, but not his rival. The moon and stars are lost when the sun rises. John had done his work by the baptism of repentance, and then is laid aside.— The witnesses were not slain till they had finished their testimony, Rev. 11: 7. He went into the country, not only to provide for his own safety, knowing that the Pharisees in Judea were as much enemies to Him as Herod was to John, but to supply the want of John, and to build upon the good foundation, that He laid. Note, God will not leave Him without witness, nor his church without guides; when He removes one useful instrument He can raise up another, for He has the residue of the Spirit, and He will do it if He has work to do. Moses my servant is dead; John is cast into prison; now therefore, Joshua, arise; Jesus, arise.

2. Galilee, where he preached, lay in a remote part of the country, and was looked upon at Jerusalem with contempt. The inhabitants were stout men, reckoned to be fit for soldiers, but not for scholars. Thither Christ went, and set up the standard of the Gospel. Observe,— He did not choose Nazareth, where He had been brought up, for his residence, for the men of that city thrust Him out from among them,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 8-11. The believer should not despond, if assaulted by temptations to infidelity, blasphemy, suicide, or other dreadful crimes; for Christ was tempted to ambition, and even to worship the devil. The more painful they are, the less likely are they to defile us; as bad language fails to pollute us in proportion as it grieves our hearts. By thorough observation our enemy knows how powerfully authority, honor, and the glory of kingdoms attract the minds of men. It was vain presumption in him to suppose, that the divine Redeemer could thus be allured. We are by nature prone to seize such supposed advantages; to forget, that the Lord alone disposes of them; to mistake these illusions for real good, and to render Satan any service, which he may require as the price of them. Alas! few men in all instances indignantly silence proposals of this kind. Yet 'what is a man profited, if he gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?' Conscious, then, of our weakness, we should pray not to be 'led into temptation,' and be thankful to be kept from it; for numbers, who seemed to run well, have given up religion for a little of the world; and believers have been hindered and pierced with anguish by yielding to these suggestions. (Note, 1 Tim. 6: 6-10.) Let us then beware of covetousness and ambition; store our minds with the word of God; 'worship the Lord and serve Him alone,' and not divide our heart between Him and mammon, which will be as ruinous as gross idolatry.—Where temptations are strong and the evil evident, we must not parley at all; for he that deliberates is already vanquished.—While we admire the patience and condescension of the Son of God in suffering Himself to be conveyed from place to place by this fiend, that as our Surety He might conquer him, let us copy his example, and pursue his victories, encouraged, because our Redeemer 'knows what sore temptations mean,' and because 'He suffered being tempted, that He might be able to succor them that are tempted.' Let us observe how angels ministered to Him, we refuse Satan's counsel to supply his own wants; and how 'all power in heaven and earth is given to Him,' who refused 'all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them.' If we resist the devil he will flee, and the Lord will give his angels charge over us; and if we refuse honors purchased by sin, we shall obtain a kingdom in heaven. Let us, then, fight the good fight of faith, and lay hold on eternal life. SCOTT

"tifi view. This part of the mountain overlooks the mountains of Arabia, the country of Gilead, the country of the Amorites, the plains of Moab, the plains of Jericho, the river Jordan, and the whole extent of the Dead Sea. Here the devil said to the Son of God, 'As these kingdoms will I give Thee, &c.' What renders this more probable is, that at this time, as Rosenmüller and Kuinoel have remarked, Palestine was divided into several parts, as Judea, Idumea, Samaria, Galilee, Perea, Auranitis and Trachonitis, in which Archelaus, Antipas and Philip, sons of Herod, governed, as kings or tetrarchs. Ec. Thou shalt worship, &c. (10) 'These words compared with other Scriptures shew, that Christ is not a creature, for the worship and service due to God cannot be given to a creature, that being to own Him equal with God, and idolatry consists chiefly in giving to a creature the worship which is due only to God. Religious adoration and adoration cannot, then, be given without idolatry to Christ, if He be only a creature. Since then, God requires, 'that all men should worship the Son even as they worship the Father,' and 'when He "brought the First-born into the world, said, Let all the angels of God 'worship Him;' and since Christians 'serve the Lord Christ,' He 'cannot be a creature, but must be truly God.' WHITE.

Notes 12-17. Soon after John had baptized our Lord, he offended Herod the tetrarch, was cast into prison, ended his ministry, and shortly after his useful life. It is clear, however, that Jesus began his ministry, and became eminent, some time before John was cast into prison. (Notes, John 1: 29-51, 2: 1-12, 3: 22-36, 4: 1-3.) At that time He preached more fully and openly in the northern part of the land. He had, perhaps, been at Jerusalem, at a solemn feast, when this account was brought to Him, and He departed into Galilee; then leaving his habitation at Nazareth. (Joseph perhaps being dead, as we read no more of him.) He abode in Capernaum, a city on the borders of the tribes of Zabulon and Nephthalim, on the coast of the sea of Galilee, or the Sea of Galilee. This was done to fulfil a prophecy of Isaiah. (Notes, Is. 9: 1, 2.) Thus in Galilee, bordering on the Gentiles, where such darkness had prevailed,

14 That * it might be filled which was spoken by Esaias the prophet, saying,

15 The land of Zabulon, and the land of Naphthaliim, by the way of the sea, beyond Jordan, Galilee of the Gentiles:

16 The people which sat in darkness saw great light; and to them, which sat in the death, light is sprung up.

17 From that time Jesus began to preach, and to say, Repent: for the kingdom of heaven is at hand.

second captivity under the Jews. 15: 29. The punishment of the Jews for rejecting the Gospel should be sorer than either, (Isa. 8: 21, 22,) for those places saw a great light again, ch. 9: 12. This is Isaiah's sense, but, as the Scripture has many fulfillings, the evangelist takes only the latter clause, which speaks of the returning prosperity of those captured countries, and applies it to the appearing of the Gospel among them.

Zebulun is rightly said to be by the seacoast, for Zebulun was a haven of ships, and rejoiced in her going out. Gen. 49: 13. Deut. 33: 13. Of Naphthali it had been said, that he should give goodly words, (Gen. 49: 21,) and should be satisfied with favor. Deut. 33: 23. For from him began the Gospel; goodly words indeed, and such as bring to a soul God's satisfying favor. The country beyond Jordan is mentioned, for there sometimes Christ preached, and Galilee of the Gentiles, the upper Galilee, to which the Gentiles resorted for traffic, where they were mingled with the Jews, intimating a kindness in reserve for the poor Gentiles. When Christ came to Capernaum, the Gospel came to all the places round about; such diffusive influence had the Son of righteousness.

The inhabitants were in darkness. Note, Those who are without Christ, are darkness itself, as the darkness that was upon the face of the deep. Nay, they were in the region and shadow of death, which denotes not only great darkness, as the grave is a land of darkness, but great danger. A man desperately sick is in the valley of the shadow of Death, though not quite dead; so the poor people were in the borders of damnation, though not yet damned, dead in law, and worst of all, they were sitting in this condition. Where we sit, we mean to stay. They were in the dark, despairing of finding the way out. And sitting is a contented posture; they chose darkness rather than light; they were willingly ignorant. Their condition was sad; it is still the condition of many great and mighty nations, which are to be thought of, and prayed for with pity. But their condition is more sad, who sit in darkness in the midst of Gospel light. He that is in the dark because it is night, may be sure that the sun will shortly arise; but he that is dark because he is blind, will not so soon have his eyes opened. We have the light, but what will bat avail us, if we be not in the light in the Lord? When the Gospel came, it was a reviving as great as ever light was to a benighted traveller. Note, When the Gospel comes into any soul, it makes day there. John 3: 19. Luke 1: 78, 79. Light is discovering, it is directing; so is the Gospel. It is a great light, denoting the clearness of Gospel revelations; not like a candle, but like the sun when he goes forth in his strength. Great in comparison with the light of the law, the shadows of which were now gone away. It is great as it discovers things of vast consequence; it will last long, and spread far. It is a growing light, intimated in that text, it is springing up. It was but springing up with them; it afterwards shone more and more. The Gospel kingdom, like a grain of mustard seed, or the morning light, was small in its beginnings, gradual in its growth, but great in its perfection.

Observe, The light sprung up to them; they did not go to seek it, but were prevented with the blessings of goodness. It came, by the disposal of Him, who commandeth the morning, and caused the day-spring to appear in the morning, that it may take hold of the ends of the earth, Job 38: 12, 13.

From that time, that is, from the time of his coming into the land of Zebulun and Naphthali. He began to preach. He had been before this in Judea, and had baptized many disciples: John 4: 1. but his preaching was not so public and constant as now. The work of the ministry is so great and awful, that it is fit to be entered upon by gradual advances. The sun and substance of all Christ's preaching was the same with that of John, Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand: for the Gospel is the same for substance under various denominations: an angel from heaven did not preach any other Gospel, (Gal. 1: 8,) and will preach this, for it is the everlasting Gospel. Fear God, and, by repentance, give honor to Him, Rev. 14: 6, 7. Christ put a great respect upon John's ministry when He preached in the same purport. By this He showed that John was his ambassador and messenger. Thus God confirmed the word of his messengers, Isa. 44: 26. The Son came to the same errand that the servants came on, ch. 21: 37, to seek fruit, fruits meet for repentance. Christ, from the bosom of the Father, could have preached sublime notions of heavenly things to alarm and amuse the learned world; but He pitches upon this old, plain text, Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand. Ministers must not be ambitious of proposing new opinions, framing new schemes, or coining new expressions, but must content themselves with plain, practical things, with the Word that is high us, even in our mouth, and in our heart. We need not go up to heaven, nor down to the deep, for matter or language in our preaching. As John prepared Christ's way, so Christ prepared his own, and made way for the Father's assistance. He conformed with the doctrine of repentance. If any man will do this part of his will, he shall know more of his doctrine, John 7: 17. Neither He nor his followers ever reasoned it worn threadbare, as those would have done, who have nothing new, and are fond of novelty and variety more than of that which is truly edifying.

21. that it was 'in the region of the shadow of death' the light of the Gospel shone forth. 22. as Jesus began to preach, the same doctrine which He had preached in another part of the land. Stronger language could not be employed in describing the darkness of the Gentiles. This part of Galilee was not far distant from Tyre and Sidon; and had given the king of Tyre twenty cities in that time, (Isaiah 23: 15.) The evangelist here (22) The darkness was made by translating the Hebrew phrase, a place not yet lighted up, the place of darkness, and not yet lighted up for working. It differs more from the LXX, but is understood. 23. Nay, they were in the valley of the shadow of death, the region of the shadow of death, mentioned in Job 12. (These are passed over in the narrative of Matthew as observed by Henry, and to be learned by a careful examination of the other evangelists, particularly Luke and John, quoted above; see also Mark 1: 14, 15, and the Hebrews, especially of David and Melchizedek. The time that elapsed Bet Peor, the time that elapsed about a year, and Mr. Wotton's question, 'John was not passed over to Jericho, but beyond Jericho, where he was to preach. One John preached a few miles from among his followers, who went with him, Matthew 23: 12.)

Andrew, Simon, Philip, and Nathaniel (supposed the same as Bartholomew, son of Tolmai or Ptolemy) were of this number, who were witnesses of his first miracle at Cana. Thence, after visiting Capernaum, He went to James and John, to attend the Passover, and now the story of John's imprisonment, conceived again at Galilee, intent on preaching the Gospel, and tending the people. CALMET. Galilee, also. Referring to the accompanying map for the better reason of this large and populous part of what is familiarly called the Holy Land, it may yet be expedient to notice that it was so Dr. Wall's remarks, 'most famous for the Spirit's presence.' Here at Nazareth, his most sweet, yet his most glorious, cooperation was manifested. Luke 1: 26, 27. He was intimate from Egypt, whence a child, here He dwelt in the Nazareth, near at his eye, when He was conceived in John 1: 26, 27. 2: 1, 2. Luke 2: 26, 27. 2: 28. and returned to Nazareth, where He dwelt, Luke 4: 14. He dwelt in Nazareth, which was a small town, with people of those of Asher and Dan, who was divided into Upper, or mountainous, called Galilee of the Gentiles, and Lower Galilee. Es

18 ¶ And Jesus, walking by the sea of Galilee, saw two brethren, Simon called Peter, and Andrew his brother, casting a net into the sea: for they were fishers.

19 And he saith unto them, Follow me and I will make you fishers of men.

20 And they straightway left their nets, and followed him.

21 And going on from thence, he saw other two brethren, James the son of Zebedee, and John his brother, in a ship with Zebedee their

ing. Note, That which has been preached before, may yet very profitably be preached again, but then it should be preached and heard with new affections; what Paul had said before, he said again, weeping, Phil. 1: 3, 18. This He preached as Gospel, Repent, review your ways, and return to yourselves. Note, The doctrine of repentance is right Gospel doctrine. Not only the austere Baptist, but the sweet and gracious Jesus, whose lips dropped as an honey-comb, preached repentance; for it is an unspeakable privilege that room is left for repentance. The reason is still the same. The kingdom of heaven is at hand; for it was not reckoned to be fully come, till the pouring out of the Spirit, after Christ's ascension. John had preached the kingdom of heaven at hand above a year before, but now that it was so much nearer, the argument was so much stronger. Now is the salvation nearer, Rom. 13: 11. We should be so much the more quickened to our duty, as we see the day approaching, Heb. 10: 25.

V. 18-22. When Christ began to preach, He began to gather disciples, now the hearers, afterwards the preachers, of his doctrine; now the witnesses of his miracles, and hereafter concerning them.

In all Christ's preaching, He gave a common call to the whole country; here He gave a special call to those who were given Him by the Father. Let us see and admire the power of Christ's grace, own his word to be the rod of his strength, and wait upon Him for the powerful and distinguishing influences of his Gospel. All the country was called, but those who were called out were redeemed from among men.—Christ was manifested to them as He was not to the world. It was an instance of ordination to the ministry. When Christ, as a Teacher, set up his great school, one of his first works was to appoint ushers, or under-masters, to be employed in the work of instruction. Now He began to give gifts unto men, to put the treasure into earthen vessels. It was an early instance of his care for his church.

employed in the work of instruction. Now He began to give gifts unto men, to put the treasure into earthen vessels. It was an early instance of his care for his church.

1. It was by the sea of Galilee. Concerning this sea, the Jews say, That of all the seven seas God made, He chose alone the sea of Genesareth, which is very applicable to Christ, who often honored it with his presence and miracles. Here, Christ was walking for contemplation, as Isaac was in the field; neither He went to call disciples; not to Herod's court; (for few mighty or noble are called; not to Jerusalem, among the chief priests and scribes, but to the sea of Galilee. Surely, Christ sees not as man sees. Not but that the same power, which effectually called Peter and Andrew, would have wrought upon Annas and Caiaphas, for with God nothing is impossible; but, as in other things, He would humble Himself, and show that God has chosen the poor of this world. Galilee was a remote part of the nation; the inhabitants were less refined; their very language was uncouth, their speech betrayed them. They, who were picked up at the sea of Galilee, had not even the improvements of the more polished Galileans; yet thither Christ went, to call his apostles, who were to be the prime ministers of state in his kingdom, for He chooses the foolish things of the world, to confound the wise.

2. We have an account of the call of two pair of brothers. Peter and Andrew, and perhaps James and John, were acquainted with Christ before, (John 1: 40, 41.) but were not, till now, called to a constant attendance on Him. Note, Christ brings poor souls by degrees into fellowship with Himself. They had been disciples of John's, and so were the better disposed to follow Christ. Note Those who have submitted to the discipline of repentance, shall be welcome to the joys of faith.

They were brothers. It is a blessed thing when they who are kinsmen according to the flesh, as the apostle speaks, (Rom. 9: 3.) are brethren in Christ Jesus. It is the honor and comfort of a house, when those of the same family are of God's family.

Being fishermen, they were poor; if they had had estates, or any considerable stock, they would not have made it their trade, but their recreation. Note, Christ does not despise the poor, and we must not; the poor are evangelized, and the Fountain of honor sometimes gives more abundant honor to that river which most lacked. They were unlearned men, not bred to literature, as Moses, who was conversant with all the learning of the Egyptians. Note, Christ sometimes endows those with gifts of grace, who have least of the gifts of nature; yet this justifies not the bold intrusion of ignorant men into the ministry. Extraordinary gifts of knowledge and utterance are not now to be expected, but requisite ability must be obtained in the ordinary way; and without a competent measure of it, none are to be admitted to that service. They were men of business, bred to labor. Note, Diligence in an honest calling, is pleasing to Christ, and no hindrance to a holy life. Moses and David were called from keeping sheep. Idle people lie more open to temptation than to the calls of God. They were accustomed to hardships; the fisher's trade is more perilous than any other. He must be often wet and cold, and in peril by waters, and must watch, wait, and toil. Note, Those who have learned to bear hardship, are best prepared for the discipleship of Jesus Christ. Good soldiers of Christ must endure hardness.

3. Peter and Andrew were using their nets, and James and John were mending theirs, an instance of industry and good husbandry.—They did not go to their father for new nets, but took pains to mend their old ones. It is commendable to make what we have go as far as may be. James and John were with their father Zebedee, to assist him, and make his business easy to him. Note, It is a happy presage when children are careful of their parents. Observe, They were all very busy. When Christ comes, it is good to be found doing.—'Am I in Christ?' is a very needful question for us to ask ourselves; and next to that, 'Am I in my calling?' They were differently employed. Note, Ministers should be always teaching or studying; they may always find something to do. Mending their nets is, in its season, as necessary as fishing.

4. They had followed Christ before as ordinary disciples, (John 1: 37.) They might both follow Christ and their calling. Now they must constantly attend on Him, and leave their calling. Note, Such as have been called to follow Christ need to be called to follow on, and to follow nearer, especially when designed for the ministry.

I will make you fishers of men; alluding to their former calling. Let them not now be proud; they are still but fishers. Let them not be afraid of the new work cut out for them, for they have been used to fishing, and fishers they are still. It was usual with Christ to speak of heavenly things under such allusions, as took rise from common things. David was called from feeding sheep to feed God's Israel; and when a king, is a shepherd. Note, Ministers are fishers of men, not to destroy them, but to save them by bringing them into another element. They must fish, not for wealth, honor or preferment, but to gain souls to Christ.—They watch for your souls, (Heb. 13: 17.) and seek not yours, but you, (2 Cor. 12: 14, 16.) It is Christ that makes them fishers of men. He qualifies men for this work, calls them to it, authorizes them in it, and gives them success.—He commissions them to fish for souls, and gives wisdom to win them. Such ministers are likely to have comfort in their work.

Follow Me. They must separate themselves to a diligent attendance on Him, and an humble imitation of Him. Note, Those whom Christ employs, must be fitted for it. Those who would preach Christ, must first learn Christ.—How can we expect to bring others to Christ, when we are ignorant of Him ourselves? If we would know Him, we must be diligent in attendance on Him. The apostles were prepared by accompanying Christ all the time He went in and out among them, Acts 1: 21. No learning is comparable to that which is obtained

Jesus had already been acknowledged as the Messiah by Andrew and Peter, but they seem not to have been required to leave their employments, and accompany Him constantly, with a view to the ministry and fellowship. (Note, John 1: 35-42.) The miraculous draught of fishes, related by Luk, probably occurred either before, or soon after these events. (Marg. Ref.—Note, Luke 5: 1-11.) Scott. Every preacher commissioned of God to proclaim salvation to a lost world, begins with the doctrine of repentance. So did all the prophets. John the Baptist, Jesus Christ, all the apostles, and all their genuine successors in the Christian ministry. But why did not our Lord call some of the eminent scribes or Pharisees to publish his Gospel, and not poor, unlearned fishermen, without credit or authority? Because they were to preach the kingdom of heaven, and their teaching must come from above; besides, though the conversion of sinners be effected instrumentally by the preaching of the Gospel, yet the great agent in it is the Spirit of God.—As the instruments were comparatively mean, and the work accomplished grand and glorious, the excellency of the power at once appeared to be of God, and not of man; and thus the glory, due alone to his name, was secured, and the great honor of his glory had the deserved praise.

22 And they immediately left the ship and their father, and followed him.

23 ¶ And Jesus went about all Galilee, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the gospel of the kingdom, and healing all manner of sickness and all manner of disease among the people.

24 And his fame went throughout all Syria: and they brought unto him all sick people that were taken with divers diseases and torments, and those which were possessed with devils, and those which were lunatic, and those that had the palsy; and he healed them.

25 And there followed him great multitudes of people from Galilee, and from Decapolis, and from Jerusalem, and from Judea, and as far beyond Jordan.

by following Christ. Joshua, by ministering to Moses, is fitted to be his successor. Those who fish for men, must do it as Christ did, with diligence, faithfulness, and tenderness. Christ is the great Pattern for preachers. They should be workers together with Him.

5. Peter and Andrew straightway left their nets, and James and John immediately left the ship and their father, and they all followed Him. Note, Those, who would follow Christ aright, must leave all to follow Him. They must hate father and mother, (Luke 14: 26,) love them less than Christ, be ready to part with their interest in them, rather than with their interest in Jesus Christ; but ministers must, in a special manner, disentangle themselves from all the affairs of this life, to give themselves wholly to that work, which requires the whole man.

We are here encouraged to depend upon the sufficiency of his grace. He speaks and it is done. The same power goes along with this word of Christ, Follow me, that went along with that word, Lazarus, come forth; a power to make willing, Ps. 110: 3. The disciples gave a good example of obedience. Note, It is the mark of all Christ's faithful servants to come when called. They objected not their occupations, families, the difficulties of the service, or their own unfitness. Like Abraham, being called, they obeyed, and went out, not knowing whither they went, but knowing very well whom they followed. James and John left their father; it is not said what became of him; their mother Salome was a constant follower of Christ. No doubt Zebedee was a believer, but the call to follow Christ, fastened on the young ones.— Youth is the learning and laboring age. The priests ministered in the prime of their time.

V. 23–25. 1. What an industrious preacher Christ was! Observe what He preached—the Gospel of the kingdom, the kingdom of heaven, that is, of grace and glory. It was emphatically the kingdom, which shall survive, as it doth surpass, all the kingdoms of the earth. The Gospel is the charter of that kingdom, containing the king's coronation oath, by which He has graciously obliged Himself to pardon, protect, and save the subjects of that kingdom. It contains also their oath of allegiance, by which they oblige themselves to observe his statutes, and seek his honor. This is the Gospel of the kingdom; this Christ preached, that our faith in it might be confirmed. He preached chiefly in the synagogues, because there were the places of concourse; (Prov. 1: 21.) there it was to be hoped the minds of the people would be prepared to receive the Gospel; and there the Old Testament was read, the exposition of which would easily introduce it. He went about Galilee. He might have issued a proclamation to summon all to come to Him; but, to show his humility, He goes to them; He waits to be gra- cious, He comes to seek and save. Josephus says there were above two hundred cities and towns in Galilee, and all, or most of them, Christ visited. He went about doing good. Never was there such an indefatigable itinerant preacher as Christ; He went from town to town, to beseech poor sinners to be reconciled to God.— This is an example for ministers, to be instant, in season, and out of season, to preach the word.

2. What a powerful Physician! He cured all diseases without exception. There are diseases, which are called the reproach of physicians, being obstinate to all the methods they prescribe; but even those were the glory of this Physician, for He healed them all, however inveterate. Three general words are here used—every sickness, as blindness, fever, dropsy; every disease, as fluxes, consumptions; all torments, as gout, stone, convulsions, and such like torturing distempers; whether the disease was acute or chronic, racking or wasting, none was too bad, or hard for Him to heal with a word.

Three particular diseases are specified—palsy, the greatest weakness of the body—lunacy, the greatest malady of the mind—and possession of the devil, a greater misery and calamity than both; yet Christ healed all, for He is the sovereign Physician of soul and body. A physician so ready of access, so sure to succeed, who cured immediately, without painful suspense and expectation, or with remedies worse than the disease, and who cured gratis, could not but have many patients. Great multitudes came, not only from Galilee, and the country about, but from Jerusalem and Judea, which lay a great way off; for his fame went throughout all Syria, not only among Jews, but surrounding nations, which, by the report now spread abroad concerning Him, would be prepared to receive afterward his Gospel. Note, What we hear of Christ from others, should invite us to Him.— The Queen of Sheba was induced by the fame of Solomon to visit him. The voice of fame is, 'Come and see.' Christ both taught and healed. They who came for cures, met with spiritual instruction. It is well if any thing will bring people to Christ. They who come to Him will find more than they expected. Many of these Syrians, coming to be healed, like Naaman, became converts, (2 Kings, 5: 15, 17.)— They sought health for the body, and found the salvation of the soul; like Saul, who sought the asses, and found the kingdom; yet it appeared that many who rejoiced in Christ as a Healer, forgot Him as a Teacher.

Observe, once for all, the miracle, the mercy, and the mystery of these cures. They were so wrought, as plainly to declare them the effect of supernatural power, and were God's seal to his commission. It was not nature, but the God of nature. The cures were many, of diseases incurable by the physician's art; of strangers;

Jesus having procured these attendants, not from the schools or palaces of Jerusalem, but from the fisher-boats of Galilee, went about preaching in the synagogues, or places of worship. A better opportunity of discussing many subjects relating to diseases, possessions, lunatics, &c. will be furnished by particular instances: only it may be objected, that this display of our Lord's divine power marked the gracious design of his undertaking, and excited attention to his doctrine. (Marg. Ref. f. g. h.—) It should, however, be noticed, that persons possessed with devils are here expressly distinguished from lunatics; they could not, then, be the same, as some learned men seem to think. 'It seems strange,' says Whitby, 'to find men now questioning that, which neither Pharisee nor Sadducee then doubted, or objected against, the pretensions of Christ and his apostles to cast out devils.' SCOTT. Synagogues. (23) This word, simply denoting assemblies, is applied to the Jewish places for divine worship. These, it is thought, were not established until after the return from captivity at Babylon. Where the Jews were willing and able to devote themselves to the service, we find a synagogue must be erected. This institution, in judgment of the learned Pridaure, followed that solemn reading of the law by Ezra, mentioned Neh. ch. 8, and was intended to multiply the copies of the Sacred Scriptures, (since every synagogue must, of course, possess one,) and to bring the people into familiar and habitual acquaintance with them, as well as to afford facilities for Divine worship. At first they were few in number, but afterwards multiplied; so that, in our Saviour's time, there was no town in Judea that had not one or more of them; until they became like parish churches.— The service consisted in, prayer, reading the Scriptures, (Acts 15: 21,) and expounding them to the people. See an example in our Lord's entering the synagogue at Nazareth, Luke 4: 16–22. (where He complied with the ordinary practice in standing to read, and sitting down, in order to expound, or preach,) and also in Paul at Antioch, Acts 13: 14, 15. On two of the week days they assembled for this service, beside the Sabbath, and on each of these three days thrice, morning, afternoon, and at night. See Ps. 55: 17, and Dan. 6: 10. The synagogue ministrations were not confined to the sacerdotal order; 'any one,' says Pridaure, 'that by learning was qualified for it, of what tribe soever he were,' might conduct the service. Yet, for preserving order, there were fixed officers. Such were the ruler of the synagogue, and its minister, called also angel, whence 'the angels of the churches,' Rev. 1: 2: 3: then oversers, to manage its various necessary concerns. Each synagogue had also an ark, or chest, to contain the Pentateuch, and sections of the prophets a desk or pulpit, seats, lamps, and apartments for utensils. Vitranga, Lightfoot and others have exemplified the deduction of our ordinary mode of public worship in great degree from the practice of the synagogue. Ep. Syria. (24) The country so denominated was of large extent, deriving its original name from the patriarch Aram, and included Mesopotamia, as well as the territory between Cilicia, Phœnicia, Judea, Arabia, and the Euphrates. But, speaking more strictly, it denotes the country of which Antioch was the capital. CALMET. Decapolis. (25) A region containing ten cities, as its name imports. But geographers differ in the enumeration of them. Pliny and Josephus place the country next to Syria, [adjoining Galilee on the east; (see the map); Damascus, the most ancient of its cities, being the capital; Dr A. Clarke:] and it contained, along with Gentile inhabitants, very many Jews.

NOTE. The subject of demoniacal possession being in this chapter mentioned for the first time in the New Testament, it may well conform with the design of this Commentary to observe, that, as many of its readers doubtless know, there has been on this point a diversity of opinion. Now, although he feels not bound to notice every such diversity, or to present this as a controversial work to the public, yet the editor would Christ shows who are happy, 1-12. His disciples, as 'the salt of the earth' and 'the light of the world,' and as 'a city set on a hill' and 'a candle in a room,' must be bright examples in good works, 13-16. He came not to destroy, but to fulfill and exalt, the law, 17-20. The strict commandment, violated from corrupt passions, and spiritually expounded, will be enforced, 21-26; and the seventh, 27-32; and the third, 33-37. from God; but Christ's miracles were most of them cures, and all of them, except the cursing of the fig-tree, blessings. The Gospel dispensation is founded and built up in love, grace, and sweetness, tending not to affright, but allure us to obedience. Christ designed by his cures to draw his people with bands of love, Hos. 11: 4. The miracle of them proved his doctrine a faithful saying, and convinced men's judgments; the mercy of them proved it worthy of all acceptance, and wrought upon their affections. They were not only good works, but good works, that he showed them from his Father; (John 10: 32.) and his goodness was intended to lead men to repentance, (Rom. 2: 4.) as also to show that the utmost kindness and beneficence are essential branches of the Christian religion.

By curing bodily diseases, He intended to show, that his great errand was to wrought openly, before many witnesses; in mixed companies of persons who would have denied the matter of fact, could they have had color for it. No cures failed or were called in question; and they were not, as natural cures, gradual; they were perfect, speedy, wrought with a word; all which proves Him a Teacher from God; for, otherwise, none could have done the works that He did, (John 3: 2.) He appeals to these as credentials, ch. 11: 4, 5. John 5: 36. It was expected that the Messiah should work miracles, (John 7: 31.) miracles of this kind; (Isa. 35: 5, 6.) and we have this indisputable proof of his being the Messiah. No man ever did thus, and therefore Christ's healing and preaching generally went together; the former confirmed the latter. Thus, He began to do and to teach; Acts 1: 1.

They were miracles of mercy. Most of Moses' miracles were plagues and judgments, intimating the terror of that dispensation, though from God; but Christ's miracles were most of them cures, and all of them, except the cursing of the fig-tree, blessings. The Gospel dispensation is founded and built up in love, grace, and sweetness, tending not to affright, but allure us to obedience. Christ designed by his cures to draw his people with bands of love, Hos. 11: 4. The miracle of them proved his doctrine a faithful saying, and convinced men's judgments; the mercy of them proved it worthy of all acceptance, and wrought upon their affections. They were not only good works, but good works, that he showed them from his Father; (John 10: 32.) and his goodness was intended to lead men to repentance, (Rom. 2: 4.) as also to show that the utmost kindness and beneficence are essential branches of the Christian religion.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 12-25. Our services and trials are short. When an instrument is laid aside, the Lord calls forth others; and when useful men are taken to their rest, we should redouble our diligence. The places where the pure Gospel is preached are highly favored. Without this blessing, the people 'sit in darkness and the shadow of death.' This was the case of the Jews, as well as of the Gentiles; and is now that of nominal Christians in many places, as well as of Jews, Pagans and Mohammedans; but when the word is fully declared, they 'see a great light.' May such walk in the light, as the children of the light; and may that blessed light be vouchsafed to the whole earth!—All who preach the Gospel must call men to repentance, that they may share the blessings and bring forth the fruits of salvation.—Next to religion, honest industry is most valuable; they are more likely to be useful ministers, who spend their youth in self-denying labor, than they, who professing to be students, waste their time in pleasures, dissipation, sloth and self-indulgence. Shepherds, husbandmen, or builders may stand as fair to take good care of the Lord's flock, husbandmen, or building, as these fishers to become 'fishers of men,' if He please to call them to it. But let none despise instruction, learning, or preparation for the ministry. Christ was the Tutor of those, whom He first sent to preach; and having taught them wisdom by his own lips, as well as by the Holy Spirit, He qualified them for their work by miraculously giving them the knowledge of languages.—When He speaks to the heart, men leave all and follow Him. Even the demand of parents on our services is subordinate to his right, and must be relinquished, if He command. When ministers are not employed in casting their nets, they should be mending them; and they will find work for all their time, patience, and assiduity.—Our diseases are not now cured by the miraculous power of the Savior; but if we be cured by medicine, the praise is equally his due. He is the Physician of our souls, and if we follow his directions, He will perfectly heal our maladies. We cannot draw others to the Gospel by miracles of love; but if we abound in ordinary charity, we shall recommend the truth, and perhaps induce many to attend on the Word, by which they will be healed of spiritual lunacy, and Satan be dispossessed, 'who now holds them captives at his will.' Thus our God and Savior will be glorified by us, and others will bless Him on our behalf. SCOTT.

neither be, nor appear to be, ignorant of fact, in relation to such views, when they are of essential importance. The opposition of sentiment in the present case is not a denial of the existence of miracles, wrought by Christ, for, as was observed by the late excellent Dr. Appleton, 'as to the inferences which might be made from either of these opinions, we are not to charge those who hold either one or the other as doubting the divine authority of Christ, or the integrity of the evangelists.' The difference lies between adopting the literal import of the narrative, and supposing our Lord, his disciples, and the evangelists to act and speak in compliance with popular errors. The former opinion is that, as is perceived, of Henry, Doddridge and Scott, and it may be added, of the generality of commentators. But the latter has had abettors of high reputation. They state, among their arguments, that others, beside the Jews designated certain diseased persons as affected by demons; that the doctrine has caused innumerable superstitious practices; that madness and melancholy exhibits now similar appearances, and are accounted for; and that 'in the highly figurative language of the east, almost every cause assumes a sort of personal agency.' To all this it is replied. The evangelists affirm plainly that the demoniacs were possessed with devils; that Jesus spake to the demons as to persons, and they answered as such; and that, without violence, this cannot apply to natural diseases. See Mark 1: 25. 9: 25. 5: 8. Luke 4: 35. 2. Our Lord expressly distinguished, in the charge He gave to the twelve, between the casting out of devils and the healing of diseases; which is the same distinction in the narrative, as ch. 8: 16. Mark 1: 32. 34. Luke 7: 21. Acts 10: 38, must be 'absurd,' says Dr. Macknight, 'if Demonism were only a natural distemper.' 3. The abuse of scriptural representations does not prove their falsity; nor are there many doctrines which, at times, have not been abused. Christianity, therefore, is not answerable for this. 4. Allowing that insanity and several of the diseases classed with it have natural causes, it will not follow that they might not give occasion to demoniac influence, or admit its operation, though it be granted they do not render necessary its presence now. And, as one will pretend to fix a period, 'says Hewlett, 'when the power of demons to afflict or aggravate diseases first commenced.' The malignant agency of these beings once admitted, also, who can say how far it extends? It is, indeed, matter for gratitude, that all vicious, malignant spirits are controlled by a Being wise, powerful, and benevolent. But 'in fact,' to use the words of Bp. Porteus, 'it appears that, about the time of our Lord's ministry, that tremendous spirit, Satan, [as a demon figure,] sometimes called in Scripture the prince of this world, [using, it appears, the instrumentality of 'demons,' viz evil angels,] had obtained an extraordinary degree of power over the human race, inflicting upon them the cruellest pains and torments, depriving them of their senses, rendering them wretched in themselves, and terrible to all around them. To subdue this formidable and wicked being, and to destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil, was one great object of our Savior's divine mission; and it seems to have been indispensably necessary for accomplishing the redemption of mankind, that the kingdom of Satan should in the first place be destroyed, and that the sons of men should be rescued from that horrible and disgraceful state of slavery in which he had long held them enthralled. One of the first steps therefore, that our Lord took before He entered on his ministry was, to establish his superiority over this great enemy of mankind: which He did in that memorable scene of the temptation in the wilderness; and among the earliest of his miracles recorded, is that of casting out devils from those who were possessed by them.' Were not all this actually true, it might well be said, as Pres. Appleton remarks, that, 'if the New Testament writers use language with such extraordinary freedom,—if they make such amazing concessions to the prejudices and errors of men, no person can have any distinct view of what was in fact their meaning,—no one can be certain when they relate things as they were in truth, and when they relate them as they appeared to vulgar and prejudiced minds.'

NOTES. Verses 1, 2.

In the last chapter it appeared that the divine Redeemer was surrounded by multitudes, whose diseases He healed. Here we find Him, instructing them in the concerns of their souls. He 'preached to them the Gospel of the kingdom: repentance was his first subject; and on the need and the effects of it He enlarged in the following sermon, which is the longest of his public discourses recorded. Though He had preached in the synagogues, yet as no building would probably contain this multitude, He ascended a mountain. Thus elevated above the people, He sat down, after the manner of the Jewish teachers, and instructed them. Those disciples, whom He had called to be his attendants, sat, as *his disciples came unto him.

2 And he opened his mouth, and taught them, saying,

Christ gave this exposition of the law on a mountain, because that on a mountain, the law was given; and this was also a solemn promulgation of the Christian law. But observe, when the law was given, the Lord came down upon the mountain, now He went up; then He spake in thunder and lightning, now, in a still small voice: then the people were commanded to keep at distance, now invited to draw near; a blessed change! If God's grace and goodness are, as certainly they are, his glory, then the glory of the Gospel excels, for grace and truth came by Jesus Christ. (2 Cor. 3:7. Heb. 12:18, &c.) It was foretold of Issachar and Zebulun, two tribes of Galilee, (Deut. 33:19.) that they shall call the people to the mountain. To this mountain we are called, to learn to offer the sacrifices of righteousness. Now was this the mountain of the Lord, where He taught us his ways; Isa. 2:2, 3. Mic. 4:1, 2.

3. The auditors, his disciples, came at his call; Mark 3:13. Luke 6:13. To them He directed his speech, for they followed Him for love and learning, others only for cures. He taught them, because they were willing to be taught; the meek will He teach his way; because they would understand what He taught, which to others was foolishness; and because they were to teach others. It was therefore requisite that they should have clear knowledge themselves. The duties prescribed were to be conscientiously performed by all, who would enter into the kingdom of heaven. But though this discourse was directed to the disciples, it was in the hearing of the multitude; for it is said, (ch. 7: 28,) the people were astonished. No bounds were set about this mountain, as about Sinai, (Ex. 19:12.) for through Christ, we have access to God, not only to speak to Him, but to hear from Him. Nay, He had a eye to the multitude; He took the opportunity of so great a concourse of people to instruct them. Note, It is an encouragement to a faithful minister to cast the net among many fishes, as he may hope to obtain some of them. The sight of a multitude puts life into a preacher, which yet must arise from a desire of their profit, not his own praise.

4. The solemnity of the sermon is intimated by the phrase, when He was set. Christ preached many occasional sermons, but this was a set discourse. He sat down as a Judge or Lawgiver. It intimates with what sedateness the things of God should be spoken and heard. He sat, that the Scriptures might be fulfilled, (Mal. 3: 3.) He shall sit as a refiner, to purge away the dross, the corrupt doctrines of the sons of Levi. He sat as in the throne, judging right; (Ps. 9: 4.) for the word He spake shall judge us. The phrase, He opened his mouth, is a Hebrew periphrasis, (Job 3: 1.) yet some think it intimates the solemnity of this discourse; the congregation being large, He spake the louder. He had spoken long by the prophets, and opened their mouths, (Ezek. 3: 27. 24: 27. 33: 22.) but now opened his own, and spake, as one having authority. One of the ancients says, Christ taught much without opening his mouth, that is, by exemplary life; nay, He taught, when, being led as a lamb to the slaughter, He opened not his mouth; but now, He opened his mouth, and taught, that the Scripture might be fulfilled, Prov. 8: 1, 2, 6. Doth not wisdom cry — on the top of high places? And the opening of her lips shall be right things. He taught them, according to Isa. 64: 13. All thy children shall be taught of the Lord. For this purpose, He had the tongue of the learned, Isa. 50: 4. and the Spirit of the Lord, Isa. 61: 1. He taught them the evil they should abhor, and the good they should abound in; for Christianity is not a speculation but designed to regulate our conversation and our minds. Gospel time is a time of reformation, (Heb. 9: 10.) By the Gospel we must be made better. The truth as it is in Jesus is according to godliness, Tit. 1: 1.

V. 3-12. Christ begins his sermon with blessings; for He came into the world to bless us, (Acts 3: 26,) as the great High Priest of our profession, as the blessed Melchizedek; as He, in whom all the families of the earth should be blessed, Gen. 12: 3. He came, not only to purchase blessings for us, but to pour out blessings upon us; He is as one that can command the blessing, life forevermore; and that is the blessing again and again promised to the good. — His pronouncing them happy makes them so; for those whom He blesses are blessed indeed. Each blessing has a double intention, to show the persons truly happy and what their characters are. The Old Testament ended with a curse, (Mal. 4: 2,) the Gospel begins with a blessing; for heretofore we were called, that we should inherit the blessing.

This is designed to rectify the mistakes of a carnal world. Blessedness is the thing men mean to pursue. Who will make us good? (Ps. 4: 6.) But most mistake the end, and form a wrong notion of happiness. They choose their own delusions, and court a shadow. The general opinion is, that they are blessed, who are rich, great, and honorable, who spend their years in pleasure, eat the fat, drink the sweet, carry all before them with a high hand, and have every sheaf bowing to their sheaf. — Happy the people that is in such a case. Their purposes are accordingly; they bless the covetous, (Ps. 10: 3.) They will be rich. Now our Lord comes to correct this fundamental error, and to advance a new hypothesis, which, however paradoxical in itself, is, and appears to be to seems, next to Him, and the multitude around them. The apostles were not at this time chosen, and they, who believed Him to be a teacher sent from God, are often called disciples: so that the interpretation must not be restricted to his constant attendants. Thus seated and surrounded, the divine Teacher solemnly and audibly taught them as follows. — The expression, 'opened his mouth,' seems to convey an idea of the gravity, deliberation and distinctness of the Speaker, and of the importance of that which was spoken. So ver. 1. 'The multitude here being those that were mentioned in v. 25. of ch. 4, this chapter ought to have commenced with that verse. Dr A. Clarke. There is, not far from the supposed site of ancient Capernaum, into which, as is stated by Luke, (7: 1.) our Lord entered immediately after uttering his discourse, an elevation still called 'the mount of the beatitudes.' Mr. Jowett visited it with peculiar sensations. 'We read aloud, as we went,' says he, 'the first 12 verses of the 5th of Matthew, and the 13th ch. of 1 Cor. Our minds were raised to the enjoyment of those heavenly truths; and we could not but feel that all the maxims of sages and philosophers are infinitely inferior to these brief and simple descriptions of the graces of humility, meekness, gentleness, purity of heart, and patience of faith, hope and love.' The flowery field brought to mind the Savior's allusion; and the view of the castle and town of Safet, as a commanding eminence in the north, presented the 'city set on a hill,' which, although without 'absolutely certain evidence' of the reality of position, 'yet,' he adds, 'we felt it heighten our interest in the scene, to trace, as nearly as might be, with the Gospels in our hand, and the very country before us, the steps of our Lord.' See note on Luke 7: 1.

Ed.

(Note Luke 6: 20-26.) Expositors generally say, that these beatitudes as they are called, were calculated to correct the notions and expectations of the Jews respecting the Messiah's kingdom. But, as their prejudices originated in corrupt pronouns common to all men, so these maxims of wisdom are equally adapted to remove from all men false notions of excellency, honor and felicity — All seek happiness, but none except those who are taught by the Spirit according to the Word of God, know what it is, or how to obtain it. The 'beatitudes' may, then, be considered as the Christian paradoxes, for they place happiness in dispositions and circumstances which men generally deem incompatible with it. The declarations of Scripture, shewing who are the blessed, refer to our state and character as sinners; but some point out the benefits, which entitle us to happiness; (Note, Ps. 32: 1, 2.) and others the dispositions, or conditions, which conduce to it. (Morg. Ref.) To explain such short aphorisms, requires peculiar care. They commonly admit limitations from other parts of Scripture. In general, the beatitudes do not refer to any natural tempers, but to holy dispositions, produced by divine grace, rectifying the obliquities of fallen nature. Where one of them really exists, all the others exist, though not in equal prominence. — Christ first declares, that the 'poor in spirit' are happy. 'Poverty of spirit' is very different from external indigence. The poor are often proud, ungodly, dishonest, profligate, and far from happiness. Some of the rich are humble, holy and happy. — Voluntary poverty cannot be meant. 'It is the duty of men, who would "attain this life," in "be "poor in spirit," but it is not the duty of all Christians to turn "monks and friars mendicant to this end; for then all other Romanesque must be excluded from heaven. ... By "poor in spirit," our Savior means a true, humble, lowly spirit, this being the usual expression, by which the Scriptures describe the humble man. ... Such are blessed, for their humility makes them submissive, contented, obedient, and prepares them to enter into Christ's kingdom. And as they, who are thus holy, shall be also happy, they must be met for the kingdom of glory.' Whitty. — This is widely different from an object disposition and implies more than patience in external poverty. — We are all poor, in respect of God, destitute of holiness, wisdom, or strength; we desire without any thing to pay; condemned, helpless, polluted and vile. Few know this to be their character and condition. In this deep poverty they are of a haughty spirit, which precludes their obtaining the 'unsearchable riches of Christ.' He, then, is happy, who knows how poor he is, who feels his indigence and unworthiness; who is humbled and theirs is the kingdom of heaven.

which the blessings and curses of the law were read, Deut. 27:12, &c. There the curses are expressed, and the blessings implied; here the reverse; in both, life and death are set before us; but the law, as a ministration of death, deters from sin; the Gospel, as a dispensation of life, allures to Christ, in whom alone all good is to be had. They who saw his gracious cures, (ch. 4: 23, 24.) and now heard the gracious words proceeding out of his mouth, would say, that He was all of a piece, made up of love and sweetness.

The scope of revelation is to teach us what God expects from us, and what we may expect from Him, and no where is this more fully, briefly, and exactly set forth than here; and this is that Gospel which we are to believe: for, what is faith but a conformity to these characters, and a dependence upon these promises? The way to happiness is here opened and made a highway; (Isa. 35: 8.) and this coming from Jesus Christ, it is intimated that from Him, and by Him, we are to receive both the seed and the fruit, both the grace required, and the glory promised. Nothing passes between God and fallen man but through Him. Some of the wisest heathens had notions of blessedness different from the rest of mankind, and looking toward this of our Savior. Seneca, undertaking to describe a blessed man, makes it out that it is only an honest, good man that is to be so called—one, 'in whose estimation nothing is good or evil, but a good or evil heart'—whom no occurrences elate or deject—whose true pleasure consists in a contempt of pleasure—'to whom the only good is virtue, and the only evil, vice.' Our Savior gives us eight characters of blessed people, representing the principal graces. On each of them a present blessing is pronounced, and to each a future blessedness promised, variously expressed, to suit the nature of the grace or duty recommended.

1. The poor in spirit. There is a poor-spiritedness, which is so far from making men blessed, that it is a sin and snare—cowardice, and a willing submission to the lusts of men. But this poverty of spirit is a gracious disposition of soul, so emptied of self, as to be filled with Christ. To be poor in spirit, is, to be contentedly poor, if God wills, bringing our mind to our condition, when it is a low condition. Many are poor in the world who are high in spirit, poor and proud, murmuring and complaining; but we must know how to be abased, Phil. 4: 12. Acknowledging the wisdom of God in appointing us to poverty, we must be thankful for what we have, and make the best of it. It is to sit loose to all worldly wealth, and cheerfully to bear losses, which may befall us in the most proper state. It is not, in pride or pretence, to make ourselves poor, by throwing away God's gifts, like those in the church of Rome, who vow poverty, and yet engross the wealth of nations; but, if we be poor in the world, we must be poor in spirit, that is, condescend to the poor, sympathize with them, expect and prepare for poverty, and bid it welcome, especially when it comes on us for keeping a good conscience, Heb. 10: 34. Job was poor in spirit, when he blessed God in taking away, as well as giving. To be poor in spirit, is to think meanly of ourselves. The poor are often taken in the Old Testament for the self-denying and humble, as opposed to the proud, and those at ease. It is to be as little children in our opinion of ourselves, ch. 13: 4. 19: 14. Laodicea was wretchedly poor in spirituals, and yet rich in spirit, Rev. 3: 17. On the other hand, Paul excelled most in gifts and graces, and was yet less than the least of all saints, and nothing in his own account. It is, to value others and undervalue ourselves. It is, to be willing to make ourselves cheap, to become all things to all men. It is, to acknowledge that God is great and we mean; that He is holy and we sinful; that He is all, and we worse than nothing. It is, to humble ourselves under his mighty hand. It is, to come off from all confidence in our own righteousness, that we may depend on the merit of Christ for justification, and on his Spirit for sanctification. The poor publican had this poverty of spirit. We must call ourselves poor, because always in want of God's grace, and always begging at God's door.

This poverty in spirit is put first among the Christian graces. The philosophers did not rest on humility among their moral virtues, but Christ puts it first. Self-denial is the first lesson in his school, and poverty of spirit entitled to the first beatitude. The foundation of all other graces is laid in humility. Those who would build high, must begin low; and it is an excellent preparative for the entrance of Gospel grace into the heart; it fits the soil to receive the seed. Those who are weary and heavy laden are the poor in spirit, and they shall find rest with Christ.—They are blessed even in this world. God looks graciously upon them. They are his little ones, and have their angels; to them He gives more grace; they are easy to themselves and all about them, and nothing comes amiss to them; while high spirits are always uneasy.

Theirs is the kingdom of heaven. They only are fit to be members of Christ's church, which is called the congregation of the poor; (Ps. 74 19.) the kingdom of glory is prepared for them. Those who thus humble themselves shall be thus exalted. The high spirits go away with the glory of the kingdoms of the earth; but humble, mild, yielding souls obtain the glory of the kingdom of heaven. We are ready to think that the rich, and those who do good with their riches are happy; for thus they can lay up in store a good security for the time to come. But what shall the poor do, who have not wherewithal to do good? Why, the same happiness is promised to the contentedly poor, as to the usefully rich. If I can but want cheerfully for his sake, even that will be recompensed. And do we not serve a good Master then?

2. Blessed are they that mourn. This is another strange blessing, and fitly follows the former. The poor are accustomed to mourn; the gracious poor mourn graciously. We are apt to think, Blessed are the merry; but Christ, Himself a great mourner, says, Blessed are the mourners. There is a sinful mourning, the sorrow of the world; despairing melancholy upon a spiritual account, and disconsolate grief upon a temporal account. There is a natural mourning, which may prove a friend to blessedness, by the grace of God sanctifying the affliction.—But there is a gracious mourning, which qualifies for blessedness, an habitual seriousness, the ashamed before God, as a lost sinner, that cannot purchase salvation, but must be a suppliant, and a debtor to grace for it. If this man be rich, learned, or noble, his heart will not depend on such distinctions, but be lowly and contrite. If poor, he will be patient, contented, grateful. He is prepared to exercise repentance and faith, to welcome salvation, and give up every thing, that he may enter 'the kingdom of heaven.' He is also prepared for the obedience and privileges of it; and all its blessings are his certainly and eternally. For such persons they are provided; none but they value or enjoy them. They are therefore happy, in the earnest and in the hope of heaven. Their lowly frame of mind tends to tranquillity, confidence in God, communion with Him, and the participation of the consolations of his Holy Spirit. Scott. Poor in spirit. 'Though I cannot think with Mr. Mede that this refers chiefly to a disposition to part with their possessions for charitable purposes; or, as some think, with Gentius and Baxter to a disposition to bear poverty with resolution, submission, and cheerfulness; yet I doubt not but the latter of these is cor. reheaded in that humility which is here expressed by poverty of spirit; which is a temper that indeed is absolutely necessary in order to our being cordially reconciled to the Gospel method of salvation.'

DODD.

The next blessing belongs not to those who have mourned, but who are mourning. The world deems the gay, the dissipated, the jovial, and the prosperous, happy; and men turn from religion because of the mourning connected with it. The Jews expected only festivity and glad rejoicing under the Messiah; but He pronounced the mourners happy.—All kinds of mourning cannot be intended, for 'the sorrow of the world worketh death'; many grow hard under affliction, spend their lives in murmurs, fits of vexation, or become their own executioners. The mourning, which springs from 'poverty of spirit,' brokenness of heart, and tenderness of conscience, must be here meant. A readiness to remember, confess, and be sorry for sin, with the 'sorrow that worketh repentance,' watchfulness over the temper and conduct, and frequent recollection of past offences, producing remorse and self-abhorrence; a continual dependence on the mercy of God in Christ Jesus for acceptance, and an application for his sanctifying Spirit to cleanse the evil that is mourned over, seem to be primarily intended. But afflictions, and frequent mourning under the Lord's rod, as pledges of his love, and means of humiliation and sanctification, are included; which, when improved, tend to blessedness. A disposition to sympathize with our fellow Christians and sinners in their perplexities, must also be meant.—Such mourners are happy. Their tears and sighs are mingled with pleasure, and prepare them for being comforted with a sense of pardon, with peace, hope, and joy in the Holy Ghost: thus they anticipate the eternal consolation, when 'God shall wipe all tears from their eyes.' (Marg. Ref.—Note, Ps. 126: 5, 6. P. O.—Notes, Is. 25: 6. Rev. 7: 13-17. v. 17.) Scott. They that mourn. 'Those who, feeling their spiritual poverty, mourn after God, lamenting the iniquity that separated them from the Fountain of blessedness. Every one flies from sorrow, and seeks after joy; and yet true joy must necessarily be the fruit of sorrow. The whole need not (do not feel the need of) the physician; but they that are sick do: i. e. they who are sensible of their disease. Only such as are deeply convinced of the sinfulness of sin, feel the plague of their own heart, and turn with disgust from all worldly consolations, because insufficient to render them happy, have God's promise of solid comfort. They wait, as comforted by Christ; (intimating, in the original word, that) He will call them to Himself, and speak the words of pardon, peace, and life eternal to their hearts.'

7 Blessed are the merciful; for they shall obtain mercy.

8 Blessed are the pure in heart; for they shall see God.

9 Blessed are the peace-makers; for

The happiness of heaven will certainly fill the soul; their righteousness shall be complete, the favor of God, and his image, both in perfection.

5. The merciful are happy. This is, like the others, a paradox; for the merciful are not taken to be the wisest or richest, yet Christ pronounces them blessed. They are piously inclined to pity and succor the miserable. A man may be merciful who has not wherewithal to be liberal, and then God accepts the willing mind. We must not only bear our own afflictions patiently, but partake of the afflictions of our brethren; (Job 6: 14. Col 3: 12.) bowels of mercy must be put on, and put forth; i. e. contributing assistance to the wretched. We must compassionate the souls of men, instruct the ignorant, warn the careless, and pluck them as brands from the burning. We must pity and comfort the sorrowful; Job 16: 5. We must not be severe on those whom we have advantage against. We must supply such as are in want; which if we refuse to do, we shut up the bowels of our compassion; James 2: 15, 16.

John 3: 17, 18. Draw out thy soul, by dealing thy bread to the hungry; Isa. 56: 7, 10. Nay, a merciful man is merciful to his beast.
Blessed is he that considers the poor; Ps. 41: 1. Herein men resemble God, whose goodness is his glory. In being merciful as He is merciful, we are, in our measure, perfect as He is perfect. To benefit others is an evidence of love to God, and a satisfaction to ourselves. Doing good is one of the purest delights in this world. Herein is included that saying of Christ, not found in the Gospels, It is more blessed to give than to receive; Acts 20: 35. They shall obtain mercy; with men, when they need it; he that watereth shall be watered also himself; (we know not how soon we may need kindness, and therefore should be kind); but especially mercy with God, for with the merciful He will show Himself merciful. Ps. 18: 25. The most merciful cannot pretend to merit, but must fly to mercy. They shall find with God sparing mercy, (ch. 6: 14.) supplying mercy, (Prov. 19: 17.) sustaining mercy, (Ps. 41: 2.) mercy in that day; (2 Tim. 1: 18.) nay, they shall inherit the kingdom prepared for them; (ch. 25: 34, 35.) whereas they shall have judgment without mercy, (nothing less than hell-fire,) who have showed no mercy.

6. Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God. This is the most comprehensive of all the beatitudes; holiness and happiness fully described, and put together. Here is the most comprehensive character of the blessed; they are the pure in heart. Note, Those who are inwardly pure, show themselves to be under the power of pure and undefiled religion. True

Verse 7.

Connected with the preceding holy tempers, is that of mercy, an aversion to every thing harsh, cruel, oppressive, or injurious; a propensity to pity, alleviate, or remove the miseries of mankind; an unwillingness to increase our ease, or emolument, by rendering others uneasy, and a willingness to forego personal interest or gratification, for the comfort and happiness of others. There is a natural propensity of this kind, which should be distinguished from the gracious disposition. This is not expansive, constant, general; but is profuse to some, cruel to others, springs not from proper motives, is not directed to proper ends, nor governed by the divine law: it is often joined with impiety, injustice, and tyranny in other parts of a man's conduct: it is a sort of instinct, stronger in some than others, and unconnected with true religion. But the mercy here mentioned, has respect to the authority, law and glory of God, and to the grace of the Gospel. It is learned from the cross of Christ, and the mercy of God to sinners through Him. Uniform in its exercise, it seeks the good of bodies and souls, and extends to the vile, the injurious, the obscure, and to every one who falls under its sphere of action. It is connected with humility, faith, self-denial, equity, piety and conscientiousness. It induces a man, from love to God and hope in his mercy, to compassionate all as he has opportunity, not injuring any, but wishing and praying for the happiness of those whom he cannot help.—Such are happy, for they shall obtain mercy. All are sinners, and need mercy; these are penitent and believing sinners, interested in the mercy and grace of the covenant. The Lord will be kind to them, as they have been to their brethren. They shall be pardoned, supported, and comforted through life and in death, and then shall enjoy the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life; while they have judgment without mercy who have showed no mercy.—In this world, the exercise of mercy is a most delightful employment, as they know who have, decidedly, made the experiment. (Marg. Ref.) Obtain mercy. In the original, pity. They pity, and they shall be pitied. They forgive and relieve, and they shall be forgotten and relieved. Scott. Far from training you up to delight in scenes of desolation and slaughter. I declare, Happy are the merciful and compassionate, that feel the sorrows of others as their own, and hasten to relieve them; for they shall obtain that mercy from God, which the best and happiest of mankind need, and on which they continually and entirely depend.

Verse 8.

Men are apt to think those happy, who can gratify every ambition, curiosity, or sensual inclination. Probably the carnal Jews expected abundant indulgences in the reign of their Messiah. But Jesus pronounces those happy, who are pure in heart, in whom sensual and sinful desires are so subdued, that they seek not to gratify them; who are replenished with holy inclinations and affections, and in all their words, influenced by the fear of love of God. The believer's understanding is in part purified from darkness, his judgment from error, his will from rebellion, his affections from avarice, enmity, pride and sensuality, his memory and imagination from depraved recollections and conceits, and his aims to glorify God, and to enjoy his favor, and to do good. He is yet imperfect, but the remainder of sin is a burden, grief, and detestation. This is a peculiar effect and evidence of purity of heart. So far as one is purified through faith, he is prepared for manifestations of God to his soul, and favored with them; and when perfected in holiness, he shall openly behold the manifested glory of God, and admire, adore, and be unspeakably happy in the view, to all eternity. (Marg. Ref.) Scott. Pure in heart. In opposition to the Pharisees, who affected outward purity, while their hearts were full of corruption and defilement. A principal part of the Jewish religion consisted in outward washings and cleansings: on this ground they expected to see God, or enjoy eternal glory; but Christ here shows, that a purification of the heart from all vile affections and desires, is essentially requisite, in order to enter the kingdom of God.

Dr. A. CLARKE. The laws in regard to the cleanness of the body, and even of the garments, if neglected by any person, exclude him from the temple. He was incapacitated for being so much as a spectator of the solemn service at the altar. The Jews considered the empyreal heaven as the archetype of the temple at Jerusalem. In the latter, they enjoyed the symbols of God's presence, who spoke to them by his ministers; whereas, in the former, God speaks to the blessed inhabitants face to face. Our Lord, preserving the analogy between the two dispensations, intimates that cleanness will be as necessary for admission into the celestial temple, as into the terrestrial. But as the privilege is inconceivably higher, the qualification is more important. The cleanness is not ceremonial, but moral; not of the outward man, but of the inward. The same idea is suggested, Ps. 24: 3, 4.

Here is the most comprehensive comfort of the blessed, they shall see God. Note, It is the perfection of happiness to see God. Seeing Him by faith, as we may now, is a heaven upon earth; and seeing Him as we shall in a future state, will be the heaven of heaven. To see Him as He is, face to face, not through a glass darkly; to see Him as ours, and enjoy Him; to see Him and be like Him, and satisfied with that likeness, (Ps. 17: 15.) and never lose the sight of Him; this is heaven's happiness. It is promised only to the pure in heart; and none but the pure are capable of seeing God. What pleasure could an unsanctified soul take in the vision of a holy God? As He cannot endure to look upon their iniquity, so neither can they on his purity. No unclean thing can enter heaven; but all the pure in heart have desires wrought in them, which nothing but the sight of God will satisfy; and divine grace will not leave those desires unsatisfied.

7. The peace-makers are happy, v. 9. The wisdom that is from above is first pure, then peaceable. The blessed ones are pure toward God, and peaceable toward men; for, in reference to both, conscience must be kept void of offence. Peace-makers have a peaceable disposition. As, to make a lie, is to be addicted to lying, so to make peace shows a hearty attachment to it. I am for peace, Ps. 120: 7. It is to love and delight in peace, as in our element; it is to have a peaceable conversation, industriously to preserve the peace, to hearken to proposals of it ourselves, and to make them to others; to do all we can, to be repairers of the breaches.

Verse 9.

The Jews expected a Messiah, who would lead them to war, revenge, victory and dominion. Conquerors have always been admired and celebrated, as honorable and happy, though their ambition has made the earth a scene of misery. But our great Peace-maker pronounces the peace-makers happy; peaceable in their own conduct, promoting peace in families and communities, and trying to prevent, or terminate, wars, law-suits, feuds, domestic broils and religious controversies; such as labor to promote the reconciliation of sinners to God, and to induce them to live in harmony with one another. These are happy, though they receive few thanks from the disputers, either of the world, or of the church. They bear the image of God, and copy his example. They are reconciled, regenerated and adopted. He owns them as his children, and before the whole world will avow their relation to Him. Many will call them the children of God here, and all will know them to be so at last. They shall have comfort in their loving endeavors to his truth, and those who profess it; his law, and those who obey it; his ordinances, and those who attend them. They accuse Christians of bigotry, spiritual pride, fanaticism, hypocrisy, sedition, misanthropy; they invent calumnies against them, and fasten opprobrious names on them. If we adhere to the truths, precepts and ordinances of Christ, or refuse to do what conscience forbids, we must prepare for derision, reproach, slander, or more severe treatment from ungodly men. But the kingdom of grace and glory belongs to such as thus meet and endure persecution. They suffer for the sake of Christ and righteousness, and all manner of evil is spoken of them falsely.' Instead, then, of complaining, they should count themselves happy, that the enemies of God see and hate his image in them. (Note, 1 Pet. 4: 12-16.) They should exult for joy at the glorious recompense prepared for them; remembering, that thus they are conformed to the most honored servants of God, in every age and place. No eminence in those dispositions, which form the Christian character, and the fruits of the Spirit, will exempt them from the persecutions of Christ. He will preserve any man from this hatred of the world. Nay, they will expose him to it, as long as men in general remain the servants of Satan. Even Christ, the only perfect character, was exposed to the contempt and enmity of the world. But these holy tempers will teach a man to bear such trials, overcome evil with good, and pass quietly on, gathering good from them all. Falsely. (11) *Orig. lying. salt of the whole earth, for they must go into all the world to preach the Gospel. It was a discouragement that they were so few and weak. What could they do in the whole earth? Nothing, if they were to work with the sword; but being to work silently as salt, one handful would diffuse its savor far and wide, and work insensibly and irresistibly as leaven, ch. 13:33. The Gospel is as salt, penetrating, quick, and powerful; (Heb. 4:12.) it reaches the heart, Acts 2:37. It is cleansing, relishing, and preserves from putrefaction. We read of the savor of the knowledge of Christ; (2 Cor. 2:14.) for all other knowledge is insipid without that. An everlasting covenant is called a covenant of salt; (Num. 18:19.) and the Gospel is an everlasting Gospel. Salt was required in all the sacrifices, (Lev. 2:13.) in Ezekiel's mystical temple, Ezek. 43, 24. Now Christ's disciples, as learners and teachers, were as salt. Note, Christians and especially ministers, are the salt of the earth.

If they are such as they should be, they are as good salt, white, and broken into many grains, but very useful. Pliny says, 'without salt human life cannot be preserved.' See, They must be seasoned with the salt of grace; thoughts, affections, words, and actions, all seasoned with grace, Col. 4:6. Have salt in yourselves, else you cannot diffuse it among others,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V 1-12. The end of preaching is, that men may be made wise unto salvation. When multitudes attend, it is seasonable for a minister to preach without much regard to time, or place. A church or chapel is convenient, and the Lord's day a favorable time; but a mountain or field will be a holy place, and any day holy, if the Lord grant his blessing. Preaching was shewn to be an honorable employment by our Lord's example; and happy are they, who begin it at his call, act on his principles, and preach his doctrines. But it behooves us to speak with seriousness, a sense of the weight and difficulty of the work, and dependence on the Lord for assistance and a blessing. The true Gospel is far more practical than any other doctrine; and numbers so mistake in this matter, that they would condemn Christ himself as legal, were they to hear his sermons, without knowing who He was.—True religion is so connected with happiness, that, without it, none can ever be happy. How different the character and condition of the blessed, as stated by our Lord, from what the carnal mind would have supposed! None without faith and experience will believe, that 'the poor in spirit,' the mourners, the meek, those who long for righteousness, the merciful, the pure in heart, the peacemakers, and the persecuted, are the only happy persons. Let us consider this as a description of a healthy state of mind, and a safe condition in life; and the opposite dispositions, as distempers, spoiling enjoyment, and not counterbalanced by the friendship of the world. Let us not suppose, that some have one, some another, of these holy dispositions; but remember, that they all combine to form the image of Christ, and the temper of a Christian; and when one is wanting, the rest are counterfeit. Let us examine whether we possess these graces; let us seek them, and the increase of them, from God; let us take these promises as encouragements to aspire after higher attainments, assured of proportionate happiness, till we be admitted to his presence, 'where is fulness of joy.' Let us not envy the ambitious, the gay, the injurious, the vindictive, the avaricious, the sensual, or the unmerciful; the scourges of the earth, or any of the sons of madness. Let us not covet their prosperity in this world, nor be disquieted with reviling and persecution, while we do good to all, and evil to none. Happy will it be to suffer for Christ's sake, in the cause for which He shed his blood; for 'great will be our reward.' Let us give no just cause for revilings, and avoid all bitterness under the cross. Let us consider how prophets and apostles endured trials; and specially 'look unto Jesus,' lest we be weary, and yield to impatience and recrimination under our lighter trials.

SCOTT.

"In his resentments. The other meek, yielding, complying, forgiving; 'I am prompt to act, but willing to suffer; silent and gentle under rudeness and insult; suing for reconciliation, where others would demand satisfaction; giving way to the pushes of impudence; conceding and indulgent to the prejudices, the wrong-headedness, the intractability of those with whom he has to deal.' The former of these characters is, and ever has been, the favorite of the world; and though too stern to conciliate affection, has an appearance of dignity which too commonly commands respect. The latter is, as our Lord describes it, humble meek, lowly, devout, merciful, pure, peaceable, patient, and unresisting. The world calls it mean-spirited, tame, and abject; yet, with the divine Author of our religion, this is the favorite character; this is the constant topic of his commendation; this is the subject that runs through all the beatitudes." Bp. Porteus.

Verse 13.

Salt is the grand preservative from material corruption, and gives savor to our viands; if it lose its saltness, it is worthless, unfit even for the dunghill, as it conduces to sterility rather than fruitfulness. The disciples and ministers of Christ are scattered about in the world as salt, that their doctrine, conversation, examples, labors, and prayers may stop the progress of sin, and be instrumental in seasoning many minds with grace. But if they be unsound in doctrine, unholily in life, or vain in conversation, they disgrace their profession, are a scandal to Christ, prejudice men against the truth, or seduce them into error, and so become the most worthless of mankind. Every approach to this unfits a Christian, or a minister, to be 'the salt of the earth,' and diminishes his usefulness. This was peculiarly applicable to the primitive Christians, sent to season the whole world with holy doctrine, lives and labors (Marg. Ref.) SCOTT. Lost his savor.] 'The original word has a peculiar strength here, and literally means "if it be infatuated," "grown foolish," alluding to the metaphor in which sense and spirit are expressed by salt, as we call a lifeless discourse insipid. (Comp. Job 6:6. and Col. 4:6.) DOODR. From the accounts of Maimonid and others, it appears, that not only on the borders of the Dead Sea, but also in other places where salt is found, the circumstance of its losing its saltness, by exposure to the sun and rain, is not at all uncommon.—That accurate traveller mentions breaking off a fragment of rock-salt, the inner surface of which had its usual taste, while the outside, though it had the sparks and particles of salt, had perfectly lost its savor.' The disciples of Christ must not muffle themselves up in obscurity, under pretence of contemplation, modesty, or self-preservation: but, as they have received the gift, must minister the same; Luke 12: 3. They must be burning and shining lights; (John 5: 35.) and show, in all things, that they are indeed the followers of Christ; James 3: 13. They must instruct, direct, quicken, and comfort; Job 29: 11. Our light must shine by our doing such good works as men may see and approve; such as will cause those who are without, to think well of Christianity. Our good works must be seen for the edification of others, but not for our own ostentation. Our secret prayers lie between God and our souls, but that which is of itself open, we must study his honor put on them. Truly the light is sweet; the light of the first day was so, when it shone out of darkness. So is the morning light of every day; so is the Gospel, and those who spread it, to all sensible people. The world sat in darkness; Christ raised up his disciples to shine in it; and that they may do so, from Him they borrow their light.

As lights of the world, they have many eyes upon them. A city set on a hill cannot be hid. Zealous disciples of Christ become remarkable as beacons, for signs, (Isa. 8: 18.) wondered at, Zech. 3: 8. Some of their neighbors admire them, rejoice in them, and strive to imitate them; others hate, censure, and study to blast them. They should be circumspect, because of their observers; they are as spectacles to the world, and must avoid every thing that looks ill, they are so much looked at. Christ's disciples were obscure men, but the character He put on them dignified them, and as preachers, though reproached by some, they were respected by others, advanced to thrones and made judges; (Luke 22: 30.) for Christ will honor those who honor Him.

Christ having lighted these candles, they shall not be put under a bushel—not confined, as now, to Galilee, or the lost sheep of the house of Israel—but they shall be sent into all the world. The churches are the golden candlesticks in which they are placed, that their light may be diffused; and the Gospel carries with it so much of its own evidence, that it cannot but appear, except to the wilfully blind, to be from God. It will give light to all who will draw near, and come where it is. Those to whom it gives no light must thank themselves. They will not make a diligent inquiry into it. Again, they must shine as lights, by preaching, by communicating their knowledge to others. The talent must not be buried in a napkin, but traded with.

to make congruous to our profession; Phil. 4: 8. Those about us must not only hear of good words, but see our good works, to be convinced that religion is more than a bare profession.

Those who see your good works must be brought, not to glorify you, (which the Pharisees aimed at, and it spoiled all,) but your Father which is in heaven. Note, God's glory must be our aim in every thing; 1 Pet. 4: 11. In this centre the lines of all our actions must meet. We must not only try to glorify God ourselves, but do all we can to bring others to glorify Him also. 'Let them see your good works, that they may see the power of God's grace, and thank Him for it, who has given such power unto men;' and also, 'that they may see the power and excellency of the Christian religion, be provoked by a holy emulation to imitate your good works, and so glorify God. Note, The exemplary conversation of the saints may do much for the conversion of sinners. Examples teach. Those who are prejudiced may hereby be brought to love religion, for there is a winning virtue in a godly conversation.

V. 17-20. Christ's auditors and disciples had an eye in their religion to the Old Testament as their rule, and there Christ shows them that they are right; they had an eye to the Scribes and Pharisees as their example, and there He shows them that they were in the wrong.

1. The rule which Christ came to establish exactly agreed with the Old Testament, here called the law and the prophets. The prophets were commentators upon the law, and both made up that rule of faith, which Christ found upon the throne in the Jewish church, and here He keeps it on the throne.

'Let not the pious Jews, who have an affection for the law and the prophets, fear that I come to destroy them.' Let them not be prejudiced against Christ, from a jealousy that his kingdom would derogate from the honor of the Scriptures, which they had received as coming from God, and of which they had experienced the purity and power; no, let them be satisfied that Christ has no ill design upon the law and the prophets. 'Let not the profane Jews, who are disaffected to the Scriptures, hope that I am come to destroy them.' Let not carnal liber-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 13-16. We ought carefully to consider the importance of Christian character, remembering, that we are 'the salt of the earth, and the light of the world.' Many eyes will be upon us; many will be affected by seeing our conduct. We should, then, try to resist impiety, diffuse the light of divine truth, and 'adorn the doctrine of God our Savior,' letting our 'light shine before men,' that our works, as living sermons, may convince sinners of the excellence of religion, and so conduce to the glory of God, and the benefit of man. The Christian, then, must not conceal his sentiments; for God does not enlighten his people, that they may put the light under a bushel, but hold it forth for the benefit of others. Nor are they allowed to retire into cloisters, deserts, recesses, or to bury themselves in obscurity, but so to fill their stations in life, as to glorify God before men. We should then seek to shine, by professing and adorning the Gospel in our circle, that we may answer the end, for which God called us out of darkness into his marvellous light.

The same instruction, under another image. Christ is the true 'Light of the world;' but his disciples and ministers, shining by light derived from Him, are, in a subordinate sense, the 'light of the world,' also, and diffuse his truth and salvation where darkness and wickedness would otherwise reign. Their profession, character and doctrine, render them conspicuous as 'a city set on a hill, they cannot be hid.' Men will look at them, and observe their words and actions, to form a judgment of their religion. God intends they should be observed, that they may communicate their light. We do not light a candle to conceal it, but to lighten the world. It is, then, their duty, and should be their grand object, so to recommend the truth by pious, edifying conversation and behavior, that 'men may see their good works,' which flow from faith and love, and thus be led, to glorify their God and Father. (Notes, 1 Pet. 2: 11, 12.) The holy examples and abundant good works of Christians, often men's prejudices, win them to attend to the truth, and are instrumental to their conversion, by which they glorify God. This should be their aim in all their conduct; though they must not do any thing 'to be seen of men,' or for their own glory. (Note, 6: 1-4.)—Th—Disciples, who were to be apostles, may have been primarily meant, but every minister and Christian is concerned. (Marg. Ref.—Note, Phil. 2: 14-18.) Scott. More than a century before Mr. Jewett, in company with our lamented missionary, Flak, visited the country around Capernaum, (see Note on v. 1.) it was contemplated with emotions very similar to theirs, by Maundrell, from the top of Mount Tabor. 'A few points towards the north,' says he, 'appears that which they call the mount of the beatitudes; a small rising, from which our blessed Savior delivered his sermon in the v. vi. vii. chapters of St. Matthew. Not far from this little hill, is the city Saphet, supposed to be the ancient Bethulia. It stands upon a very eminent and commanding mountain, [glittering with its noble castle, Jewett,

'and is seen far and near. [—seeming to command all the country round to a great distance. J.] May we not suppose that Christ alludes to 'this city, (v. 14,) a conjecture which seems the more probable, because our Lord illustrates his discourses, in several places, by comparisons taken from objects then present before the eyes of his auditors?' Ep.

Candle. It is remarked by Dr. Campbell, that 'candles were not used at that time in Judea for lighting their houses; and that, therefore, the meaning of the words here employed is 'lamp' and 'lamp-stand.' Dr. Doddridge, in his translation and paraphrase, and the editor of Calmet, exhibit the passage similarly. The alteration, however, is of little importance, compared with the spirit of fervent piety in the close of Dr. Doddridge's 'Improvement' of this passage: 'Let us awaken and stir up our souls to cultivate the amiable virtues here commended to our pursuit; this humility and meekness, the penitent sense of sin, this ardent desire after righteousness, this compassion and purity, this peacefulness and fortitude, in a word, this universal goodness, which becomes those who sustain the character of the salt of the earth, and the light of the world. Is there not reason to lament, that we answer the character no more? Is there not reason to cry out, with a good man in former times, "Blessed Jesus! either these are not thy words, or I am not Christians!" Oh, season our hearts more effectually with thy grace! Pour forth that divine oil on our lamps! Then shall the flame brighten; then shall the ancient honors of thy religion be revived, and multitudes be awakened and animated by the lustre of it, to glorify our Father in heaven!' En.

Verses 17, 18.

Various opinions existed about the changes which would be made by the Messiah. Many, who supposed Jesus to be the Messiah, and heard parts of his doctrine, supposed that He meant to set aside the ancient religion, and establish a new one: which idea tended to mislead the Jews and prejudice others. But He told them that He had not 'to come to destroy times imagine that the Messiah will discharge them from the obligations of the divine precepts, secure to them the divine promises, make them happy, and yet give them leave to live as they list. Christ commands nothing new, which was forbidden either by the law of nature, or the moral law, nor forbids any thing which those laws enjoined. He here takes care to rectify the mistake; I am not come to destroy. The Savior of souls is the destroyer of nothing but the works of the devil. No, He came to fulfil the excellent dictates of Moses and the prophets. He was made under the law, Gal. 4: 4. He yielded obedience to the law, honored his parents, sanctified the Sabbath, prayed, gave alms, and did that which no other one ever did, obeyed the law perfectly, in every respect. He came to make good the promises and predictions of the Scriptures; which did all bear witness to Him. The covenant of grace, and Christ the Mediator of it, are the same now as then. As bishop Tillotson says, He did not make void, but made good the ceremonial law, and manifested Himself to be the substance of all those shadows. He came to fill up the defects of it. If we consider the law as a vessel, that had water in it before, He did not come to pour out the water, but to fill it to the brim; or as if a picture, that is first rough-drawn, and displays some outlines only of the piece intended, which are afterwards filled up; so Christ made an improvement of the law and the prophets. He also came to carry on the same plan. The Christian institutes are so far from thwarting the main design of the Jewish religion, that they promote it in the highest degree. The Gospel is the time of reformation, (Heb. 9: 10.) not the repeal of the law, but the amendment of it, and consequently its establishment.

'Verily I say unto you, I, the Amen, the faithful Witness, solemnly declare, that till heaven and earth pass, when time shall be no more, and the unchangeable state of recompenses shall supersede all laws, one of the least or most minute parts shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled.' For what is God doing, both in providence and grace, but fulfilling the Scripture? The Word of the Lord endures forever, both that of the Law and that of the Gospel. Observe, The care of God concerning his law, extends to the iota and the tittle; for whatever belongs to God, be it ever so little, shall be preserved. The laws of men are so imperfect that they allow the maxim, that 'the extreme points of law are not law.' But God will maintain every iota and tittle of his law.

Whosoever therefore shall break one of the least commandments of the law of Moses, much more any of the greater, as the Pharisees did who neglected the weightier matters, and made void the commandment of the Lord by their traditions, (ch. 15: 3.) he shall be called least in the kingdom of heaven. Though the Pharisees be cried up as teachers, they shall not be employed to teach in Christ's kingdom; but whosoever shall do and teach them, as Christ's disciples would, and thus prove themselves better friends to the Old Testament than the Pharisees were; they, though despised by men, shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven. Among the commands of God, there are some less than others; none absolutely little, but comparatively so. The Jews reckon the least of the commandments to be that of the bird's nest; (Deut. 22: 6, 7.) yet even that had an intention very considerable. It is dangerous, in doctrine or practice, to dissuall the least of God's commands, or to break them, that is, to contract the extent, or weaken the obligation of them. Whoever does so, will find it at his peril. To vacate any of the ten commandments, is making void the law, Ps. 119: 126. The farther such corruptions spread, the worse they are. It is impudence enough to break a command, but greater, to teach men so. This plainly refers to those who at this time sat in Moses' seat, and by their comments corrupted and perverted the text. Opinions that tend to the destruction of serious religion, are bad when held, but worse, when propagated as the Word of God. He that does so shall be called least in the kingdom of heaven, the kingdom of glory; or, perhaps in the kingdom of Gospel grace. He is so far from deserving the dignity of a teacher in it, that he shall not be accounted a member of it. The prophet that teaches these lies, shall be the

stroy the law or the prophets?' nor to teach any thing inconsistent with the true meaning of the Scriptures. His design was 'not to destroy but to fulfil.' It was plain from Moses and the prophets, that the ritual law 'a shadow of good things to come;' and Christ came to fulfil the intent of it, and hold forth the blessings typified by it, in a more intelligible manner. The moral law He came to fulfil by obeying it, as the Surety of the people; to establish its honor and authority, and make effectual provision for its being loved and obeyed by men. (Note, Rom. 2: 29-31, v. 31.) So that, to the end of the world, not a word, letter, point, or comma of the law should lose its authority, or fail to answer the end for which it was given; and the moral law would always continue the standard of sin and holiness, and the rule of duty; for Jesus came to accomplish the design of the first dispensation, and not to subvert it.—Christ came not to bring a new way of righteousness and salvation, but to fulfil that, which was shadowed by the figures of the law; by delivering men, through grace, from the curse of the law;—to teach the true use of obedience, which the law appointed, and to grace in our hearts the force of obedience. Beze,—The phrase 'till all be fulfilled' imports the performance of what was typified by the law, and foretold by the prophets, 24: 34. Mark 13: 35. Luke 21: 22. Whitby. The fulfilment, then, of the types and prophecies concerning the Messiah and his kingdom, as well as the establishment of the moral law in its full dignity, must be here intended. In Luke 22: 16, a more emphatical word is used in a similar connection, which confirms this interpretation. Scott. "I am not come to make the law of no effect—to dissolve the connection of its several parts, or the obligation of men to regulate their lives by its moral precepts—not to dissolve the connecting reference it has to the good things promised; but to complete and perfect its connection and reference, and accomplish every thing shadowed forth in the Mosaic ritual." He therefore added to it that which was necessary to make it perfect, his own sacrifice, without which it could neither satisfy God, nor sanctify men. Thus He completed it in Himself, by submitting to its types and exact obedience, and verifying them by his death on the cross; and as he completes this law and the sayings of the prophets, in his members, when He gives them grace to love the Lord supremely, and their neighbor as themselves; for this is all the law and the prophets. [Ch. 22: 36-40.]—Our Lord intimated, therefore, that the law and the prophets were still to be taught or inculcated by Him and his disciples; and these He and they have done in the most pointed manner. See the gospels and epistles: see especially this sermon on the mount, the epistle of James, and that to the Hebrews. This gives a clear sense to the apostle's words, Col. 1: 25. Whereof I am made a minister—to fulfil the word of God: i. e. to teach the doctrine of God. In the very commencement, also, of his ministry, Jesus Christ teaches the instability of all visible things. The heaven which you see, and which is so glorious, and the earth which you inhabit and see, shall, without any notice, for the things which are seen are for a time;

'but the things which are not seen are ever-during; 2 Cor. 4: 8. And 'the word of the Lord endureth forever.' [1 Pet. 1: 25.]

Dr. A. CLARKE.

Verse 19.

The scribes and Pharisees made frivolous distinctions between great and small commandments, as papists do between mortal and venial sins; yet all the law is enacted by divine authority; no part of it, then can in this sense be of small obligation, though some parts may respect matters more important than others. But if a man, professing to be a disciple of Jesus, by misconstruction of his doctrine, encourage himself in disobedience to the law, though in a matter of the least importance; and by false doctrine, or assumed authority, teach others so; whatever his station or reputation may be, he shall be called by Christ 'the least in the kingdom of heaven;' either not a true disciple, or one of the most inconsistent and mean of the whole. But he, whose practice and doctrine tend to induce men to keep the commandments of God, shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven; however low in human esteem, the King will approve and exalt him.—This shows, that views of truth which verge in the least towards antinomianism, are utterly inconsistent with the true doctrine of Christ. These are as antichristian as papal indulgences, lead to the same place by another road, relax man's obligation to obey God, and so dishonor the law, which Jesus came into the world and died to magnify. Scott. 'What an awful consideration is this! He who, by his mode of acting, speaking, or explaining the words of God, sets the holy precept aside, or explains away its force and meaning, shall be called least—shall have no place in the kingdom of Christ here, nor in the kingdom of glory above. This is evident from the following verse.' Dr. A. Clarke. Such also is the opinion of Kalaneo; but Dr. Campbell thinks it unexampled, and restricts the same to the Gospel dispensation, and to esteem or disesteem under it. Ed.

Verse 20.

The scribes were the most learned teachers of the law, and of the traditions of the elders. Most of them were Pharisees. Their learning related mainly to those external matters, in which their righteousness consisted. The scribes and Pharisees made loud professions, and were accounted very strict in their instructions and practice. But our Lord declared, that He would not acknowledge any one as his subject, whose righteousness did not exceed their righteousness. A new creation, and its effect on the temper and conduct, constitute a righteousness far more excellent than that of the scribes and Pharisees. Without repentance and faith, we cannot enter Christ's kingdom; these produce hatred of sin, and love of God and man; the law the believer is 'taught by grace to deny ungodliness, and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously and godly in this world;' and without this he cannot enter heaven. How ever late in life a man is converted, he has a better personal righteousness, before he enters heaven, than any formalist.—The scribes and Pharisees 'seem to have taught, that the law related only to outward actions; that zeal in the ceremonies of religion would excuse moral

They were much in fasting, prayer, giving alms, observing ceremonial appointments, and made it their business to teach others. They had such an interest in the people, that it was thought if but two men went to heaven, one would be a Pharisee. And yet our Lord here tells his disciples, that his religion not only excluded the badness, but excelled the goodness of the scribes and Pharisees. We must do more and better than they, or we shall come short of heaven. They were partial in the law, and laid most stress upon the ritual part; we must be universal, and not think it enough to give the priest his tithe, but give God our hearts. They minded only the outside; we must cherish inward godliness. They aimed at the applause of men; we must aim at acceptance with God. They were proud of what they did in religion, and trusted to it as a righteousness; we, when we have done all, must say we are unprofitable servants, and trust only the righteousness of Christ; and thus may go beyond scribes and Pharisees.

V. 17—20. Let no man suppose that Christ allows his people to trifle with any command of God. While He fulfilled the types and prophecies, while He honored the moral law and the exhortations of the prophets, by his obedience unto death upon the cross;—how impious to suppose, that He purchased for men the license of indulging their lusts! No; till the consummation of all things, 'not one word shall pass from the law, till all be fulfilled.' No sinner receives Christ's righteousness, till he condemns himself, and repents of his evil deeds. The goodness and mercy revealed in the Gospel lead believers to deeper repentance and self abhorrence. Unbelievers will be condemned for transgressions of the law; but it is the Christian's rule of duty, written in his heart. He delights in it, and defects; and that important privileges were connected with a descent from Abraham. ... It has been said by the Jews, that if but two were to enter heaven, one would be a Pharisee, the other a scribe. Doddridge. The zeal and strictness of the scribes and Pharisees was chiefly about their traditions, by which they made void the law of God; and about minute services, by which they concealed the neglect of judgment, mercy, and faith. In this they have been imitated by multitudes, and especially by the Roman Catholics. Here something is proposed to the Christian, to excite self inquiry. What was the righteousness he must exceed, and how did it fall short? The Pharisees were strict in observing the letter of the law. They rigorously kept the Sabbath; "fasted often;" prayed constantly; so revered the Scriptures, as to wear sentences from them about their persons; are said not to have passed a day without reading the decalogue; they never eat with unwashed hands, and so strictly gave God his due, as to bring to the sacred treasury the tithes of the cleanest herbs. Ch. 23:5. 15: 1, 2. 23:23. Such was their righteousness.

For this they are not blamed. Rather let those take warning who have not even this outward righteousness. The strict observance of the Sabbath was required by the law of Moses; and God has uniformly approved those who keep the Sabbath holy. Fasting is good, to bring the body into subjection. Prayer is the chain which connects man with God, and earth with heaven. Neither could they be blamed for exactness in paying whatever the law required. Indeed, our Lord tells them, "this ought ye to have done." What, then, was wanting to their righteousness? That, on which the whole of religion depends: the heart: the heart converted to God; the right spirit. What they did was directed by no love of God, no desire of pleasing Him, no zeal for his service, or glory. It was either hypocrisy, or self-love; and done with a desire to be thought highly of among men, to procure the honor of superior sanctity. Such is the reason, why the righteousness of those who are really the servants of God, "must exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees." We must be perfect in the love of God.

tial in that kingdom; Isa. 9: 15. When truth shall appear in its own evidence, such corrupt teachers shall be in no esteem with the wise and good. Nothing makes ministers more base than corrupting the law, Mal. 2: 8, 11. Those who extenuate sin are the dregs of the church; on the other hand, those are truly honorable who lay out themselves, by their doctrine and practice, for the promotion of practical religion; who both do and teach that which is good; for those who do not as they teach, pull down with one hand, what they build with the other. But those who live up to what they preach, are truly great; they honor God, and God will honor them; 1 Sam. 2: 10. Hereafter, they shall shine as stars in the kingdom of God.

2. Their righteousness must exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees. Strange doctrine to those who looked upon the scribes and Pharisees as highest in religion.

The scribes were the most noted teachers of the law, and the Pharisees, the most noted professors of it; (ch. 23: 2.) They were looked upon by the people as super-conformed to the law. The people did not think themselves obliged to be as good as they; and it was a great surprise to hear that they must be even better, or they should not go to heaven; therefore Christ avers it with solemnity. I say unto you, it is so.

long to obey it. Let us, then, beware of antinomian licentiousness, and of pharisaical self-righteousness; these are Scylla and Charybdis, the rock and the whirlpool; and we need the 'Lord the Spirit' to pilot us between them. The clear exposition of the law of God, and the scriptural application of it to the heart and conscience, are the best preservative from these fatal extremes. Those who inculcate milder doctrines will please such as say, 'speak smooth things;' but they are the least of those who belong to the kingdom, if indeed they belong to it; while those who enforce obedience by example and doctrine, shall be great in the kingdom of God. Nor will any one enter heaven, who does not here become more holy than the scribes and Pharisees. SCOTT.

To illustrate his meaning, the Savior vindicated some commandments of the moral law from the corrupt and partial interpretations of the scribes; which showed, that their rule of righteousness was itself beneath the attainments of his disciples. 'It had been said by, or to, them of old time, thou shalt not kill.' (Marg.—Note, Ex. 20: 13.) God gave the law; and the elders made this gloss, 'Whoever shall kill, shall be in danger of the judgment;' implying that nothing but actual murder was prohibited, and was to be avoided mainly from dread of capital punishment. They thus explained away the extensive spiritual import of the command; and led the people to overlook the awful curse of God against transgressors. But Christ, the great Lawgiver and Judge, speaking with less error, not less authority, than in delivering the law from Sinai, declared, that 'whoever was angry with his brother without cause, would be in danger of the judgment.' Excessive anger must be proportionally 'without cause;' and all that settles into revenge, or vents itself in words and actions contrary to the law of love. We ought to be angry at sin, and to show our disapprobation of it, according to our relation to the offender; (Note, Mark 3: 1-5) we should seek his reformation by proper means, but not his hurt, at least in our private capacity. All men are brethren in this sense; and whoever is angry at another without, or above cause, 'shall be in danger of the judgment;' it deserves a punishment more terrible than that inflicted by courts of justice on the murderer; and calls for repentance, and needs the mercy and forgiveness of the new covenant. Whoever uses opprobrious epithets in his passion, calling his brother 'an empty, worthless fellow,' or 'a wicked and abandoned profligate,' would incur a punishment more severe, according to the violence contained in his revilings. These words, vain and foolish, used by persons assisted by the Spirit, speaking by virtue of office, with charity, and a desire to make others sensible of their folly, do not make a man 'obnoxious to this guilt;' (Gal. 3: 1. Jam. 2: 20, but only when they proceed from causeless anger, or ill-will.) Wutib Mueta, in

22 But I say unto you, 'That whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause, shall be in danger of the judgment: and whosoever shall say to his brother, *Raca, shall be in danger of a hell-fire.

3 Christ's exposition of the law, by which we are to be judged, and by which we ought to be ruled now, is exceeding broad, and not to be limited by men. He tells them that rash anger is heart-murder. Our brother means any person, though inferior, as a child, or servant, for we are all made of one blood. Anger is a natural passion, and is sometimes laudable, but it is sinful when without cause, or without good effect, or moderation; when we are angry, for instance, at children or servants, for that which could not be helped, or was owing to forgetfulness or mistake, and for which, if we had been guilty, we should not have been angry at ourselves; or when we are angry upon groundless surmises or trivial affronts: or when we are angry merely to show our authority, to gratify a brutish passion, to let people know our resentments, or to excite others to revenge—in such cases it is to do hurt. If we are at any time angry, it should be to awaken the offender to repentance, and prevent his doing so again, or to clear ourselves, (2 Cor. 7:11.) and to give warning to others. It is sinful when it exceeds due bounds, when we are vehement and outrageous in our anger. This is a breach of the sixth commandment, for he that is thus angry would kill, if he could and durst. Cain's murder began in anger.

He tells them that giving opprobrious language is longue-murder. It is not sinful when done with mildness, and a good end, as James says, O vain man; and Paul, thou fool; and Christ, O fools and slow of heart. But when it comes from malice, it is the smoke of that fire which is kindled from hell. Raca means 'thou empty fellow'; it is the language of that which Solomon calls proud wrath, (Prov. 21:24.) which disdains to set our brother with the dogs of our flock. This people which knows not the law is cursed, is such language, John 7:49. 'Thou fool' is a spiteful word, looking upon him as mean, vile, and not to be loved. 'Thou wicked man,' speaks a man without grace; the more the reproach touches his spiritual condition, the worse it is. 'Thou fool,' is a haughty taunting of our brother; 'thou reprobate,' is a malicious censuring of him as abandoned of God. Now this is a breach of the sixth commandment; malicious censures are a poison under the tongue; bitter words are as arrows, that wound suddenly, (Ps. 64:3.) or as a sword in the bones. A his good name is thereby murdered, and it shows such ill-will to him, that, if we could, we would strike at his life.

Christ tells them, that he who is angry with his brother is in danger of the judgment of God; he who calls him raca, is in danger of being punished by the council, or Sanhedrim; but whosoever saith thou fool, thou profane person, shall be in danger of hell-fire, to which he condemns his brother; so the learned Dr. Whitby. Some think that Christ, in allusion to the penalties of the Jews, shows that rash anger exposes men to lower or higher punishments, according to the degree of it. The Jews had three capital punishments—beheading, inflicted by the judgment; stoning, by the council, and burning in the valley of the son of Hinnom, used only in extraordinary cases. It signifies, therefore, that the anger and reproachful words in question are damning sins, but some more sinful than others, and accordingly there is a greater damnation for them. Christ would thus show which sin was most sinful, by showing which punishment was most dreadful.

4. From all this we infer, that we ought carefully to preserve Christian love and peace, and that if a breach happens, we should labor quickly for a reconciliation, humbling ourselves, and making restitution, as the case may require. We should do this for two reasons.

Till it be done, we are utterly unfit for communion with God in holy ordinances, v. 23, 24. The case supposed is, that thou hast injured thy brother, really, or in his apprehension. If thou art the party offended, make short work of it; no more is to be done, but to forgive him, (Mark 11:25.) and forgive the injury. But if the fault was either at first or afterwards thine, go and be reconciled to him, before thou solemnly approach to God in the services of his house. Note, When coming to a religious exercise, it is good to reflect seriously, and examine ourselves. When we bring our gift to the altar, there are many things to be remembered; then, if ever, we are disposed to be serious. Religious exercises are not acceptable to God, if performed in wrath, or in any bad passion, 1 Tim. 2:8. Prayers made in wrath are written in gall, Isa. 1:15. 58:4. Love or charity is so much better than all holocausts burnt offerings and sacrifices that God is content to stay for the gift, rather than have it offered while we are engaged in a quarrel. But though thus unfit for communion with God, yet that can be no excuse for the neglect of duty. 'Leave there thy gift, lest, otherwise, when gone away, thou be tempted not to come again.' Many give as a reason why they do not come to church or communion, that they

'Homer, forbids Achilles to strike Agamemnon, yet counsels to reproach him.' Hammond.—This is heathen, or classical morality. Scott. 'It has been controverted whether the referring should be to the ancients, or by the ancients,' says Bloomfield. The latter was first brought forward by Beza, adopted by our English translators, and defended by several. 'But the former is supported by the Fathers, the ancient versions, by Doddridge, [after Grotius, Whitby and Hammond,] Campbell, Rosenm.' It is observable, however, that, notwithstanding the opinion of Beza, the highly valuable version of Geneva has, 'Ye have heard that it was said unto them of the old time, Thou shalt not kill: for whosoever killeth shall be culpable of judgement.' Ed. 1568. In danger of the judgment. 'In the Hebrew commonwealth, every city, with its elders, who formed a court of judicature, with a power of determining less matters in their respective districts. The rabbies say, there were three such elders, or judges, [described by Jahn, as simply referees, or a session of reference, allowed to the Jews by the Roman laws,] in each smaller city, and twenty-three in greater. But Joseph speaks of seven judges in each, without any such distinction of greater or less. We often read in Scripture of the elders of cities; but the number of them is not determined.' Jennings. 'This tribunal, which decided causes of less moment, is denominated in the New Testament, the judgment, Matt. 5:22.' Jahn. That there were, according to the common opinion, twenty-three judges, Rosenm. states. From Weening, to be truly a fragment of the later Jews. Yet Jahn admits that there were of a similar character, 'synagogue tribunals, mentioned in John 18:2, which merely tried questions of a religious nature, and sentence: to no other punishment than "forty stripes save one," 2 Cor. 11:24.' The next higher body was the Sanhedrim, or Council, 'instituted,' says Jahn, 'in the time of the Maccabees, and composed of seventy-two members.'—'Its power,' he adds, 'had been limited, in the time of Christ, by the interference of the Romans.' '... It still, however, retained the right of passing the sentence of condemnation, or degrading punishment; but the power of executing the sentence when passed, was taken away from it, and lodged with the Roman procurator, John 18:31.' In the opinion of Michaelis, this Council was erected, at the time specified above, 'in imitation' of that which Moses constituted in the wilderness, and which, as he supposes, 'was not of long continuance.' Ed. Hell fire. The original word is Hebrew, or Syriac, and signifies 'the valley of Hinnom.' There idolaters burned their children to Moloch, and after this practice ceased, the valley was made as filthy and vile as possible: a fire was constantly burning, to consume the rubbish carried thither; and it is said, that it became a place for the execution of criminals.—'Hence this place, so execrable, came to signify the place of the damned, as the most accursed, execrable, and abominable of all places.' Mede.—The word is often used in the New Testament; and always for the place of final punishment. (29. 30. 10:23. 18:9. 23:35. Mark 9:43, 45, 47.) (Note. Ia. 30:33.) Scott.

Verses 23, 24.

Attention to expensive externals was used by the Jews of old, as well as by papists and others in later ages, as a compensation for injuries. This the priests encouraged, as it was profitable. But if any of Christ's disciples bring an offering to the altar, and after arriving there, remember that a brother had just cause to complain of him, he must not offer his sacrifice, but go without delay and make restitution for the injury, or acknowledgment of the offence, and by all reasonable means seek forgiveness and reconciliation. Nor may he, on this account, long postpone his sacrifice, but leaving it before the altar, return as soon as the matter is settled. This is spoken in the language of the Jewish dispensation, but is applicable to Christian ordinances, particularly to the Lord's supper. Restitution to the injured, consciousness to the injured, and forgiveness of injuries, are requisite to a proper attendance on this holy ordinance; but to neglect it for want of preparation is excusing disobedience to God, by injustice and malice towards man. 'First be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift.' Scott. 'It is observable, that Philo. [of Alexandria, in Egypt,] who Dr. Lardner concludes to have been born at or before the Christian era, explaining the law of the trespass-offering, tells us, "That when a man had injured his brother, and repenting of his fault, voluntarily acknowledged it, (in which case, both restitution and sacrifice were required,) he was first to make restitution, and then to come in: the temple presenting his sacrifice, and asking pardon." But if any one, just and natural account of the matter, and adds a great illustration to this text; especially considering that our Lord supposes in this case "not a trespass-offering, but a voluntary gift presented before the altar; and yet declares, that this will not be accepted, while there is a consciousness of having wronged a brother, and not till after a full reparation." Doddridge.

be reconciled to thy brother, *and then come and offer thy gift.

25 Agree *with thine adversary quickly, *whiles thou art in the way with him; lest at any time the adversary deliver thee to the judge, *and the judge deliver thee to the officer, and thou be cast into prison.

26 Verily I say unto thee, *Thou shalt by no means come out thence, till thou hast paid the uttermost farthing.

27 ¶ Ye have heard that it was said by them of old time, *Thou shalt not commit adultery:

28 But *I say unto you, *That whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her, *hath committed adultery with her already in his heart.

29 And *if thy right eye *offend thee, are at variance with a neighbor. But whose fault is that? One sin will never excuse another; it rather doubles the guilt. Want of charity cannot justify the want of piety. The difficulty is easily got over; those who have wronged us, we must forgive; and to those whom we have wronged, must make satisfaction, or a tender of it; so that, if a reconciliation be not made, it may not be our fault, and then come and welcome and offer thy gift. Therefore we must not let the sun go down on our wrath any day, because we must go to prayer before going to sleep; much less let the sun rise upon our wrath on a Sabbath day, because it is a day of prayer.

It is at our peril, if we do not labor quickly for an agreement, and this even on a temporal account. If our brother can recover considerable damages by prosecution, it is our wisdom, and duty to our family, to prevent that by a peaceable satisfaction; lest otherwise he put us to the extremity of a prison. Better, then, to compound, than stand it out. Many sin their estates by obstinately persisting in their offences. Solomon's advice in case of suretyship is, Go, humble thyself, and so deliver thyself, Prov. 6:1-5. It is good to agree, for the law is costly. Though we must be merciful to those who have injured us, we must be just to those whom we have injured. 'Compound quickly, lest he be provoked by thy stubbornness to insist upon the utmost demand, and not make the abatement he would have made at first.' A prison is uncomfortable to those who have been brought there by their own prodigality and wilfulness. It is important, too, on a spiritual account. While the quarrel continues, thou art unfit to bring thy gift to the altar, unfit to come to the table of the Lord, and so unfit to die. There is danger lest thou be suddenly snatched away by the wrath of God, and that iniquity be laid to thy charge, thou art undone forever. Hell is the prison for all who live and die in malice, for all the contentious; (Rom. 2: 8.) and out of it is no escape, to all eternity.

This is very applicable to our spiritual reconciliation to God through Christ. Agree with Him quickly, while thou art in the way. Note, The great God is an Adversary to all sinners. He has an action against them. It is our concern, so to acquaint ourselves with Him, that we may be at peace; Job 22: 21. 2 Cor. 5: 20. It is our wisdom to do this quickly. While alive, we are in the way; after death, it will be too late: therefore give not sleep to thine eyes, till it be done. The impenitent are constantly, exposed to God's most dreadful wrath. Christ is the Judge to whom they will be delivered, for all judgment is committed to the Son. He, who was rejected as a Savior, cannot be escaped as a Judge, Rev. 6: 16, 17. It is a fearful thing to be thus turned over to the Lord Jesus, when the Lamb shall become a Lion. Angels are the officers to whom Christ will deliver them; (Rev. 13: 41, 42,) devils are so too, having the power of death, as executioners to all unbelievers, Heb. 2: 14. Darned sinners must remain in their prison (1 Pet. 2: 4.) to eternity; they shall not depart till they have paid the uttermost farthing, and that will not be to the utmost ages of eternity. Divine justice will be forever satisfying, but never satisfied.

V. 27-32. We have here the great Lawgiver's exposition of the seventh commandment. It fully follows the former; that lays restraint on our sinful passions, this on our sinful appetites.

1. Thou shalt not commit adultery. This includes a prohibition of all other acts of uncleanness, and the desire of them. The Pharisees made it consist only in the act of adultery, suggesting that, if it was but regarded in the heart, God could not hear it; (Ps. 66: 18.) and thus thought themselves able to say, that they were no adulterers, Luke 18: 11.

2. Adulterous thoughts and dispositions are declared to be adultery or fornication. Perhaps the defilement which these crimes give to the soul, was not only included in the seventh commandment, but was signified in many pollutions under the ceremonial law, for which they were to wash their clothes, and bathe their flesh in water. Whosoever looketh on a woman—not only another man's wife, as some would have it, but any woman—to lust after her, has committed adultery with her in his heart. This command forbids all appetite, all lusting after the forbidden object; this is the beginning of the sin, lust concerning; (Jam. 1: 15.) it is a bad step towards the sin; and where the lust is approved, and the wanton desire rolled under the tongue as a sweet morsel, the sin is committed, so far as the heart can do it. Nothing is wanting but opportunity for the sin itself. Lust is conscience baffled or biassed; binned, if it say nothing against the sin; baffled, if it prevail not in what it says. All approaches are forbidden: not only looking that I may lust, but looking till I do. The eye is both the inlet and outlet of a great deal of wickedness of this kind;

Verses 25, 26.

The preceding verses naturally introduce the case of such as were exposed to lawsuits for injuring their neighbors. Here it would be prudent quickly to compromise the matter, though the terms be rigorous; and settle the business ere it come to a magistrate, lest a person being found culpable, be cast into prison for cost and damages, and continue there till the last farthing be paid.—But under this counsel a more important instruction is couched. Injuries done to men, as well as to our other sins, expose us to the wrath of God, our Adversary at law. We are going to the judgment. Our time is short. A way of reconciliation is revealed, and we should enter it immediately. If this be neglected, the cause will be tried, the sinner condemned, delivered to the executioner, and cast into hell. Seeing that he can never satisfy justice, nor pay his debt, (as new crimes enhance the score,) he must not expect ever to be liberated.—Here it is insinuated, how much more it concerns us in time to repent, lest we be cast into the infernal prison. Whitby, (Note, Luke 12: 58, 59.) Adversary, here, signifies properly, an opponent in a trial at law. Scott. This text has been considered a proper foundation not only for the doctrine of a purgatory, but also for that of universal restoration. But the most unwarrantable violence must be used before it can be pressed into the service of either of these unscriptural doctrines. At the most, the text can only be considered as a metaphorical representation of the procedure of the great Judge; and let it ever be remembered, that, by the general consent of all, (except the basely interested,) no metaphor is ever to be produced in proof of any doctrine. In the things that concern our eternal salvation, we need the most pointed and express evidence on which to establish the faith of our souls.

Verses 27, 28.

If a man allow himself to gaze at a woman, that thoughts of criminal intercourse may be, or till they are, excited, he is an adulterer, and deserves the punishment of adulterers. And his guilt will be aggravated, if he indulge the licentious imagination, and devise means for gratifying his desires, though he be prevented.—We cannot suppose, that this prohibits a man, on looking at a woman, whom he may lawfully marry, with such premeditation as to desire to possess her in marriage. An inclination for what is not sinful, can become sinful only by being inordinate, but it may be, and alas! commonly is attended with things greatly polluting and criminal. (Note, Ex. 20: 14.) The expositors of the law say, if a man sees a woman, whom he loves better than his wife,

'let him divorce the wife, and marry her.' Jerome. This is a specimen of Rabbinical morality! Scott. Impure thoughts are the immediate, and only sources of impure conversation, and an impure life. If the thoughts be cleansed, the man will be clean, of course. There is scarcely a more dangerous employment than the indulgence of a licentious imagination. It wanders over forbidden ground, often without thinking that it is forbidden; and has already been guilty of many and perilous transgressions, when it is scarcely aware of having transgressed at all. The mind, if it will watch its own movements, will be astonished to perceive, after a sober computation, how great a part of all its thinking is made up of licentious thoughts. Impure thoughts produce impure words; while strict and virtuous delicacy in language is not only indispensable to decency, and dignity of character, but to all purity of heart and excellency of life. But the innumerable and immense blessings of the marriage institution keep the moral world in being, and secure it from untimely and terrible dissolution. They are blessings, without which life, in instances literally innumerable, would be blasted in the bud, or its continuance prove a curse without which, natural affection and amiableness would never exist, domestic education be extinct, industry and economy never begin, and man be left to the precarious subsistence of a savage. But for this institution, learning, knowledge, and refinement would expire, government sink in the gulf of anarchy, and religion, hunted from the habitations of men, hasten back to heaven. Man, in the mean time, stripped of all that is respectable, amiable, or hopeful in his character, and degraded to all that is odious, brutal, and desperate, would prowl in solitudes and deserts to satisfy hunger and rage. The correspondence between heaven and earth would cease; and the celestial inhabitants no longer expect or find accessions to their society from this miserable world. To such evils every lewd man directly contributes. Were his principles and practices adopted universally, all these evils would universally prevail. That they actually do not, is, in no sense, owing to him. To the utmost, he labors to introduce them all.' Fr. Dwigton

Verses 29, 30.

This subjection of sensual inclinations, this victory over the most potent desires of the heart, (especially when habits have enslaved men,) is attended by painful effort, and the sacrifice of what has been highly valued. But, though painful, as 'plucking out a right eye,' or 'cutting off a right hand,' it must be done. 'The flesh, with the affections and lusts, must be crucified, corrupted, conquered and every inclination

Witness, Joseph's mistress, (Gen. 39: 7.) Samson, (Judg. 16: 1.) David, (2 Sam. 11: 2.) We read of eyes full of adultery, that cannot cease from sin, 2 Pet. 2: 14. What need have we, then, with Job, to make a covenant with our eyes, this bargain, that they might look upon the works of God, provided they would never fasten on any thing that would occasion impure imaginations; and under this penalty, that if they did, they must smart for it in penitential tears! Job 31: 1. Why have we the covering of our eyes, but to keep out corrupt impressions? If answaring looks are forbidden fruit, much more unclean discourse, and wanton dalliance, the fuel and bellows of this hellish fire. These precepts are hedges about the law of heart-purity, v. 8. They who dress, and deck, and expose themselves, with design to be lusted after, as Jezebel, that painted her face, and tired her head, and looked out at a window, are no less guilty. Men sin, but devils tempt to sin.

We are here taught, that it is better to lose the eye and the hand, than to perish eternally in sin. Corrupt nature would soon object,
'It is a hard saying, who can bear it?' Flesh and blood cannot but look with pleasure on a beautiful woman, and to forbear lusting after such an object is impossible.' Pretences like this will scarcely be overcome with reason, and therefore must be argued against with the terrors of the Lord.

If thy right eye offend thee, or cause thee to offend, by wanton glances upon forbidden objects; if thy right hand offend thee by wanton dalliances; and if it were indeed impossible to govern the eye and hand, so accustomed to wicked practices; if there be no other way to restrain them, which, blessed be God, through his grace there is, it were better for us to pluck out the right eye, and cut off the right hand, than to indulge them in sin, to the ruin of the soul. And if this, at which nature startles, must be submitted to, much more must we keep under the body, and bring it into subjection; we must keep a constant watch over our hearts, and suppress the first rising of corruption there.
We must avoid the beginnings of sin, and decline the company of those who will be a snare to us, though ever so pleasing. We must abridge ourselves in the use of lawful things when we find them temptations: we must depend upon the grace of God daily; we must su-walk in the Spirit, as not to fulfil the lusts of the flesh; and this will be as effectual as taking out a right eye, or cutting off a right hand, and perhaps as much against the grain to flesh and blood.

Perhaps this startling argument is here repeated, because we are loth to hear such rough things; Isa. 30: 10. It is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish, though it be as an eye or hand, which can be worst spared, and not that thy whole body should be cast into hell. Note, It is not unbecoming in a minister of the Gospel to preach of hell and damnation; nay, he must do it, for Christ Himself did it, and we are unfaithful, if we give no warning of the wrath to come. We must be exercised with fear from fleshly lusts which are such natural brute beasts: as cannot be checked, but by being frightened, and kept from the forbidden tree, but by cherubim and a flaming sword.
When we think it hard to deny ourselves, we should consider how much harder it will be to lie forever in the lake that burns with fire and brimstone. Some, who do not know or believe what hell is, will rather hazard their eternal ruin in those flames, than deny themselves a brutish lust. The whole body will be cast into hell, and there will be torment in every part of it; so if we care for our own bodies, we shall possess them in sanctification and honor, and not in the lusts of concupiscence. Our Master requires nothing from us but what He knows to be for our advantage.

Observe the reference to divorces. It hath been said, (He does not say, as before, by them of old time, because this was not a precept as those were, though the Pharisees were willing so to understand it, ch. 19: 7, but only a permission,) 'Whoever shall put her away, let him give her a bill of divorce. Let him not do it by word of mouth, as he might in a passion but deliberately, by a legal instrument, and solemnly.' Thus the law had prevented rash divorces and, perhaps, at first, when writing was not common, made divorces rare things; but afterwards they became very common, and the direc-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V 2. 32. We ought to consider how important our Lord gives a right understanding of the moral law, and how fatal consequences result from erroneous views of it. While we see, then, the strictness, spirituality and reasonableness of its precepts, as expounded by the divine Teacher; let us compare our lives, tempers, affections, thoughts, words and actions, with this rule. Then we shall plainly perceive, that 'by the works of the law no flesh shall be justified in the sight of God,' and Christ will be precious to our souls.—Whether we regard our conduct towards those who have injured us, or those whom we have offended, towards superiors, inferiors, relatives, friends, or servants; whether we regard the state of our hearts, the government of our passions, what we have done, or not done; and when we consider, that, to enjoy God and heaven, we must be holy according to this standard, we shall feel our need of the influences of the Spirit, and learn to value the ordinances, through which his sacred assistance is obtained. Thus it will be evident, that justice to men, as well as humiliation before God, is necessary to our going acceptably to the throne of grace, or the Lord's table; and we shall be led to inquire whether any of our brethren have cause of complaint against us, that we may remove impediments to communion with our heavenly Father. When we weigh the importance of eternity, and the uncertainty of life, we shall see the necessity of making without delay our peace with God, and shall value and imitate our blessed Peacemaker, who will shortly come, as the Judge, and avenge his cause on the impenitent workers of iniquity. Reflection on our situation in this world, will reconcile us to the mortification of our evil propensities, and the government of the bodily appetites. We shall see mercy concealed under the apparent severity of the requirement; our safety, advantage and felicity consulted; and the grace and consolations of the Spirit rendering our course practicable, and even cheerful. To be preserved from gross iniquity, our hearts must be kept with all diligence, and all our senses restrained from the things that lead to sin. Rules of strict purity will be found, most conducive to true comfort, even in the present world.

submitted to the authority of God, made subservient to his glory, the welfare of society, and the good of a man's own soul. If, then, the eye, the hand, or any other part of the body is so necessary to him, that its removal would certainly prevent it, and the temptation could not otherwise be overcome, it would be duty to remove it. Whatever anguish, or loss a man endured, it would be advantageous to lose a limb, or any organ of sense, rather than be cast with them all into hell. But, though the members be his instruments, yet sin proceeds from the lusts of the heart; if these be mortified, there will be no need of injuring the body;
if not, it would be of no use.—The mortification of sinful passions may be very painful. But if men would lose their limbs to save their lives, ought they to shrink back, when it is requisite to the salvation of their souls? The most watchful and self-denying government of sense and appetite is implied in this admonition.—It is worthy of notice, that Jesus always took for granted, that there is a future state, a resurrection, and a hell, and he set these realities before men's minds, and called their attention to them. (Marg. Ref. f-h.) Christ's hearers, for the most part were poor, and subsisted by daily labor. To them the loss of a right hand would be a greater calamity, than that of a right eye; so that if there was a translation and force in this passage, not, however, of Lidd's (Lidd.) The word literally signifies to cause to stumble, [make thee to offend, Geneva vers.] in this and many other places

As a stone over which a man falls, or a trap in which he is taken; so that men were rendered almost useless for the purposes of war,'

Verses 21, 32.

It has been shewn, (Note, Deut. 24: 1-4) how the Jews perverted the judicial law, which regulated divorces, and sought to render them less common and injurious; so that, when Christ appeared, they were very frequent, on the most trifling pretences. Having, therefore, mentioned the seventh commandment, our Lord took occasion to determine this matter, and declared, that whosoever 'puts away his wife' except for fornication before marriage, or adultery after it, (for the word is thought to imply both,) would strongly expose her to the guilt of adultery by marrying another man, and would be accessory to her sin; and the man who should marry her would commit adultery, her former husband being alive.—It seems evident, that divorces for adultery should be allowed to the injured, without any perplexing process. It may be consistent with justice, that a person divorced for adultery should not be permitted to marry again. But it can scarcely be expected, that such rightly done, it is a part of the glory due to his name, Dr. Paul confirmed what he said we appeal to a greater knowledge of a righteous Judge

Now the mind of Christ is, first, that we swear not at all, except when duly called to it, and justice or charity to our brother, or respect to the commonwealth, make it necessary for the end of strife, (Heb. 6: 16,) of which the civil magistrate must ordinarily be the judge. We may be sworn, but may not swear. We must not thrust ourselves on it for worldly advantage. Second. We must not swear lightly, in common discourse. It is a very great sin, to make a ludicrous appeal to the glorious Majesty of heaven. It is a gross profanation of God's holy name, and of one of the holy things which the children of Israel sanctify to the Lord. It has no excuse, and is the sign of a graceless heart. Thing enemies take thy name in vain. Third.

persons will be scrupulous in a single state, and thus more harm than good will result from the prohibition, and it is not found in Scripture. The permission to divorce the adulteress implies, that the law for putting to death such offenders was not indispensable under the New Testament.

SCOTT.

Verses 33—37.

The scribes explained the third commandment, according to the tradition of the elders, as prohibiting merely gross perjury, especially the breach of promissory oaths, or vows to the Lord. They allowed common swearing, except by the names of God. (Note, Ex. 20: 7). Christ commanded his disciples not to swear at all. Many examples, however, in the New Testament, shew that swearing on important occasions is lawful. (2 Cor. 1: 23. 1 Thes. 2: 5) There seems, then, no reason to conclude, that oaths in courts of justice, or on occasions which fairly require them, are wrong; if taken with reverence for Jehovah, and with consistency to truth. Yet the application of oaths, and the irreverence with which they are administered, are so full of guilt and evil beyond calculation. (P. O. Jer. 23: 9—32). A pious man, though he disapprove of the manner of administration, need not hesitate to take an oath, if he can otherwise do it conscientiously; for he is accountable only for his own conduct. But oaths taken without necessity on trivial occasions, in common conversation, and all the expressions, which answer the purpose, and seem to evade the guilt of an oath, are inconsistent with this prohibition.—The names of God, Lord, or Christ, as expletives, notes of admiration, with bad or good wishes, prayers, as ‘God bless us,’ ‘Lord have mercy on us,’ ought not to be used in conversation, especially when there is no seriousness to be maintained, and when the words are used without any religious purpose or feeling. The writings of pagan authors are interlarded with oaths by their gods, and some professed Christians use this pagan language. If an oath be an act of worship, and the devil was worshipped under these idols; such expressions imply the worship of Satan, though they who use them mean not so. If it were to suffice a Christian to affirm, or deny, or ascribe, or to repeat, if necessary, All more than

Our Savior reduced marriage to its primitive institution. They two shall be one flesh, not easily separated, and divorce is not allowed, except for adultery, which breaks the marriage covenant; but he that puts away his wife on any other pretence, consetteth her to commit adultery, and him also that shall marry her when thus divorced. Note, To lead others into sin, is to make one's self guilty of their sin, and accountable for it. This is one way of being a partaker with adulterers, Ps. 50: 18.

V. 33—37. We have here an exposition of the third commandment, which we are the more concerned rightly to understand, because God will not hold him guiltless, who breaks it.

1. It forbids perjury, forswearing, and the violation of oaths and vows. Thou shalt not use, or take up, the name of God in vain, or use it to a vanity, or a lie. He hath not lifted up his soul unto vanity is expounded in the next words, nor scorn deceitfully, Ps. 24: 4. Perjury is condemned by nature, as impiety towards God, and injustice towards man. Divine wrath was always judged to follow this sin so infallibly, that the forms of swearing were commonly turned into imprecations, as, God do so to me, and more also; and with us, So help me God; wishing no help from God, if I swear falsely. Thus, by the consent of nations, have men cursed themselves not doubting but that God would curse them, if they then lied against the truth.

But thou shalt perform unto me the Lord thine oaths, (Numb. 30: 2.) meaning either vows made to God, which must be punctually paid, (Ecl. 5: 4, 5.) or promises made to our brethren, of which God is Witness. These must be performed with an eye to the Lord, and for his sake. If we break a promise, ratified with an oath, we have not lied unto men only, but unto God.

2. All rash, unnecessary swearing is forbidden, Swear not at all, v. 34. Compare James 5: 12. Not that all swearing is sinful; nay, if religious worship, and in it we give unto God, v. 6: 13. and 10: 20. Isa. 45: 23. Jer. 4: 2. by such solemnities, 2 Cor. 1: 23. In swearing, wedge a higher court, and imprecate the ven- if we swear deceitfully.

or lightly, in common discourse. It is a very us appeal to the glorious Majesty of heaven.
God's holy name, and of one of the holy things

Thine enemies take thy name in vain. Third.*

We must, specially, avoid promissory oaths, for they are to be performed. An affirmative oath ceases, when we have faithfully discovered the whole truth; but a promissory oath binds so long, and may be broken in so many ways, by surprise, and strength of temptation, that it is not to be used, but in great necessity. The frequency of oaths among Christians is a reflection upon their fidelity. Their word should be as sacred as an oath. Fourth. Christ forbids us to swear by any creature. Some, as a civility, as they thought, would not swear by the name of God. Every thing is, in some way, related to God, and it is as dangerous to swear by them as by Him. It is the verity of the creature which is at stake. Now that cannot be an instrument of testimony, but as has regard to God, who is the chief Truth. Swear not by the heaven: 'As sure as there is a heaven, this is true.' There God specially manifests his glory, as a Prince on his throne. You cannot swear by heaven, but you swear by God Himself. Nor by the earth. He rules over the earth; it is under his feet, and stands in relation to Him as his, Ps. 24: 1. In swearing by it, you swear by its Owner. Nor by Jerusalem, for which the Jews had such veneration, that they could think of nothing more sacred to swear by, Jerusalem is in special relation to God, for it is the city of the great King, (Ps. 135: 2.) the city of God; (Ps. 46: 4.) He is therefore interested in every oath taken by it. Neither by thy head. Though it is an essential part of thee, it is more God's than thine. He made all its springs and powers. Thou canst not change the color of one hair; so thou canst not swear by thine head, but thou swearest by Him who is the Life of thy head, and the Lifter up of it, Ps. 3: 3. Fifth. In all your communications, then, be content with Yea, yea, nay, nay. Let us say yea, it is so; and if need be, double it, and say yea, yea, it is indeed so. Verily, verily, say our Savior's yea, yea. So we may use no, or no, no; and, if our fidelity is known, that will be sufficient; if it be questioned, swearing and cursing will only render it more suspicious. They who can swallow a profane oath, will not strain at a lie. Pity it is, that a form of speech which Christ intended to be common to all disciples, should be fastened as a reproach upon a religious sect, when, as Dr. Hammond says, we are in a manner directed to the use of it. For whosoever is more than these cometh of evil, though it do not amount to the iniquity of an oath. It comes from the devil, as an ancient copy has it; from the corruption of men's nature, from a reigning vanity in the mind. All men are liars, and therefore think they cannot be believed without oaths. Note, Christians should, for the cred-

his cometh of evil, the evil one, or the evil of our corrupt nature. Men are so deceitful, that they fear to trust each other without oaths. They suspect each other; or the speaker fears that his bare word will not be taken, or swears to conceal his bad designs. But Christians should try so to speak that their word may be as satisfactory as another man's oath. Though the necessity of oaths is found in the deceitfulness of man; yet the worse men become, the less are they restrained by them; the better they are, the less the need of them.—The term rendered 'communication' limits the prohibition to social intercourse, so that to extend it to judicial, or public doings, is unwarranted. (Note, Jam. 5: 12.) SCOTT. 'The clause in the thirty-seventh verse demonstrates, that the thirty-fourth is to be explained with the limitation to ordinary intercourse; for oaths were never allowed but rarely, and only in the Mosaic law. Exod. 22: 10, 11; Num. 5: 19, 21; Deut. 29: 12.' But, that if Christ's prohibition referred to swearing in solemn cases, He would have charized the Divine law with enjoining an immutability.' DODGE. 'In the commission of most sins, mankind usually expect and believe they shall obtain some natural good, and this is almost always the prime object of their sinful pursuit: good, forbidden, indeed, and therefore unlawful; yet apprehended as good by the sinner. But in profaneness there seems to be no good, either enjoyed or expected, beside that which is found in the mere love and indulgence of sin. The sin is the good; and not any thing peculiar to the manner in which it is committed, or the acquisition expected by it. It may be said that the profane person recommends himself to his companions. But he is not esteemed, even by them. They may desire him as an associate, and they may relish his wickedness; but they approve of neither. In the same manner, they may treat and converse with him, but they do not esteem him. A sin committed without motives of such magnitude as to be properly stigmatized temptations, may be justly termed disinterested sin, committed from love of it, with no regard to any natural good, in which it is to terminate. Undoubtedly, then, it is wickedness of a nature eminently guilty; and the author of it must be eminently odious and vile in the sight of God.' Pr. DWIGHT.

of their religion, avoid that which cometh of evil, and has the appearance of it. That may be suspected as a bad thing, which comes from a bad cause. An oath is physic, which supposes a disease.

V. 38—42. The law of retaliation is expounded, and in a manner repealed. Observe, 1. What the Old Testament permission was in case of injury. Ye have heard that it has been said; not, as before, been said by, or to, them of old time. It was not a command that necessarily required satisfaction, but they might lawfully insist on it; an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth, (Ex. 21: 24. Lev. 24: 20. Deut. 19: 21.) to be done by the magistrate, who bears not the sword in vain, but is the minister of God, an avenger to execute wrath, Rom. 13: 4. The Jewish judges were directed what injuries to inflict in cases of maims, for a terror to the mischievous, and for a restraint to the injured, that they may not require a greater punishment than is proper. It is not a life, for an eye, nor a limb for a tooth, but proportionable; a commutation might also be made with money, (Numb. 35: 31.) for in providing that no ransom shall be taken for the life of a murderer, it is supposed that for maims pecuniary satisfaction was allowed.

But some Jewish teachers, not the most compassionate of men, insisted that such revenge should be taken by private persons, and that there was no room for remission or commutation. Even now, under the Romans, when the judicial law had fallen, they were still zealous for anything which looked harsh or severe. This is now in force, as a direction to magistrates, to use the sword of justice according to the good and wholesome laws of the land. That judge neither feared God nor regarded man, who would not avenge the poor widow of her adversary, Luke 18: 2, 3. And it is in force as a rule to lawyers, to provide accordingly, and apportion punishments to crimes.

2. The New Testament precept. As to the complainant, he must forgive the injury, as done to himself, and must insist on the punishment no farther than is necessary for the public good. This is consonant to the meekness of Christ. Two things are taught, I say unto you that ye resist not evil. To resist an evil, attempted on us, is here as expressly forbidden as the resisting of the higher powers is, (Rom. 13: 2.) and yet we must take care of ourselves and families. We may resist evil, so far as is necessary for our own security; but we must not render evil for evil; we must not bear a grudge, but go beyond those who have treated us unkindly, in forgiving them, Prov. 20: 22. 24: 29. 25: 21, 22. Rom. 12: 17. The law of retaliation must be consistent with the law of love. Our recompense, in case of injury, is in God's hands; and sometimes in the hands of his viceregents, where it is necessary to preserve the public peace: but it will not justify us in hurting our brother, to say that he began, for it is the second blow which makes the quarrel; and when we were injured, we had an opportunity, not to justify our injuring him, but to shew ourselves the true disciples of Christ, by forgiving.

Three things our Savior notices. Sm. ing on the cheek—not only an injury, but an affront, (2 Cor. 11: 20.) Turn to him, who smites thee, the other cheek; that is, instead of avenging that injury, prepare for another, and bear it patiently; give not the rude man as good as he brings; do not challenge him, nor enter an action against him; if he must be bound to his good behavior, leave that to the magistrate; there are no bones broken, no great harm done, forgive and forget it; and, if proud fools think the worse of thee, and laugh at thee for it, allow wise men will honor thee, as a follower of the blessed Jesus, who, though He was the Judge of Israel, did not smite those who smote Him on the cheek, Mic. 5: 1. Perhaps, with some base spirits, it will expose us to a like affront again, and so it is, in effect, to turn the other cheek; still let us trust in God to protect us in the way of duty. Perhaps, the forgiving of one injury may prevent another, when revenge would have drawn it on. Some will be overcome by submission, whom resistance would the more exasperate. Prov. 25: 22. However, Christ will reward with eternal glory the shame thus patiently endured; and though not directly inflicted, if it be quietly borne for conscience' sake, and in conformity to Christ's example, it shall be regarded as suffering for Christ. And take away thy coat. Note, Legal processes are frequently made use of for doing the greatest injuries. Though judges be just, yet it is possible for men, who make no conscience of oaths and forgeries, by course of law, to force off the coat from a man's back. Marvel not at the matter, (Eccl. 5: 8.) but, in such a case, rather than go to the law by way of revenge, rather than exhibit a cross bill, or stand out to the utmost for thy undoubted right, let him take thy cloak also. If the matter be small, it is good to submit to it for the sake of peace. 'It will not cost thee so much to buy another cloak, as your course of law to recover that.'

Whoever shall compel thee to go a mile, grudge not at it, go with him two miles, rather than fall out with him.' Do not say, 'I would do it, if I were not forced,' but say, 'I will do it lest otherwise there be a quarrel'; and it is better to serve him than thy own pride and revenge. The Jews taught, that the students at law were not to be pressed, as others might be, to travel on the public service; but Christ will have his disciples comply, rather than offend the government. The sum of all is, Christ's disciples must not be litigious, but submit to small injuries; if they be such as require us to seek reputation, it must be for a good end, and without revenge. We must make the best of injuries. If any say, Flesh and blood cannot pass by such an affront, let them remember that flesh and blood shall not inherit the kingdom of God.

Give to him that asketh thee. If able, look on the request of the poor as giving thee an opportunity to be charitable.' When a real object of charity is presented, we should give at the first word. Give a portion to seven, and also to eight; yet our charity must be guided with discretion, (Ps. 112: 5.) lest we give that to the idle, which belongs to the deserving. 'We should say to the poor as God to us, Ask, and it shall be given you. We must be ready to lend. This obliges the borrower to foresight, industry, and honesty. 'From him who would borrow something to live on, or to trade on, turn not thou away. Shun not those who have a request to make of thee, nor contrive excuses to shake them off.' Be easy of access to him who would borrow. Though he be shameful, and have

Verses 33—42.

The law referred to (Ex. 21: 24, 25. Lev. 24: 19, 20.) was the magistrate's rule in deciding causes, declaring the utmost punishment which he might inflict, when nothing else would satisfy the offended. But the scribes interpreted it as authorizing private revenge, and requiring people to exact retaliation. Now Christ declared, that the moral law required the reverse of this spirit and conduct. His disciples must not resist evil, or the injurious party, by violent opposition, or litigious lawsuits; and there is little need to name exceptions and limits to these general rules; self-love will suffice. The preservation of life, liberty, or important property, authorizes, and often requires a man to defend himself at the peril of an illegal assault; commonly, however, it is better to yield to insults and injuries, than to retaliate by force or legal process; and it is not the spirit of Christianity to put the life and soul in competition with a sum of money, however great, when there is no reason to fear further violence. If a man give a disciple of Christ a contemptuous or painful blow on the cheek, it is duty and wisdom to take it patiently, not to expose himself to further insult, rather than to begin a contest by a blow, a challenge, or a lawsuit: even though he be despised for want of spirit, through obedience to his Lord.—In cases of importance, other duties may require a man to seek the protection of the law, justice by creditors, the public, or his own family, may engage him to defend his estate, and to check the exorbitancy of men; and a Christian may persecute a criminal from love to justice, but not from revenge. Yet, there are men of the world enough to deal with such depredators, and a Christian rarely needs to waste his time or try his temper about them.—Under various pretences men may require disciples of Christ to attend them on business, public or private; but if they insist on a man's going a mile out of his way to serve them, it is better to go two than quarrel; it is expedient rather to give or lend to those who injuriously require it, than to refuse with harshness, or selfishness, and much more to give or lend where there is need, and a prospect of doing good.—It is evident that limitations must be admitted in the last instance; for no one can long give and lend to every one who asks him, but must consider his own ability, and the nature of the case, and act accordingly; hence we suppose that limitations are implied in other admonitions, and must be judged of by the law of 'loving our neighbor as ourselves.' The obvious instruction is, 'suffer any injury for the sake of peace, when no duty requires the contrary; and commit your concerns to the Lord.'—Those who were compelled by authority to accompany and convey the baggage of travellers, sustaining a public character, are supposed to be meant in our Lord's precept. Even if the case were oppressive, or the person legally exempted, compliance would be preferable to a contest. Scott. This custom, to transmit intelligence by 'couriers placed at regular distances,' was practised first, says Kuhn, by the Persians, Cyrus and his successors, from whose language, indeed, the original word is derived. They might, it appears, seize of men's horses, vessels, or themselves, at pleasure, while on their progress, for public service. The Roman, as Bloomfield remarks, continued the practice, which is still retained, as we find from travellers, by the Turks; and resistance may be punished with death. Ed.

must render good for evil. It speaks a nobler principle than actuates most men; others salute their brethren, we must love our enemies; otherwise, what reward have we? Note, Those who promise themselves a reward above others, must study to do more than they.

Be ye therefore perfect, as your Father in heaven is perfect; which may be understood as including all things, wherein we must be followers of God as dear children. Note, It is the duty of Christians to desire and aim at perfection in holiness; (Phil. 3: 12-14.) and therein we must study to conform ourselves to our heavenly Father's example, (1 Pet. 1: 15, 16.) especially in doing good to enemies; Luke 6: 35. It is God's perfection to forgive injuries, to entertain strangers; and to do good to the evil and unthankful; and it will be ours to be like Him. We, that owe our all to the divine bounty, should aim to copy it.

CHAP. VI. V. 1-4. As we must do better than the scribes and Pharisees in avoiding heart-sins, so, likewise, in maintaining heart-religion, that we may be approved of God, not that we may be applauded by men. Luke 12: 1. Alms-giving, prayer, and fasting, are three great Christian duties—the three foundations of the law, say the Arabians: by them we do homage to God, with our three principal interests; by prayer, with our souls, by fasting, with our bodies, by alms-giving, with our estates. Thus we must not only depart from evil, but do good, and do it well, and so dwell for evermore.

Take heed of hypocrisy; intimating that it is a sin, of which we are in great danger. It is a subtle sin: vain-glory insinuates itself into what we do, ere we are aware. The disciples would be tempted to it by their power to work miracles, by their living with some who admired, and others who despised them. Take heed, for if hypocrisy reign in you, it will ruin you. The dead fly spoils the precious ointment.

Two things are supposed. 1. The giving of alms is a great duty, in which the disciples of Christ must abound. It is prescribed by the law of nature, and of Moses, and great stress is laid on it by the prophets. Some ancient copies read righteousness, instead of alms, for alms are righteousness, Ps.

112: 9. Prov. 10: 2. The Jews called the poor's box, the box of righteousness. What is given them is said to be their due, Prov. 3: 27. The duty is not the less excellent, because it is abused by hypocrites. Though superstitious Papists have made a merit of good works, that does not excuse covetous Protestants. Our alms do not deserve heaven; yet we cannot go to heaven without them. It is pure religion, Jam. 1: 27. and will be the test at the great day.

2. It has a great reward, if it be not done in hypocrisy. It is sometimes rewarded in temporal things, with plenty, (Prov. 11: 24, 25. Prov. 17: 1.) security from want, (Prov. 28: 27. Ps. 37: 21, 25.) succor in distress, (Ps. 41: 1, 2.) honor and a good name, which follow those most, who least covet them, Ps. 112: 9. However, it shall be recompensed in the resurrection of the just, with eternal riches; Luke 14: 14. 'The riches you impart form the only wealth you will always retain.'

Observe what the hypocrites did. They performed the duty indeed, but in pride and vain-glory, purely that they might be extolled for good men, and get in return much more than they gave. They accordingly gave alms in the synagogues and in the streets, where the multitude applauded their liberality, because they shared in it; but were so ignorant as not to discern their abominable pride. Probably they had collections for the poor in the synagogues, and common beggars haunted the streets, when the hypocrites chose to give their alms. Not that it is unlawful to give alms when men see us; but so that men may see us; we should rather choose those objects of charity which are less observed. If the hypocrites gave at their own houses, they sounded a trumpet, under pretence of calling the poor together, but really to proclaim their charity.

Verily, I say unto you, they have their reward. At first view this seems a promise; if they have their reward, they have enough; but two words make it a threatening. It is their reward, not the reward which God promises to those who do good, but which they promise themselves, and a poor reward it is; they did it to be seen of men, and they are seen of men: they chose their own delusions, and they shall have what they chose. Carnal professors stipulate with God for preferment, honor, wealth, and they

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 43-49. Our motives, encouragements and advantages suffice for considerable attainments in all things. More may be expected from those, who are redeemed to God by the blood of Christ, than from others, and more will be found, notwithstanding impediments. Whenever they allow themselves to be outdone in good by strangers to the Gospel, they forget their principles and degrade their character. Let us, then, ask of God to enable us to prove ourselves his children, by copying his goodness and mercy to the injurious; 'not being overcome of evil, but overcoming evil with good.' Let us reverence an oath, as well as pay the Lord our vows. Let us establish such a reputation, that we may be believed, when our communication is yea, yea; nay, nay; that we may not be tempted to any language that cometh of evil. Let us be followers of God as dear children, and walk in love, even as Christ loved us, and gave Himself a sacrifice for our sins; and, following after many degrees of holiness, let us expect to be at length made perfect, even as our Father in heaven is perfect.' Scott.

NOTES. Verses 1-4.

The religion of the Pharisees was distinguished from that of Christ by its motives, as much as by its rule. He therefore proceeded to warn his disciples against hypocrisy and ostentation in duty, admonishing them not to perform 'their righteousness,' (Marg.) or good works, to be 'seen of men.' Some ancient copies and approved versions read it, as a general word, including the following particulars: Christians should 'let their light so shine before men, that others, seeing their good works, may glorify their Father;' yet they must not do the works to be 'seen of men.' Their conduct should be such, as to constrain others to see an excellence in their religion; but every action should spring from the fear and love of God, and regard to his acceptance and glory, and not from a desire of being commended. (Notes, 5: 14-16. 23: 5-7.) This our Lord illustrated by naming some services in which hypocrites are tempted to ostentation; and in which Christians should consult secrecy, if consistent with other duties. He taught his disciples, that, in contributions for pious or charitable objects, they should shun notoriety. The hypocrites published their liberality in public places, with as much care as if they had made it known by a trumpet. They sought first the applause of men. Not but that they made a merit of their services, as a compensation for their sins; but had not the praise of men been aimed at, they would not have been earnest to proclaim their liberality. Therefore this praise would be their reward. But the Christian must 'not let his left hand know what his right hand doeth.' He must act as secretly as the case will permit, and not indulge self-complacency. We desire that his charity should be known, but rather concealed: as tified with acting from regard to the will of Him, 'who seeth in secret,' not from desire of human applause. And his Father, seeing the action and motive to be good, will accept and publicly recompense them, especially at the last day. Circumstances vary, and require variations in conduct; these are charities, which can hardly be promoted without notoriety; and a leading person may be called to excite the vanity by his example. No duty is more liable to be an occasion of vainglory than this; and designs, beneficial to others, are supported by liberality springing almost entirely from this principle. The heart is deceitful, and if men love to put their names among subscribers to public charities, but are not equally liberal in private; if they love to hear of their own beneficence, but are unwilling to do much without the credit of it; it is plain how the case is with them.—Private charities, if not more useful, are more unequivocal; and the less reward we receive from man, the more we may expect from a gracious God, if we act from holy principles.—Our Lord takes it for granted, that his disciples will give alms according to their ability; and that a good work done from proper motives will be rewarded by our God. (Notes, 10: 40-42. Heb. 6: 9-10.) A trumpet. 'It is not being apparent from Jewish writings, that it was customary with the Jews to sound a trumpet, when they distributed their alms: this seems only a proverbial expression, to denote the making a thing known or public, as Jews and Gentiles were wont to do, by the sound of a trumpet, in their triumphs, and before acting their tragedies.' Whitby. Theatrical exhibitions of every kind were proclaimed by sound of trumpet. Hypocrites. 'Men, who carry themselves with other faces than their own, as stage-players do.' Leigh. The word is derived from the profession of actors, who personate characters not belonging to them, and, after the public exhibition, do not sustain these characters among those who know them. This they do for profit, or honor; and hypocrites in religion publicly assume a false character for similar purposes. Scott. The Greek word signifying 'righteousness' is admitted into the text of the first verse (and posed. This, however, was a contrivance 'to be seen of men,' that all might know their devotion, and applaud and confide in them accordingly. This reputation many of them acquired, and reaped the benefit of it. (Note 23: 14.) and they must expect no other reward. Verily, Christ alone used this word, as equivalent with truly. (5: 18, 20, 10, &c.) It is a strong affirmation, especially when doubled; and is not thus used except to confirm matters of importance, which are not to be taken for granted. (1: 5, 11; 2: 19, 24, 25; 3: 26, 32; 5: 53, &c.) and perhaps not very different from the expression in the Old Testament, 'as I live, saith the Lord.' SCOTT. The practice here intimated by our Lord may be traced in different nations. 'Such Turks,' says Hill, 'as at the common hours of prayer are on the road, or unable to attend the mosques, are still obliged to execute that duty; nor are they known to fail, however employed, but pray immediately, where they chance to be; insomuch that when a juryman, whom you see in the street, is asked how he has spent the last night, he replies, he will turn about, stand still, becket, and tell his charge he must have patience; when, spreading his handkerchief on the ground, he seats himself cross-legged upon it, and says his prayers, though in the open market; which having ended, he leaps briskly up, salutes the person he undertook to convey, and renews his journey.' This is general throughout the East. BURDER. The hypocrisy of these Pharisees was especially shown in the provision made for reciting the psalms, which they could not do, being then in the street. They were taken in their streets, to which they often added long pause, both before their prayers and after; so that usually, for three hours they were seen in a prayer habit and posture. LEE 'SCOTT

6 But thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father which is in secret; and thy Father which seeth in secret shall reward thee openly.

7 But when ye pray, use not vain repetitions, as the heathen do: for they think that they shall be heard for their much speaking.

8 Be not ye therefore like unto them; for your Father knoweth what things ye have and for thyself. Personal prayer is here supposed to be the duty and practice of all Christ's disciples. Instead of praying in the synagogue, and in the corner of the streets, enter into thy closet. Isaac went into the field, (Gen. 24: 63.) Christ to a mountain; Peter to the house-top. No place amiss, if it do but answer the end. Secret prayer is to be performed in retirement, that we may avoid ostentation, undisturbed, to avoid distraction, unheard, that we may use greater freedom; yet if circumstances are such that we cannot possibly avoid notice, we must not therefore neglect the duty, lest the omission be a greater scandal than the observance of it. But pray to thy Father which is in secret: to Me; even to Me, Zech. 7: 5, 6. The Pharisees prayed rather to men than to God. Their scope was, to court the applause of men. Do thou pray to God, and let that suffice thee. Pray to Him as thy Father, ready and gracious to answer, pity, and succor thee. Note, in secret prayer we must regard God as omnipresent. He is there, in thy closet, when no one else is. By secret prayer we give God the glory of his universal presence, (Acts 17: 24.) and may comfort ourselves with it.

As an encouragement, thy Father seeth in secret, when the eye of no man is on thee to applaud thee. Under the fig-tree I saw thee, said Christ to Nathaniel, John 1: 48. He saw Paul at prayer, in such a street, at such a house, Acts 9: 11. There is not a secret, sudden breathing after God, but He observes it.

He will reward thee openly. It is called a reward, but it is of grace, not of debt. What merit can there be in begging? The reward will be open; they shall not only have it, but have it honorably. The open reward is that which hypocrites are fond of, but have not patience to stay for. Sometimes secret prayers are answered openly, in a signal manner, manifesting God's praying people in the consciences of their adversaries. However, at the great day, all praying people shall appear in glory with the great Intercessor. The Pharisees had their reward before all the town, and it was a mere shadow. True Christians shall have theirs before the world, and it shall be a weight of glory.

2. We must not use vain repetitions in prayer, p. 7, 8. Though the life of it lies in lifting up the soul, and pouring out the heart, yet words have some interest in prayer, especially in joint prayer, for our Savior here speaks of that; for before He said, when thou prayest, here, when ye pray. And the Lord's prayer is a joint prayer, and that is the mouth of others in that, is most tempted to an ostentatious language and expression. Use not vain repetitions, either alone or in company. Observe, the fault here reproved is making a mere lip-labor of the duty of prayer. This is expressed by two words, vain repetitions; tautology, battology, idle babbling over the same words again and again, to no purpose, like that imitation of the wordiness of a fool, Eccl. 10: 14. A man cannot tell what shall be; and what shall be after him, who can tell? That which is indecent and nauseous in any discourse, must be still more so to God. Not all repetition is here condemned, but vain repetition. Christ Himself prayed, saying the same words, (ch. 26: 44.) viz. of more than ordinary fervor, Luke 22: 44. So Daniel 9: 18, 19. and there is a very elegant repetition of the same words, Ps. 136. It may be of use, both to express our own affections, and to excite the affections of others. But the superstitious rehearsing of a tale of words, as the Papists, in their ave-Mary's and paternosters, the dry going over the same things again and again, to make a show of affection when there is really none; these are vain repetitions, here condemned. When we would fain say much, and cannot say much to the purpose, this is displeasing to God and to wise men. Affectation of prolixity in prayer, either out of pride, superstition, or an opinion that God needs either to be informed or argued with, or because men love to hear themselves talk—all this is forbidden. But all long prayers are not forbidden. Christ prayed all night, Luke 6: 12. Solomon's was a long prayer. When our errands and affections are extraordinary, there is need of long prayers. It is not much praying that is condemned, but much speaking. The danger is, when we only say our prayers, not when we pray them. (Eccl. 5: 2.) Let thy words be few, considerate, and well weighed; take with you words, (Hos. 14: 2.) choose out words, (Job 9: 14.) and say not every thing that comes uppermost.

This is the way of the heathen; it ill becomes Christians to do as they do. The heathen were taught by the light of nature to worship God; but becoming vain in their imaginations, concerning the object of their worship, no wonder they did concerning the manner of it. Thinking God to be like themselves, they thought He needed many words to make Him understand what was said to Him, or to bring Him to comply with their requests. Thus Baal's priests were hard at it from morning almost till night. O Baal, hear us, O Baal, hear us; but Elijah, in a composed frame, with a very concise prayer, prevailed for fire from heaven first, and then water; 1 Kings 18: 26, 36. Lip-labor, though ever so well labored, if it be all, is lost labor.

Your Father in heaven knoweth what things ye have need of before ye ask Him; therefore there is no occasion for such an abundance of words. It does not follow that you need not pray; for God requires you by prayer to own your need of Him, and dependence on Him; and therefore you are to pour out your hearts before Him, and leave the event to Him. Consider, He is our Father by creation, by covenant, and our addresses to Him should be easy, unaffected. Children do not make long speeches to their parents, when they want any thing; it is enough to say, my head, my head, (2 Kings 4: 19.) Let us come with the disposition of children, with love, reverence, and dependence. They need not use many words, who are taught to say that one right, Abba, Father. He is a Father that knows our wants better than we. His eyes run to and fro through the earth to observe the necessities of his people, (2 Chron.

Verse 6.

Such prayer God will accept and answer. It shall be declared before men and angels, as evidence of humility, faith and piety, and rewarded accordingly.—Circumstances may demand a different course. Daniel saw it right to be open in his devotions, as no afraid, nor ashamed in peril, of being known to pray to God. This may expose a man to contempt, which it is his duty to bear for the Lord's sake. They who are constant in private devotions, cannot conceal it entirely from their families, and should not studiously desire it.—A field, a garden, or a mountain, may be as retired as a closet. They are consecrated by Christ's example. Wherever the heart can be lifted up to God without being observed, the Christian may offer his prayers, though in the concourse of cities, camps, or courts. (Note, Neh. 2: 4.) Scott. (This is a very impressive and emphatic address. But now! whosoever thou art, Jew Pharisee, Christian—enter into thy closet. Prayer is the most secret in discourse of the soul with God, and as it were the conversation of one heart with another. The world is too profane and treacherous to be of the secret. We must shut the door against it—endeavor to forget it, with all the affairs which busy and amuse it. Prayer requires retirement, at least of the heart; and this may be fitly termed the closet of that house of God, which the body of every real Christian is, 1 Cor. 3: 16. And what goodness equals that of God! to give not only what we ask, and more, but to reward even prayer itself! How great advantage is 'to serve a King, who places prayers in the number of services, and reckons to his subjects' account even their trust and confidence in begging all things of Him!')

Verse 7, 8.

This rule is not trasgressed by repetitions from the fulness of the heart. Men earnestly craving mercy know not how to give over, or to proceed to another subject. (Note, 2 Cor. 12: 7—10.) These are not vain repetitions, but like those which Christ used in the garden; both He and his servants have used many repetitions. (Marg. Ref. u.) It is not uncommon for men to use most words, when they have least meaning; and waste the time in repetitions, when the affections and perhaps the thoughts are otherwise employed. This is an imitation of the heathen, who thought to excite their deities to help them by the multiplicity of their words. But Christians should have more honorable thoughts of their omnipresent, omniscient, omnipotent and merciful Father, who is ready to give them all they want. He requires his children to pray, that they may sensibly feel their indigence and dependence; that their desires and expectations may be excited; and that they may be brought into a proper state to receive the blessing and render Him the praise. All copiousness must no more be condemned, than all repetitions; for Christ prayed whole nights; and there are so many things to be asked, that, if our hearts be in a spiritual frame, we may pray long without unmeaning repetition. But where this begins, devotion ends.—Cicero denies God's omniscience, declaring, that he did not think God could know things casual, or fortuitous. The heathen did not think it fit to allow of a God so envious as to attend to all things 'take care of them, or think they belonged to Him: and they thought 'it as well impossible as unsufferable in the God of the Christians, that He should diligently inspect the manners, actions, words, and secret thoughts, of all men, and be every where present with them.' Whitby.—This observation illustrates the instruction given in these verses. If philosophical heathens entertained such thoughts of God, what must have been the delusion of the multitude, when they incessantly exclaimed, 'great is Diana of the Ephesians!' or 'C Baal, hear us!' Use not vain repetitions. Words without ideas. In a popish Father, an address to Jesus, uses the word Jesu fifteen times, with only have mercy upon us, help us, intercede; and ending thus, 'Give me here my purgatory.' Scott. 'The Jews were guilty of the same practice, with whom it is an axiom, that every one that multiplies prayer is heard: also, whoever prolongs his prayer, his prayer does not return empty; and he that is long in prayer, his days shall be prolonged. According to their canons, a man ought every day to pray eighteen prayers. Their prayer-books abound in tautologies, expressing the same things in different words, and by a multiplicity of terms.'

mouths; after this manner, therefore, pray ye. The Jews had so corrupted this duty, that Christ saw it needful to show what must ordinarily be the matter and method of their prayers, which He gives in words that may be used, as the summary or contents of the several particulars of our prayers. Not that we are tied to the use of this form only, or always, as if this were necessary to the consecrating of our other prayers; we are led to pray after this manner, or to this effect. That in Luke differs from this; we do not find it used by the apostles; we are not here taught to pray in the name of Christ as afterwards; we are here taught to pray, that the kingdom might come, which did come when the Spirit was poured out; yet, without doubt, it is very good to use it as a form, and it is a pledge of the communion of saints, having been used by the church in all ages, at least, says Dr. Whitby, from the third century. It is our Lord's prayer, of his composing and appointing; it is very compendious, and yet very comprehensive. The matter is choice, the method instructive, and the expression very concise. We must acquaint ourselves with it, for it is used acceptably, no further than it is used with understanding.

Practical Observations.

V. 1-8. In various ways the evil of our hearts leads us aside from 'simplicity and godly sincerity.' Hypocrites corrupt their duties by selfish motives, whence the wicked excuse their own neglect of religion. But Christians must attend on every work and all means of grace, from right principles and holy intentions. The less they seek rewards and honor from men, the more may they expect them from God.—What discoveries will be made at the last day! Many now admired for charity, devotion and austerity, will appear as vain-glorious hypocrites. But, at that solemn period, the secret charities, and fervent prayers of believers, who seek the good of even their bitterest enemies, and their secret mortification of sinful propensities,

Verse 9.

The prayer which Christ taught his disciples contains, perhaps, more important instruction than can elsewhere be found in so few words. Some argue that it was intended only for the disciples before the introduction of the Christian dispensation. But neither Matthew nor Luke, who recorded it after that dispensation was fully opened, give any such intimation. We are not in this prayer to present our petitions in the name of Christ, and through his intercession; for it was not proper to declare this at that time.—No doubt the form has been misused, by unmeaning repetitions, to the exclusion of real prayer, and is repeated even by Protestants with little understanding, and with some superstition. Perceiving this mistake, some pious persons have gone to the opposite extreme, and have objected to the use of it, and in a measure overlooked the instruction contained in it.—Our Lord introduced the prayer by saying, 'After this manner pray ye.' In Luke we read, 'When ye pray, say.' It may be proper to use the very words, but not always necessary; for we do not find that the apostles thus used it. But we ought to pray after the manner of it; with that endearing familiarity, confidence in God, zeal for his glory, love to mankind, submission, moderation in temporal and earnestness in spiritual things, which it inculcates; avoiding vain repetitions, and using grave and significant expressions. Nor can we offer a petition warranted by God, which is not virtually comprised in these instructions.—Christ taught his disciples, though in the hearing of the multitude; and He had before spoken to them of God as their 'Father in heaven,' whom they were to glorify, from whom they were to expect their reward, and who knew what things they needed. In this endearing character He teaches us to address Him in prayer. He is the Father of all creatures, as the Author and Preserver of their existence; of all rational creatures, as the Father of spirits; especially of men, for whom He continues to provide, and to whom He does good, notwithstanding their transgressions. But though a Father to us, we have rebelled against Him; and by joining the arch-apostate, and being like him, we are 'the children of the wicked one.' Yet, through the divine Mediator, God is revealed as a reconciled Father, ready to receive his rebellious offspring, whenever they are willing to return to his service. When the sinner 'comes to himself,' and purposes to return to God by faith and prayer, he is taught to approach Him as a kind Father, 'not an inexorable Judge and Avenger, but he may come with encouragement. So that this endearing appellation teaches the penitent to pray with hope, and the established believer with confidence; as well as to regard the glory of his Father, and seek the disposition of dutiful children.—The expression, 'which art in heaven,' reminds us of the sovereign and universal authority, power,

This prayer, as indeed every prayer, is a letter sent from earth to heaven. Here is the inscription, Our Father; the place, in heaven; the contents, in the several errands; the close, for thine is the kingdom; the seal, Amen; and, if you will, the date too, this day.

There are specially three parts of the prayer: 1. THE PREFACE. Our Father; which art in heaven. Before we come to our business, there must be a solemn address to Him, with whom our business lies. Our Father; intimating that we are to pray for others; that we are members one of another. We are taught to thine to pray—not to saints and angels, who are ignorant of us, are not to have the honors we give in prayer, and cannot grant our requests. We are taught what title to give to God, that which speaks Him rather beneficent than magnificently for we are to come boldly to the throne of grace.

We must call him our Father. He is a common Father to all mankind by creation, Mai. 2:10. Acts 17:23. To the saints He is in a special manner a Father, by adoption and regeneration; Eph. 1:5. Gal. 4:6. and an unspeakable privilege it is. Thus we must eye Him in prayer, maintain good thoughts of Him, such as are encouraging and not affrighting; nothing more pleasing to God, or pleasant to ourselves, than to call God, Father. If He be our Father, He will pity our weaknesses and infirmities, (Ps. 103:13.) will spare us, (Mal. 3:17.) will make the best of our services, though very defective, will deny no good thing to us, Luke 11:11, 13. We have access with boldness to Him, as to a father, and we have an Advocate with the Father, and the Spirit of adoption. When we come repenting of our sins, we must eye God as a Father, as the prodigal did, (Luke 15:

from love to God and holiness, will be openly rewarded. Whilst the specious part of an ungodly man's character is shown, and his crimes and motives studiously concealed, and whilst the infirmities of a pious man are seen, but his good works and holy affections are veiled by humility, the difference may be scarcely discernible: but when the whole shall be known, the world will see the one to be meet for heaven, and the other deserving his doom. Let us, then, always act as before 'our Father who seeth in secret,' and as desiring no reward but what He will bestow on his children, for 'their work and labor of love.' (Note, 1 Cor. 4:3-5. v. 5.) SCOTT.

and majesty of God, his justice, holiness and felicity, for heaven is the high and holy place, the throne of God, and region of pure delight. This, then, instructs us to come before God with humility and reverence of his majesty; with abstraction from external objects and carnal imaginations; with spiritual desires and aspirations to the purity and felicity of his heavenly worshippers.—The first petition is, 'Hallowed be thy name,' or, 'Let it be sanctified, and had in honor.' The name of God signifies his being and perfections, and all that is implied in the appellations by which He is known. (Note, Ex. 34:5-7.) We are taught to pray, in the first place, that this name may be known, loved, and glorified. We desire in this petition the happiness produced by the service and favor of God; that we may so behold his glory, as to love, adore and honor Him, and that He may be glorified by us. We pray the Lord to make Himself known to others, till all nations 'worship Him in spirit and in truth,' as the God of salvation, and as revealed in His Word.—So that this is a prayer, that all atheism, infidelity, idolatry, impiety, superstition, ignorance, and false religion, may be banished from the earth; that God 'will make Himself known in his mysterious name, glory and grace, to all nations; that He, as one God in three persons, may be worshipped spiritually and acceptably by every one of the human species. (Marg. Ref. c.—Note, 28:19, 20. Hallowed. John 17:17, 19. 1 Cor. 7:14. Heb. 10:29.—Gen. 2:3. Ex. 20:8. Lxx. 10:3.) SCOTT. The admirable form of prayer which our Lord gave to his disciples, after cautioning them against all ostentation in their devotions, stands unrivalled in every thing that constitutes the perfection of prayer. It is concise, perspicuous, solemn and comprehensive; adapted to all conditions and classes of men; it fixes our thoughts on a few great, important points, and impresses on our minds a deep sense of the goodness and greatness of that Almighty Being to whom it is addressed. It begins with acknowledging Him to be our most gracious and merciful Father; it begs that his name may every where be revered, that his religion may spread over the earth, and that his will may be obeyed by men with the same ardor, alacrity and constancy that it is by the angels in heaven. It next entreats the supply of all our essential wants, temporal and spiritual; a sufficiency of the things absolutely necessary for our subsistence; the forgiveness of our transgressions, on condition that we forgive our brethren; and, finally, support under the temptations that assault our virtue, and deliverance from the evils and calamities that everywhere surround us; expressing at the same time the utmost trust and confidence in the power of God, to grant whatever He sees it expedient and proper for his creatures to receive.

holds ^a children of men, Ps. 33:13, 14. and we must in prayer see his eye on us. Thence He has a clear view of all our wants, burdens, desires, and infirmities. It is the firmament of his power likewise, as well as of his prospect, Ps. 150:1. As a heavenly Father, He is able to do great things for us, more than we ask or think. He has wherewith to supply our needs, for every good gift is from above. He is a Father, and we may come to Him with boldness, but a Father in heaven, and we must come with reverence, Eccl. 7:2. Thus all our prayers should correspond with that which is our great aim as Christians, to be with God in heaven. God and heaven must be particularly eyed in every thing. By prayer we send before us thither, where we profess to be going.

2. PETITIONS. They are six, the first three relating more particularly to God, the last three to our own concerns, both temporal and spiritual; as in the ten commandments, the first four teach us our duty toward God, and the last six our duty to our neighbor. We are taught to seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and then to hope that other things shall be added.

Hallowed be thy name. Elsewhere translated sanctified; here hallowed, because people were used to it in the Lord's prayer. Thus we give glory to God. It may be taken in adoration; as, that the Lord be magnified; for God's holiness is the glory of all his perfections. We must begin our prayers with praising God. It is very fit we should give Him glory, before we receive mercy from Him. Let Him have the praise of his perfections, and then let us have the benefit of them. It ought to be our chief and ultimate end in all our prayers, that God may be glorified. 'Father, glorify Thyself in giving me daily bread, and pardoning all my sins.' Since all is of Him and through Him, all must be to Him and for Him. In prayer, our thoughts and affections, unlike the Pharisees', must be directed to make of God our chief end. 'Do thus and thus for me, for the glory of thy name, and so far as is for the glory of it.' We desire that God may be glorified, both by us and others, and especially by Himself. 'Let thy name be glorified, as a Father, and as a Father in heaven. Let thy name be sanctified, for it is a holy name; no matter what becomes of our polluted names; but, Lord, what wilt thou do to thy great name?' When we so pray, we make a virtue of necessity; for God will sanctify his own name, whether we desire it or not; & will be exalted among the heathen, Ps. 46:10. When our Savior prayed, Father, glorify thy name, it was immediately answered, I have glorified it, and will glorify it again.

Thy kingdom come. This plainly has reference to the doctrine which Christ at this time, John the Baptist previously, and the disciples of Christ afterwards preached—the kingdom of heaven is at hand. The kingdom of your heavenly Father, the kingdom of the Messiah, is at hand; pray that it may come. Note. We should turn the Word we hear into prayer. Does Christ promise, surely I come quickly, our hearts should answer, even so, come. Ministers should pray over the Word; when the y preach, the kingdom of God is at hand, they should pray, Father, thy kingdom come. What God has promised, we must pray for. Promises are given, not to supersede, but to encourage prayer; and when the accomplishment of a promise is near, we should pray for it the more earnestly, as Daniel for the deliverance of Israel, when he understood that the time of it was near at hand; Dan. 9:2. See Luke 19:11. It was the Jews' daily prayer to God, Let Him make his kingdom reign, let his redemption flourish, and let his Messiah come and deliver his people, says Dr. Whitby, from Vitrina. Let thy kingdom come, let the Gospel be preached to all, and embraced by all; let all be brought to subscribe to the record God has given in his Word concerning his Son, and to embrace Him as their Savior and Sovereign. Let the bounds of the Gospel church be enlarged, the kingdoms of the world be made Christ's kingdom, and all men become subjects to it and live as befits their character.

Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven. We pray that God's kingdom being come, we and others may be brought into obedience to all its laws and ordinances. By this let it appear Christ's kingdom is come, let God's will be done; and let it appear as a kingdom of heaven, by introducing a heaven upon earth. We make Christ but a titular Prince, if we call Him King, and do not his will. Having prayed that He may rule us, we pray that we may in every thing be ruled by Him. Observe, the thing prayed for, thy will be done; Lord, do what Thine pleasest with me and mine; 1 Sam. 3:18. In this sense, Christ prayed, not my will, but thine be done. 'Enable me to do what is pleasing to Thee; give me the grace necessary to the right knowledge of thy will, and acceptable obedience to it. Let thy will be done conscientiously by me and others, not our own will, the will of the

The next petition has given rise to the opinion, that this prayer was suited only to the opening of the Christian dispensation, called 'the kingdom of God,' and 'kingdom of heaven.' (Note, 3:2.) But while any part of the earth remains subject to sin and Satan, and till the kingdom of grace be swallowed up in that of glory, this petition will be proper. That 'the name of God may be hallowed,' the kingdom of the Messiah must be established in its efficacy. In this petition, then, we ask, that this kingdom may be set up in our hearts, subjecting all within us to Christ our King; next, that it may be set up in the hearts of our children, relatives, servants, friends and neighbors; that 'all who are called Christians' may be led into the way of truth and holiness; the true Gospel be everywhere preached 'with the Holy Spirit sent' to render it efficacious; and 'all kings fall down before' the Redeemer, 'all nations do Him service'; in short, that sin, and Satan, and his party be banished out of the world, and confined to hell, never more to disturb the creation of God. Whatever pertains to the qualifying, sending, or success of ministers, conversion of sinners, peace and purity of the church, the subversion of anti-christian powers, and the bringing of Jews, Pagans and Mohammedans into the church, is implied in this petition—

We here pray, that all may become subjects to the kingdom of God, 'erected by Christ, that the knowledge of Christianity may go to all nations'; that 'the kingdoms of this world may be the kingdoms of our Lord,' all 'people and languages doing Him service'; that his 'kingdom may be advanced by the 'coming in of the Jews,' and 'fulness of the Gentiles,' the minds of all men being subdued to 'the obedience of faith,' and they shewing forth the virtues of it in their 'lives.' Whitby.—To this is annexed, 'Thy will be done in earth, even as it is in heaven.' The will of God may be considered with reference to his commandments, or his providence: strictly speaking, his providential will is done in earth equally as in heaven: but submission, and satisfaction in it, may be intended. The use of this clause, so meaning exclusively resignation to the will of God, limits and enervates its weighty and extensive import. The inhabitants of heaven do the will of God universally, perfectly, harmoniously, and with ineffable delight. And we are taught to pray, that all mankind may imitate their example; that the whole race of men, becoming subjects of Christ, may renounce all sin and wickedness, and obey God's commands, as the angels obey them; that there may be an end of injustice, oppression, fraud, violence, bloodshed, interperence, licentiousness, ungodliness, selfishness, malice and contention; and that righteousness, truth, goodness, mercy, purity, love of God and of each other, may fill the earth as they fill heaven. What a change would this be! What an extensive petition!—We should pray too, that all may rejoice in the sovereignty and glory of God, be satisfied with his arrangements respecting themselves, and rejoice to see others honored and happy. While requesting such blessings for others, we are taught to ask this submissive frame for ourselves, and aim at it in all our conduct. (Note Rev. 19:4-6.)

Having, 'first sought' the things, which pertain to the 'kingdom of God and his righteousness,' prayed for the display of his glory, and the good of all men, we are then directed to ask the things which pertain to our bodies in this life. Many suppose this petition to mean spiritual blessings, even the 'bread of life, which came down from heaven, to give life unto the world.' Some interpret it of the bread in the Lord's supper. But the supply of temporal wants seems to be meant. Bread is the principal thing needful for the body, and is often put for the whole. The use of this word, then, teaches us to ask only what is necessary, without craving superfluities,—referring it to our heavenly Father to determine what things are necessary to our station in life, families, and other circumstances. Christians, rich or poor, are taught to ask this provision of God for all depend on Him, and should receive it as his gift, give Him thanks for it, and use it to his glory, whether it come from their estates, or personal industry, or the liberality of others. We are taught to ask for the day; (with reference perhaps to the Manna.) and this instructs us to beware of covetousness, to be contented with a slender provision, and trust God from day to day. While we seek our daily bread from God, we must diligently use the means of obtaining it, and be provident, industrious and frugal. We must reject every thing gotten by means inconsistent with integrity; and not expect to be supported in sloth, or extravagance. (Note, Prov. 30:7-9.) Daily.—The original signifies, that which is fitting to our subsistence. That for every day. Suidas. 'Bread sufficient for our subsistence.' Theophylact. Scott.—'I can see no reason for changing our received translation, and cannot but acquiesce in Mr. Mede's remark, that the original signifies what is sufficient for our present support and subsistence: so that this petition is nearly parallel to that of Agur, and a most excellent lesson to teach us, on the one hand, moderation in our desires, and on the other, an humble dependence on Divine Providence for the most necessary supplies, be our possessions or abilities ever so great.' Unon.

We do not ask the bread of deceit, or other people's bread, (Prov. 20: 13, 17.) not the bread of idleness; (Prov. 31: 27.) but the bread honestly gotten; daily bread, teaching us not to take thought for the morrow, (ch. 6: 34.) but constantly to depend on Divine Providence, as those who live from hand to mouth. We beg of God to give it us, not sell or lend. The greatest of men must be beholden to God for their daily bread. To us, not me only, but others also. We must have a compassionate concern for the poor. It intimates, likewise, that we ought to pray with our families. We eat together, and therefore ought to pray together. This day; as duly as the day comes, we must pray to our heavenly Father, and reckon we should as well go a day without meat, as without prayer.

And forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors. And forgive intimates that, unless our sins be pardoned, we can have no comfort in life, or the supports of it. Our daily bread does but feed us as lambs for the slaughter, if our sins be not pardoned. It intimates that we must pray for daily pardon, as duly as for daily bread. He that is washed needeth but to wash his feet.

A petition: Father in heaven, forgive us our debts, our debts to Thee. Note, Our sins are our debts. There is a debt of duty, which, as creatures, we owe to our Creator. We do not pray to be discharged from that; but, on the non-payment of that, arises a debt of punishment. In default of obedience to the will of God, we become obnoxious to the wrath of God; and for not observing the precept of the law, we stand obliged to the penalty. A debtor is liable to process, so are we; a malefactor is debtor to the law, so are we. Our heart's desire should be, that our heavenly Father would forgive us our debts, that the obligation to punishment may be vacated, that we may not come into condemnation. In suing out the pardon of our sins, the great plea we must rely on, is the satisfaction made to the justice of God for the sin of man, by the dying of the Lord Jesus, our Surety, or rather

Whilst we daily seek from God such blessings, we must not forget, that we have no claim to them, but deserve his heavy indignation. Yet 'there is forgiveness with him'; and we are taught to pray for it, as often as for bread; not only forgiveness of former sins, but of late offences, in thought, word and deed, of omission and commission, in our conduct towards God and man. By these we contract debts continually. We receive existence, and all that we possess, from God; and to him they ought to be devoted; by failure to do we contract a debt, which we cannot pay, but which needs remission. (Note, Luke 7: 40-43.)—Being taught to ask forgiveness every time we pray, we are thus reminded to exercise watchfulness, self-examination, humiliation, faith, and hope in the mercy of God; and to forgive others, being required to add, 'as we forgive our debtors.' We ought to forgive others, as we expect forgiveness. Their failures in duty to us, are a small debt in comparison with our failures of duty to God. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 18: 23-35.) True repentance and faith always produce forgiveness of others. Malice and revenge are proofs of impenitence. If a believer be betrayed into this uncharitable spirit, he must not expect communion with God, but frowns and corrections, till reduced to a better temper. We are thus reminded often to examine ourselves impartially in this respect, least, in praying for pardon, we should call for wrath; and we are taught to ask for the humble, forgiving spirit required of us. 'The word debts is not to be interpreted of pecuniary obligations, which the debtor can pay; and the creditor cannot conveniently lose; yet when debtors are in the same condition in respect to us, as we are in respect to God, when they cannot pay us, and would be distressed, or ruined, if we insisted on it; they must remit the debt, as we hope God to remit ours. SCOTT. This petition supposes, that we are sinners, and need God's pardon. 'Of our offences' that these sins, should God deal with us according to them, would bring down his displeasure. Seeing every sin is a transgression of his law, it must make us guilty, till, by an act of grace, we have obtained remission. And this being the first spiritual petition we make for ourselves, it shows how much we are concerned to obtain it, our happiness entirely depending on the favor of God, and our misery on his displeasure.' WATSON. 'It is hard to imagine a more effectual expedient to promote forgiveness of injuries, than making it a part of our daily prayer, to ask such pardon from God, as we impart to our offending brethren. For, that every malicious purpose against him, we add turn, this petition into an imprecation, by which we should, as it were, bind down the wrath of God upon ourselves.' DODD.

flesh, or the mind, nor the will of men, (1 Pet. 4: 2.) much less Satan's will, (John 8: 44.) that we may not displease God, nor be displeased at what He does. Let it be done on earth, in this place of our probation, (where our work must be done, if ever it be done,) as it is done in heaven, that place of rest and joy. We pray that earth, now so akin to hell, may be made, by the observance of God's will, more like heaven; and that saints may be made more like the holy angels. We are on earth, blessed be God, not yet under the earth, and pray for the living; not the dead.

Give us this day our daily bread. Because our natural being is necessary to our spiritual well-being in this world, next after God's glory, we pray for the necessities of this life. Bread for the day approaching, for the remainder of our lives—bread for our subsistence, that which is agreeable to our condition in the world, (Prov. 30: 8.) food convenient for us, and our families, according to our stations. Every word has a lesson: bread, not dainties, or superfluities; that which is wholesome, though it be not nice; our bread, teaching us honesty and industry.

As we forgive our debtors. This is not a plea of merit, but of grace. Note, Those who come to God for forgiveness, must make conscience of forgiving such as have offended them; else they curse themselves, when they say the Lord's prayer. Our duty is to forgive our debtors. As to debts of money, we must not be severe in exacting them from those who cannot pay them, without ruining themselves and their families. But this means debts of injury. Our debtors are those that trespass against us, that smite us, (ch. 5: 39, 40.) and, in strictness of law, might be prosecuted for it; but we must forgive and forget, and this is a moral qualification for pardon and peace. It encourages hope that God will forgive us; for, if there be in us this gracious disposition, it is wrought of God; and, therefore, as a perfection transcendently in Himself, it will be an evidence that He has forgiven, having wrought in us the condition of forgiveness.

And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil. Expressed negatively. Having prayed that the guilt of sin may be removed, we pray, as is fit, that we may never return again to folly, and not be tempted to it. It is not as if God tempted any to sin; but 'Lord, let not Satan loose on us. Lord, leave us not to ourselves, (Ps. 19: 13.) for we are very weak; Lord, do not lay stumbling blocks before us, such circumstances as may be an occasion of falling.' Temptations are to be prayed against, both because of the trouble and danger of them, and the guilt and grief that may follow.

But deliver us from evil; the evil one, the devil; keep us that we be not assaulted, or that we be not overcome by those assaults; or from an evil thing, sin, which God hates, and by which Satan destroys men. 'Lord, deliver us from the corruption that is in the world through lust, from the evil of every condition in the world, from the strg of death which is sin; deliver us from ourselves, from our own evil hearts, from evil men, that they may not be a snare to us, or we a prey to them.'

3. CONCLUSION. For thine is the kingdom, the power, and the glory, forever. Amen. Some refer this to David's doxology, 1 Chron. 29: 11. Thine, O Lord, is the greatness.

1. It is a plea to enforce the foregoing petition. It is our duty to plead with God in prayer, to fill our mouth with arguments, (Job 23: 4.)

Verse 13.

The disciples are next taught to pray, 'lead us not into temptation.' (Note, Gen. 22: 1.) God never puts evil into the heart, nor stirs it up there by a positive influence. In the former case, 'a man is tempted by his own lust, and enticed'; in the latter, by Satan or wicked men. (Note, Jam. 1: 13-15.) Providence may lead us into circumstances, which give to our inward corruptions and the temptations of Satan advantages against us. This the Lord does to try the reality of our grace, the character of our profession, or the remaining power of sin. But conscious of our weakness, fearing to offend God, dishonor the Gospel, stumble others, or wound our consciences, we ought to pray earnestly, 'not to be led into temptation'; beseeching God to mortify our propensities, to restrain the malice and power of the tempter, to keep us out of trying circumstances, and never permit us to be tempted above what we are able.' Thus we are taught to dread sin, hope for mercy, distrust ourselves, rely on the providence, as well as grace of God, to keep us from it; to shun temptation, watch our hearts, be habitually prepared to repel the assaults of the tempter, and take care not to tempt others. Immense harm often comes by overlooking this request. (Note, 26: 40, 41.)—The last petition is, 'but deliver us from evil.' Some translate it, 'from the evil one,' which is a literal rendering; but why limit the interpretation? We are taught to pray for deliverance from all kinds of evil, from the powers of darkness, from the evil world, from the evil of our hearts, from the evil of suffering, from the final wrath of God, from terrible or injurious temporal calamities, from the terror and sting of death, from the power of death by a glorious resurrection, from all evil, natural and moral, and from sin and all its consequences, by the restoration of the body and soul to holiness, glory and immortality, is the enjoyment of the divine favor forever. It is a prayer, that whoever evil may overtake us, we may be preserved through all, and obtain eternal life by the mercy of God in Christ. This is concluded by a doxology, 'for thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory forever, Amen.' The kingdom, for the coming of which we pray, is the Lord's. His power and authority are his, and He can set it up in defiance of opposition, and his will be the glory; so that this may be considered a reason why our prayers will be answered—or it may be an expression of joy, that the kingdom, power, and glory are the Lord's forever; and a purpose to give Him honor, worship, love and obedience forever; and a desire, that all others may do the same.—To this we are taught to set, 'Amen.' So be it: Let all this be done by the glory of God, and we desire no more.' (Marg. Ref. o.)—What now is there is dom and the power, and the glory, for ever, Amen.

14 For if ye forgive men their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you:

sign in revealing Himself to heaven, and all that would go to observe how full this doxology is. Here there should be a gracious fluency, and this forever. Ascribing glory to God forever, intimates an acknowledgment, that it is eternally due, and an earnest desire to be eternally doing it, with saints and angels above, Ps. 71:14. We are taught to affix our Amen. God's Amen is a grant, it shall be so; our Amen is only a summary desire, let it be so. It is a token of our desire and assurance to be heard. It refers to every petition going before, and thus, in compassion to our infirmities, we are taught to knit up in one word, what we have lost in the particulars. It is good to conclude religious duties with some warmth, that we may go from them with a sweet favor on our spirits. Good people formerly said Amen at the end of every prayer, and it is commendable, provided it be done with understanding, as the apostle directs, (1 Cor. 14:16.) and uprightly, with inward impressions corresponding to the outward utterance.

The clause in the fifth petition, as we forgive our debtors, was perfectly new to the Jews. The others were not so, and our Savior here adds the reason, not with any personal reflection upon the peevishness and litigiousness of that generation, though there was cause enough for it, but only from the necessity and importance of the thing itself. God, in forgiving us, has a peculiar respect to our forgiving those who have injured us. When we pray, we must not only remind ourselves of it, but bind ourselves to it, ch. 18: 23-35. Selfish nature is loth to comply with it, and therefore it is here inculcated.

Your heavenly Father will also forgive. Not as if this were the only condition required; there must be repentance, and faith, and new obedience; but where other graces are, this will be, and this is a proof of the existence of others. not to move God, but to affect ourselves, to encourage our faith, excite our fervency, and evidence both. Now the best pleas in prayer are taken from God Himself. We must wrestle with God in his own strength, both as to the matter of our pleas, and the urging of them. It has reference to the first three petitions, 'Father in heaven, thy kingdom come, for thine is the kingdom; thy will be done, for thine is the power; hallowed be thy name, for thine is the glory.' And as to our own particular errands, these are encouraging. 'Thine is the kingdom; Thou hast the government of the world, and the protection of the saints, thy willing subjects in it.' Thine is the power, to maintain that kingdom, and to make good all thy engagements to thy people. Thine is the glory, as the end of all that which is done for the saints, in answer to their prayers; for thy sake waiteth for Thee; Ps. 65: 1.

It is a form of thanksgiving. The best pleading with God is praising Him: it is the way to obtain further mercy, as it qualifies us to receive it. In all our addresses to God, it is fit that praise should have a considerable share, for praise becometh the saints; they are to be to our God for a name and a praise. We and a world of angels praise God, not because He needs it, but because He deserves it; and it is our duty to give Him glory, in compliance with his desire. Praise is the work and happiness of heaven, and all that would go to heaven hereafter, must begin their heaven now.

The kingdom, and the power, and the glory, it is all thine. Note, It becomes us to be copious in praising God. Here there should be a gracious fluency, and this forever. Ascribing glory to God forever, intimates an acknowledgment, that it is eternally due, and an earnest desire to be eternally doing it, with saints and angels above, Ps. 71:14. Your heavenly Father will also forgive. Not as if this were the only condition required; there must be repentance, and faith, and new obedience; but where other graces are, this will be, and this is a proof of the existence of others. Those, which in the prayer are called debts, are here called trespasses. It is an extenuating term for offences—slips, falls. It is a good evidence and help of our forgiving others, to call the injuries done to us by a mollifying name. Cal. them not treasurers, but trespassers, not wilful injuries but casual inadvertencies. Peradventure it was an oversight (Gen. 43: 12.) therefore make the best of it. We must not only bear no malice, nor meditate revenge, but we must not upbraid our brother with the injuries he has done us, and must be ready to help him; and if he repent and desire to be friends again, we must be familiar with him as before.

But if you forgive not, it is a bad sign; you are altogether unqualified for pardon. He, whom you call Father, though his grace is offered on reasonable terms, will, nevertheless, not forgive you. And if other graces be sincere, and yet you be defective in this, you cannot expect the comfort of your pardon. Note, Those who would find mercy of God, must show mercy to their brethren. We cannot expect that He will stretch out the arms of his mercy towards us, unless we lift up to Him pure hands, without wrath, 1 Tim. 2: 8. If we pray in anger, we have reason to fear that God will answer in anger. Prayers made in wrath, are written in gall, as has been said. What reason is it that God should forgive us the talents we owe Him, if we do not forgive our brethren the pence they owe us? Our great Peace-Maker came into the world, not only to reconcile us to God, but one to another. It is great presumption to make a light matter of that, on which Christ lays so much stress. Men's passions shall not frustrate God's word.

V. 16-18. It is here supposed that religious fasting is a duty required of Christ's disciples, when God in his providence calls to it, and their own souls require it. When the bridegroom is taken away, then shall they fast, ch. 9: 15. Fasting is here put last, not because it is so much a duty for its own sake, as that it disposes us for other duties. Prayer comes in between almsgiving and fasting, as the life of both. Christ here speaks especially of private fasts, commonly used among the pious Jews. Some fasted one day, some two, every week; others more seldom. On those days they did not eat till sun-set, and then sparingly. It was not the Pharisee's fasting twice in the week, but his boasting of it, that Christ condemned, Luke 18: 12. It is a laudable practice, and we have reason to lament that it is so generally neglected among Christians. Anna was much in fasting, Luke 2: 37. Cornelius fasted and prayed, Acts 10: 30. The primitive Christians were much in it, Acts 13: 3; 14: 23. Private fasting is supposed, 1 Cor. 7: 5. It is an act of self-denial, a holy revenge on ourselves, and humiliation under the hand of God. The most grown Christians must hereby own, they are so far from having any thing to be proud of, that they are unworthy of their daily bread. It tends to curb the flesh, this prayer that is not evangelical, and suited to the wants of every Christian and every congregation? What can be more spiritual, comprehensive, or energetic? What is wanting? What redundant? What more fraught with zeal for God, love for man, and thirstings for the blessings of salvation? What more replete with instruction? It needs only to be understood and used with correspondent feelings, to constitute devotion, which would almost emulate heaven. 'This clause (the doxology) is not in Luke, nor in many copies of Matthew; yet there are sufficient reasons for receiving it as a part of the Lord's prayer; for it is in the Syriac version, in the Greek Liturgies, and in most ancient copies; and it is not likely, that the fathers would add to a form of our Lord's compassing. It is probable, that our Lord, delivering the form twice upon different occasions, might use this clause at one time, and leave it out at another: and the Latin copies, full of errors, left it out of both. lest the evangelists should appear to differ.' Whitby. It is so scriptural and replete with instruction, that the internal evidence of its authenticity is unanswerable. (Notes, 1 Chron. 29: 10-19. Ps. 21: 13. Rev 11: 15-18.) Scott. Notwithstanding the remark of Dr. Scott on the internal evidence for the continuance of the 'doxology' in this verse, and its truly 'scriptural' character, yet the external evidence of its authenticity is by no means clear. 'I am sensible,' says Dr. Doddridge, 'that there is reason to doubt of its genuineness, yet it is certainly very ancient; and, as some excellent writers have very well observed, so admirably suits and enforces every preceding petition, that I could not persuade myself to omit it.' Dr. A. Clarke also, after noticing its entire rejection by Griesbach, Wetstein, and the most eminent critics, its being variously written in several MSS. and omitted by most of the fathers, both Greek and Latin, observes nevertheless, 'being ancient, and read among the Jews, it should not, in my opinion, be left out of the text. merely because some MSS. have omitted it, and it has been variously written in others.' See the passages of Scripture quoted above by Dr. Scott especially 1 Chron. 29: 11, and in addition Dan. 9: 7, 9, 16-19. Ed.

Verses 14, 15.

Our Lord here directs the attention powerfully to the clause, 'as we forgive our debtors,' and further illustrates his meaning by the word 'trespasses.' Forgiveness of those who injure us cannot, we know, merit the forgiveness of God; nor will He pardon the impenitent and unbelieving, because, from natural facility of temper, without regard to Him, they forgive others. Professed disciples are addressed, who, when their 'hearts do not' in this respect 'condemn them, have confidence toward God,' though consciously unworthy; but if their hearts condemn them, their confidence abates; (Note, 1 John 3: 18-24.) and if they utterly fail, in this, it manifests their hypocrisy. (Notes 18: 21-35.) 'To this true remission it is requisite, that our minds be freed from the desire of revenge; that we rejoice in no evil that befalls our brother: (Prov. 24: 17.) that we do not upbraid him with the evil done us but incline to show him kindness, and to help and do him good. So far must we forgive all, though they ask it not. When this is sincerely done, we are to admit our offending brother into friendship again, as formerly. This remission must be without delay, as we pray for present forgiveness. It must be entire, even in great crimes, else we pray that 'our greatest crimes may not be forgiven. It must be often done, if a brother offend frequently, (Luke 17: 3, 4.) for we pray that our daily sins may be remitted.' Whitby. The term brother occurs here frequently; but it is evident, that we are so to forgive not only our brethren in Christ, but our bitterest persecutors, for Christ's sake. Scott.

Verses 16-18.

Our Lord proceeds to caution his disciples against ostentation in fasting. The Pharisees fasted often, but in a hypocritical manner, appearing abroad even in their private fasts, with gloomy countenances, and such sordid neglect of their persons, as to inform all of their employment. They assumed this appearance to keep up their credit, and to gain applause for sanctity: and this would be their only reward, for God would not accept these services. But Christ's disciple should avoid ostentation, when thus humbling himself before God; and at home, or hypocrites, of a sad countenance: for they disfigure their faces, that they may appear unto men to fast. ^aVerily I say unto you, They have their reward.

17 But thou, when thou fastest, ^aanoint thine head, and wash thy face;

18 That thou ^aappear not unto men to fast, but unto thy Father which is in secret; and thy Father which seeth in secret, ^ashall reward thee openly.

of men. Christ does not direct to abate any of the reality of a fast. He does not say, 'Take a little meat, or a little drink, or a little cordial.' No, 'let the body suffer, but lay aside the show of it; appear with thy ordinary countenance and dress; deny thyself bodily refreshments, not that it may be noticed, no, not by the nearest to thee; look pleasant, anoint thine head, and wash thy face, as in ordinary days, to conceal thy devotion; and thou shalt be in the praise of it at the last.' Fasting is the humbling of the soul; (Ps. 35:13,) that is the inside of the duty. Let that, therefore, be thy principal care. If we be sincere in our solemn fasts, and trust God's omniscience for our witness, and his goodness for our reward, we shall find that He did see in secret, and will reward openly. Religious fasts, rightly kept, will shortly be recompensed with an everlasting feast. Our acceptance with God should make us dead both to the censure and applause of men. David's fasting was turned to his reproach, Ps. 69:10., and yet, v. 13. As for me, let them speak as they will of me, my prayer is unto Thee in an acceptable time.

V. 19-24. Wordly-mindedness is a symptom of hypocrisy as common and fatal as any other; for by no sin can Satan have a surer and faster hold of the soul, under the cloak of a passable profession of religion, than by this; and therefore Christ, having warned us against coveting the praise of men, proceeds to warn against coveting the wealth of the world.

1. Every man has something which he makes his treasure, which he sets his heart upon, to which he carries all he can get. It is that chief good which Solomon so emphatically speaks of, Eccl. 2:3. The soul will have and make us more lively in religious exercises; as fulness of bread is apt to make drowsy. Paul was in fastings often, and so kept under his body, and brought it into subjection.

We are cautioned not to do this, as did the hypocrites. They pretended fasting, with nothing of that contrition and humiliation which is the soul of the duty. Theirs were mock-fasts, show and shadow, without substance; they took on them to be more humbled than they really were, and so endeavored to put a cheat on God, when they could not insult Him more. The fast God has chosen is to afflict the soul, not to hang down the head, like a bulrush, nor for a man to spread sackcloth and ashes under him, Isa. 58:5. Bodily exercise, if that be all, profits little, since that is not fasting to God.

They proclaimed their fasting, and so managed, that all who saw them might notice it was a fasting day with them. Even on these days they appeared in the streets, whereas they should have been in their closets; and affected a melancholy countenance, and slow pace, and perfectly disfigured themselves, that men might see how often they fasted. Note, It is sad that men, who have, in some measure, mastered their pleasure, or sensual wickedness, should be ruined by pride, which is their spiritual wickedness. Here they have their reward—the applause of men, and that is all.

Our Lord tells us how to keep a private fast. He does not tell us how often we must fast: circumstances vary, and wisdom is profitable therein to direct; the Spirit in the Word leaves that to the Spirit in the heart; but take this for a rule, study to approve yourselves to God, and not to recommend yourselves to the good opinion something, which it looks upon as the best thing. Christ does not design to deprive us of our treasure, but to direct us in the choice of it.

Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth. Christ's disciples had left all to follow Him. Let them still keep the same good mind. Treasure is an abundance of something we esteem precious, and likely to be serviceable hereafter. Now we must not count earthly treasures the best things; we must not call them glory as Laban's sons did; we must own that they have no glory in comparison with the glory that excelleth. We must not be grasping at more and more of them, as never knowing when we have enough; we must not confide in them for our supply in time to come; we must not say to gold, thou art my hope; we must be contented with little for our passage, but not with all for our portion; these must not be our consolation (Luke 6:24), our good things, Luke 16:25. Let us consider we are not laying up for our posterity in this world, but for ourselves in the other. We are, in a manner, made our own carvers. It concerns thee to choose wisely, for it is for thyself, and thou shalt have as thou chooseth. If we know what we are, how large our capacities and how long our continuance, and that our souls are ourselves, we shall see it a very foolish thing to lay up our treasure on earth.

A treasure on earth is liable to loss and decay, from corruption within, moth and rust doth corrupt it. If the treasure be laid up in fine clothes, the moth frets them, and they are spoiled insensibly. If it be in corn or other estates, as his was, who had his barns full, (Luke 12:16, 17.) rust corrupts that: and if goods are increased, they are increased that eat them, Eccl. 5:11. Manna itself bred worms, and fruits soon rot. If we understand it of silver and gold, they tarnish, grow less with using, and worse with keeping, Jam. 5:2, 3. The rust and the moth breed in the metal and garment. Note, Worldly riches have within them a principle of corruption; they wither of themselves, and make themselves wings. Thieves break through and steal. Every hand of violence will aim where the treasure is.

It is good counsel to make that which is eternal and unseen our treasure. Lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven. Note, There are treasures in heaven as surely as on earth, and the only true treasures. These riches and glories are at God's right hand; those that are sanctified truly obtain them, when they come to be fully sanctified. It is our wisdom, to give all diligence to make our salvation sure through Jesus Christ, and to look upon all things here below with holy contempt. We must firmly believe there is such a happiness, and resolve to be content with nothing short of it. If we make those treasures ours, God will keep them safe

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 9-18. It is important to examine in what spirit our prayers are offered; and daily to learn from Christ how to pray with acceptance. If we desire above all things the favor and glory of God, deliverance from guilt, temptations, and sin; we may be sure that He will answer us. If He have taught us to forgive our brethren for his sake, we may be sure of his forgiveness of our sins, though many and aggravated. If we desire Him for our Father, in Christ Jesus, and to possess the spirit and character of his children, we may call upon and confide in Him as our Father: and those who refuse will soon be con-spelled to appear before Him as their Judge. Whatever a man may profess, if he do not forgive his implacable enemies, God has not forgiven him, and will not forgive him, while he retains his rancorous disposition.—A morose countenance is no part of religion, nor ornament to the profession of it, and often covers a hypocritical heart: but humility, sorrow for sin, and deadness to the world, should be accompanied by decent and unaffected cheerfulness in the sight of men, springing from gratitude to God rejoice on Him, and the hope of heavenly glory.

embroid. be as cheerful as at other times, not appearing unto men to fast, but satisfied with the acceptance of God, who is present in the chambers, as well as the assemblies of his worshippers, and will openly reward humiliation for sin, mortification of the flesh, and desires for holiness for the sake of communion with Him. 'The word translated "sad countenance," denotes the look of a wild beast: a lion or bear rebbed of her whelps, grim, ghastly.' Leigh. That rendered "disfigured," seems to imply the neglect of usual attentions to the hair and the covering of the face, as mourners used to do. (2 Sam. 19: 4, 24.)

Thus the usual form of the face disappeared. SCOTT. Disfigure. Or, emaciate, contract, and deform. I know not any word in our language exactly answering the original here. It is rendered corrupt in 20) and properly signifies to change, spoil, and consume; and is with secular elegance applied to such an alteration of the natural countenance as proceeded from their emaciating themselves, and contracting their faces into a dismal form. DOBSON. Fasting means not eating; or, a total abstinence from food for a certain time. To abstain from flesh, and live on fish, vegetables, &c. is no fast. Many pretend to take Isa. 58:3. as the definition of a fast, and say it means a fast from sin—as if sin were daily food! In the fast mentioned by the prophet, the people were to divide their bread with the hungry, &c. 7. but could they eat the bread and give it too? No man should save by a fast, but give to the poor what he might have eaten. He who saves day's expense by a fast, commits an abomination before God.—A hypocrite has always a very difficult part to act: when he wishes to appear a penitent, he is obliged, having at heart no godly sorrow, to counterfeit it by a gloomy and austere look!

Dr. A. CLARKE.

Verses 19-21. The Pharisees aimed not only to secure reputation, but gratify a covetousness, and our Lord warned his disciples against this evil. As the Christian is a pilgrim on earth, he wants merely subsistence here, but needs treasure in heaven. He ought not, then, to lay up for himself a treasure on earth, for all things here must be soon left to others, or are liable to decay. Moths spoil rich garments, rust corrodes metals. Thieves seize the treasures and often attempt the lives of the wealthy. (Note, Jam. 5: 1-6, &c. 2, 3.) Property, however secured in money, is but a source of vexation, than of comfort. (Note, 1 Tim. 6: 6-16.) This is not the Christian's treasure, and its acquisition is of no moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal:

20 But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal:

21 For where your treasure is, there will your heart be also.

not to do what we do in religion, to be seen of men. Our treasure is our alms, prayers, fastings, and the reward of them. If we have done these, only to gain the applause of men, we have lodged our treasure only in the hands of men, and must never expect to hear further of it. This it is folly to do, for the praise of men will corrupt, and be moth-eaten. A little folly, like a dead fly, will spoil it all. Eccl. 10: 1. Slander and calumny are thieves that break through and steal it. We have run in vain, because we have misplaced our intentions. Hypocritical services lay up nothing in heaven. (Isa. 58: 3.) The gain is gone when the soul is called for, Job 27: 8. But if we have prayed, fasted, and given alms in uprightness, and have approved ourselves to God, we have laid up that treasure in heaven. A book of remembrance is written there, (Mal. 3: 16.) and being there recorded, they shall be there rewarded graciously. We shall meet them with comfort on the other side of the sea. Hypocrites are written in the earth; (Jer. 17: 13.) but God's faithful ones have their names written in heaven, Luke 10: 20. God's well done shall stand forever; and if we have laid up our treasure with Him, with Him our hearts will be; and where can they be better?

2. We must take heed of hypocrisy in choosing the end we look at. It is represented by two sorts of eyes, a single eye, and an evil eye. The expressions are somewhat dark, because concise; we shall therefore take them in some variety of interpretation. The eye is the light of the body, discovering and directing. The light of the world would avail us but little, without this light of the body. It is the light of the eye which rejoiceth the heart, (Prov. 15: 30.) but what is that which is here compared to the eye in the body?

The eye, that is the heart, as some have it, if that be free, (so the word is frequently rendered, Rom. 12: 8. 2 Cor. 2: 8. 9: 11, 13. Jam. 1: 5. and we read of a bountiful eye, Prov. 22: 9.) if the heart be inclined to goodness, it will direct the man to Christian actions. The whole conversation will be full of light, full of the evidences and instances of true Christianity, that pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father, (Jam. 1: 27.) full of light, of good works, which are light shining before men. But, if the heart be evil, covetous, envious, grinding, (expressed by an evil eye, ch. 20: 16. Mark 7: 22. Prov. 23: 6, 7.) the body will be full of darkness, the whole conversation will be heathenish. The instruments of the churl are and always will be evil, but the liberal deviseth liberal things, Isa. 32: 5-8. If the light that is in us, those affections which should guide us, be darkness; if there be not so much as a kind disposition in man, how great is the corruption of the man, and the darkness in which he sits! This agrees with the context; we must lay up treasure in heaven, by liberality in giving alms, and that not grudging-for us. Thither, then, let us refer all our designs and affections. Let us not burden ourselves with the cash of this world, which will but load, and defile, and sink us. The promises are bills of exchange, by which all true believers return their treasure to heaven, payable in a future state. It is a great encouragement to lay up our treasure in heaven, that it is safe there. It will not decay of itself; no moth will corrupt it, no thief will break through and steal it. It is a happiness above and beyond the changes and chances of time, an inheritance incorruptible.

Where your treasure is, on earth or in heaven, there will your heart be. We are therefore concerned to be wise in the choice of our treasure, because the temper of our minds, and consequently, the tenor of our lives, will be either earthly or heavenly. The heart follows the treasure, as the needle the loadstone, or the sunflower the sun. Where the treasure is, there the love and esteem are, (Col. 3: 2.) there our cares and fears are, lest we come short of it; there our hope is; (Prov. 18: 10, 11.) there our joy will be, (Ps. 119: 111.) there the inward thought will be; the first thought, the free and fixed thought, the frequent and familiar thought. The heart is God's due, (Prov. 23: 26.) and if our treasure is with Him, our hearts will be lifted up to Him.

This direction about laying up our treasure, may be fitly applied to the foregoing caution, to be seen of men.

Our treasure is our alms, prayers, fastings, and the reward of them. If we have done these, only to gain the applause of men, we have lodged our treasure only in the hands of men, and must never expect to hear further of it. This it is folly to do, for the praise of men will corrupt, and be moth-eaten. A little folly, like a dead fly, will spoil it all. Eccl. 10: 1. Slander and calumny are thieves that break through and steal it. We have run in vain, because we have misplaced our intentions. Hypocritical services lay up nothing in heaven. (Isa. 58: 3.) The gain is gone when the soul is called for, Job 27: 8. But if we have prayed, fasted, and given alms in uprightness, and have approved ourselves to God, we have laid up that treasure in heaven. A book of remembrance is written there, (Mal. 3: 16.) and being there recorded, they shall be there rewarded graciously. We shall meet them with comfort on the other side of the sea. Hypocrites are written in the earth; (Jer. 17: 13.) but God's faithful ones have their names written in heaven, Luke 10: 20. God's well done shall stand forever; and if we have laid up our treasure with Him, with Him our hearts will be; and where can they be better?

2. We must take heed of hypocrisy in choosing the end we look at. It is represented by two sorts of eyes, a single eye, and an evil eye. The expressions are somewhat dark, because concise; we shall therefore take them in some variety of interpretation. The eye is the light of the body, discovering and directing. The light of the world would avail us but little, without this light of the body. It is the light of the eye which rejoiceth the heart, (Prov. 15: 30.) but what is that which is here compared to the eye in the body?

The eye, that is the heart, as some have it, if that be free, (so the word is frequently rendered, Rom. 12: 8. 2 Cor. 2: 8. 9: 11, 13. Jam. 1: 5. and we read of a bountiful eye, Prov. 22: 9.) if the heart be inclined to goodness, it will direct the man to Christian actions. The whole conversation will be full of light, full of the evidences and instances of true Christianity, that pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father, (Jam. 1: 27.) full of light, of good works, which are light shining before men. But, if the heart be evil, covetous, envious, grinding, (expressed by an evil eye, ch. 20: 16. Mark 7: 22. Prov. 23: 6, 7.) the body will be full of darkness, the whole conversation will be heathenish. The instruments of the churl are and always will be evil, but the liberal deviseth liberal things, Isa. 32: 5-8. If the light that is in us, those affections which should guide us, be darkness; if there be not so much as a kind disposition in man, how great is the corruption of the man, and the darkness in which he sits! This agrees with the context; we must lay up treasure in heaven, by liberality in giving alms, and that not grudgingly, but cheerfully, Luke 12: 33. 2 Cor. 9: 7. But the parallel place does not come in on any such occasion, Luke 11: 34. and therefore the coherence here does not determine that to be the sense of the words.

The eye, that is, the understanding, as some think, the practical judgment, the conscience, which is to the other faculties of the soul, as the eye is to the body, to guide their motions: now, if the eye be single, and discern things that differ, especially so as to choose aright in laying up the treasure, it will rightly guide the affections and actions, which will be full of the light of grace and comfort; but if this be evil, or erroneous, and is led and biased by the inferior faculties, the heart and life must be full of darkness. They that will not understand, are said to walk on in darkness, Ps. 82: 5. It is said when the spirit of a man, that should be the candle of the Lord, is an ignis fatuus; when the leaders of the people, the leaders of the faculties, cause them to err; for then they that are led of them are destroyed, Isa. 9: 16. An error in the practical judgment is fatal; it is that which calls evil good, and good evil, (Isa. 5: 20.) therefore it concerns us to get our eyes anointed with eye-salve.

The eye, that is, the aims, or intentions; by the eye, we set our end before us, the mark we shoot at, and direct our motion accordingly. In every thing we do in religion, there is something or other, on which we have our eye; now, if we fix right ends, and steadily pursue them, if we aim only at the glory of God, then the eye is single. Paul's was so when he said, to me to live is Christ; and if we are right here, the whole body will be full of light; all the actions will be regular and gracious, pleasing to God, and comfortable to ourselves: but if this eye be evil, if we look aside to our own applause, under color of seeking the things of Christ, this spoils all; the whole conversation will be perverse; the foundations being thus out of course, there can be nothing but confusion and every evil work, in the superstructure. Draw the line from the circumference to any other point but the centre, and they will cross. If the light in thee be darkness itself, it is a fundamental error. The end specifies the action. It is of the last importance in religion, that we make eternal things, not temporal, our scope, 2 Cor. 4: 13. The hypocrite is like the waterman, that looks one way and rows another; the true Christian, like the traveller, that has his journey's end in his eye. The hypocrite soars like the kite, with his eye on the prey below; the Christian soars like the lark, higher and higher, forgetting the things beneath.

3. No man can serve two masters. Serving two masters will be contrary to the single eye; for the eye will be to the master's hand, Ps. 123: 1, 2. Our Lord here exposes the cheat of those, who think to divide between God and the world; to have a treasure on earth and a treasure in heaven also; please God and please men too. 'Why not?' says the hypocrite, 'it is good to have two strings to one's bow. They hope to make their religion serve their secular interest, and so turn to account both ways. The pretending mother was for dividing the child; the Samaritans will compound between God and without it he should be contented, and if intrusted to him, he is not wiser or safer. So, himself but lay it out in doing good. (Notes, Luke 12: 15-21. 16: 1-13. 19-26.) Heavenly things are his treasure. There he should seek in faith and prayer, and the use of all his faculties. They are not liable to decay, nor can he be robbed of them. This is of the greatest importance: for if a man's treasure be on earth, his heart, his conduct and conversation will be earthly; but if it be in heaven, his heart will be heavenly, his thoughts will be on spiritual matters, and his soul, as it were, in heaven. This will give him heavenly savor to his discourse and his life. (Note, Phil. 3: 20, 21.) preserve him from temptation, and quicken him to duty.—Wardrobes were once a considerable part of the riches laid up by worldly men, and left to their heirs. This is still the case, in the East. Scott. Treasures.] The illustrious and opulent among the ancients, accumulated not merely silver and gold, but a prodigious number of sumptuous and magnificent habits, which were regarded as a necessary and indispensable part of their treasures. Hence in the detail of a great man's wealth, are recorded the numerous and superb suits of apparel he possessed. Thus, after the destruction of Jerusalem, distributed, says Josephus, to those who had distinguished themselves by their valor, gold, silver and garments. How difficult it is to preserve these in warm countries, appears from Bartolo-mo, 'I had put my effects into a chest, and, opening it afterwards, I discovered an innumerable multitude of vermin. They had perforated my linen in a thousand places, and gnawed my books, my girdle, my amice and my shoes; and my effects were more than half destroyed.'

VERSES 22, 23.

The preceding truths are here illustrated by an apt similitude. The actions of the whole body are directed by the light of the eye. When this is single, or clear, and perceives objects as they are, the whole body has light, and the man moves with safety; but if the eye see things confusedly, he stumbles, is liable to lose his way, or run into injury. Thus the understanding, perceiving objects according to their nature, enables a man to form a proper judgment, make a wise choice, and act aright. But a darkened mind, falsely estimating things, produces a erroneous choice and a corrupt life. If then, that which a man regards as wisdom, be folly; if the first principle be an error;—the light that is in him is darkness, and how intense and fatal must that darkness be!—This relates to men's practical judgment of earthly and heavenly things. The worldly man mistakes in his first principle, and so all his calculations must be erroneous; the further he goes the more he is bewildered. But it is equally applicable to religion. When that which a man deems 23 But if ^{thine} eye be evil, thy whole body shall be full of darkness. 'If therefore the light that is in thee be darkness, how great is that darkness!

24 ¶ No man can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and ^{the} Mammon.

[Practical Observations.]

25 Therefore I say unto you, Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink; nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on. Is not the life more than meat, and the body than raiment?

idols. No, says Christ, it will not do. It is but a supposition that gain is godliness, 1 Tim. 6: 5. It is likely it was a proverb, no man can serve two masters, much less two gods; for their commands will sometimes contr^adict one another. While two masters go together, a servant may follow them both; but when they part, you will see to which he belongs. Either this or that, it is plain, must be left, or comparatively hated and despised.

Mammon is a Syriac word, which signifies gain, so that whatever we account in this world to be our gain, (Phil. 3: 7.) is mammon. Whatever is in the world, the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life, is mammon. To some, their belly is their mammon, (Phil. 3: 19.) to others, their ease, sleep, pastimes, (Prov. 6: 9.) worldly riches, honors. The applause of men was the Pharisees' mammon. In a word, self, the unity in which the world's trinity centres, sensual, secular self, is the mammon which cannot be served in connection with God. He does not say, We must not, or should not, but we cannot; we cannot love both, (1 John 2: 15. Jam. 4: 4.) or hold to both in obedience, trust, and dependence; for they are contrary the one to the other. God says, 'My son, give me thy heart,' Mammon says, 'No, give it me.' God says, 'Be content with such things as ye have,' Mammon says, 'Grasp at all thou canst. Money, money, by fair means, or by foul, money,' God says, 'Be honest, be just in all thy dealings,' Mammon says, 'Cheat thy own father, if thou canst gain by it.' God says, 'Be charitable,' Mammon says, 'Hold thy own, this giving undoes us all.' God says, 'Be careful for nothing,' Mammon says, 'Be careful for every thing.' God says, 'Keep holy the Sabbath day,' Mammon says, 'Make use of that day as well as any other for the world.' Thus inconsistent are the commands of God and Mammon; we cannot serve both. Let us not then halt between God and Baal, but, choose ye this day whom ye will serve, and abide by your choice.

V. 25-34. There is scarcely one thing, about which our Lord warns his disciples more frequently and earnestly, than the sin of distract- ing, distrustful cares about the things of this life, which is a bad sign that both the treasure and the heart are on the earth.

1. It is the counsel and command of our Lord, that we take no thought about the things of this world. I say unto you. He says it as our Lawgiver, as the Sovereign of our hearts, as our Comforter, and as the Helper of our joy. And he that has ears to hear, let him hear. Take no thought for your life, nor yet for your bodies. Take no thought, saying, what shall we eat? And again, Take no thought—Be not in care. The caution is thrice repeated. Precept must be upon precept, line upon line; all is little enough, it is a sin, which doth so easily beset us. It intimates how pleasing it is to Christ, and of how much concern it is to ourselves, that we should live without carelessness. He repeatedly commands that we should not pull our minds in pieces with worldly care. There is a thought concerning things of this life, which is not only lawful, but a duty, such as is commended in the virtuous woman, Prov. 27: 23. The word is used concerning Paul's care of the churches, and Timothy's for the state of souls, 2 Cor. 11: 28. Phil. 2: 20. But the care here forbidden is a disquieting, tormenting care, which hurries the mind hither and thither, which is a damp upon our hope in God, which breaks our sleep, and hinders our enjoyment of what God has given us. It forbids unbelieving thoughts. God has promised to provide for his own all things needful for the life that now is, food and a covering, not dainties, but necessities. He never said, They shall be feasted, but Verily, they shall be fed. Now, a fear of wanting those supplies springs from a disbelief of the promises of God, and of the wisdom and goodness of his providence; and that is the evil of it. As to present sustenance, we must use lawful means to get it, else we tempt God; we must be diligent in our callings, and prudent in proportioning our expenses to what we have, and must pray for daily bread; and if all other means fail, we may and must ask relief from those who are able to give it. He was none of the best of men who said, to beg I am ashamed, (Luke 16: 3.) as he was, who desired to be fed with the crumbs; but for the future we must cast our care upon God, and

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 19-24. We should watch and pray against covetousness. 'Treasures on earth' can little profit dying creatures. We may lose them before we die, and they are certain only as sources of anxiety, snares and vexation. But there is an inheritance 'incorruptible, undefiled, that fadeeth not away, reserved in heaven for believers. This let us labor, with all diligence, to secure, whatever else be renounced for its sake. Anxiety for the world is not consistent with a heavenly mind; for

'where the treasure is, there the heart will be also.' Multitudes fatally err in this matter; they see things through a vitiated eye; phantoms appear realities; and realities, phantoms. Thus they wander in darkness, and know not at what they stumble. After all the warnings of Christ, they through unbelief, persist in attempting to 'serve God and Mammon.' May the Lord preserve us from such principles and mistakes!

traordinary illumination is a delusion, his light is darkness from the bottomless pit; his inferences lead him further from God, and plunge him deeper into error, prejudice, pride, and the snare of the devil. This is an awful yet common case: how carefully then should we examine our principles by the Word of God, with prayer for the teaching of the Spirit! (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Isa. 8: 20. Luke 11: 33—36.) SCOTT.

A man may do some service to two masters, but he cannot devote himself to more than one. When the two masters are in full opposition, the impossibility of serving both is evident. God and the world are two opposites. He, who loves and holds to the world as his master, will be an enemy and despiser of God; and he who loves and serves God, will renounce the world, and despise its frown. So that we cannot 'serve God and Mammon.' (Note, Luke 16: 9—13.) Mammon is the Syriac word for riches, and seems here to be the name of an idol; the covetous man is an idolater, and therefore no true servant of God. By making worldly concerns subservient to religion, we may render them a part of God's service; as worldly men make their religion a part of the service of Mammon; but the two opposite services cannot be performed. 'We love Mammon more than God, when we pursue it by a lie, as Ziba and Gehazi, by violence, theft, or false testimony; for thus we despise God's authority to obtain Mammon.' When our concern in temporals 'causes us to neglect God, and choose rather to quit spiritual than temporal blessings, then we cleave to them more than to God, whom we hate to despise.' Whitby. (Marg. Ref. g—Notes, Rom. 6: 16—23.) SCOTT. 'The master of our heart may be fully termed the love that reigns in it. We serve that only which we love supremely. A man cannot be in perfect indifference between two objects that are incompatible: he is inclined to despise and hate what he does not love supremely, when the necessity of a choice presents itself.'—Hate has the same sense here, as in many places of Scripture, meaning to love less—so Jacob loved Rachel, but hated Leah, i. e. loved Leah much less than Rachel. So God declares, 'Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I hated:' having given the Jews, in the course of his providence, greater earthly privileges than he gave to the Gentiles. (Mal. 1: 2, 3.) Dr. L. L. L. 'When it is said, ye cannot serve God and mammon, the point contended for in respect to God is not exclusive possession, but exclusive dominion. Other things may occasionally, for a certain time, and to a certain degree, have possession of our minds, but they must not rule, must not reign over them. We can serve but one master faithfully and effectually, and that one must be God. The concerns and comforts of this life may have their due place in our hearts, but they must not aspire to the first; this is the prerogative of religion alone; religion must be supreme and paramount over all. Every one, it has been often said, has his ruling passion. That of the Christian must be the love of his Maker and Redeemer. This must principally occupy his thoughts, time, attention, and heart. If there be any thing else which has gained ascendancy over our souls, on which our desires, wishes, hopes or fears are chiefly fixed, God is then dispossessed of his rightful domain over us; we have another master, and shall think but little of our Maker, or any thing belonging to Him.' Bp. PORTER.

Solicitude about a future support often as much ensnares the poor, as the love of wealth does the rich. Therefore Christ required his disciples to 'take no thought for their lives.' There is a care about temporal things which is a duty, according to a man's station. He should diligently contrive his proper business, provide for himself and family, as far as honest industry will go; calculate his income and live within the bounds of it, so as not to be needlessly embarrassed, and see that no bounty of Providence be wasted; he should make arrangements for the demands which must be made on him, spare expense that he may not want, or beg in sickness, or age; and he ought in some cases to make provision for his family, if he can, consistently with justice, piety and charity: yet there is danger lest these cares be extended beyond due bounds. No one ought, however, to be anxious how he shall be provided for in future. This is the Lord's part, and when any take it on themselves they dishonor Him, become their own tormentors, and are often tempted to sinful methods of obtaining provision for coming time. This solicitude is prohibited. The Christian must not be anxious about the continuance of support of his life, he should not be greatly concerned about the measure of his supplies, nor the manner of obtaining them. The Author of his life, the Former of his body, he—ing none greater sufficient to restrain from this disquieting care; but to show what pleasure Christ takes in those that hope in his mercy, the command is backed with the most powerful arguments. To free us from anxious thoughts, Christ here suggests to us comforting thoughts. It will be worth while for us to argue ourselves out of our disquieting cares. They may be weakened by right reason, but it is by an active faith only, that they can be overcome.

Is not this life more than meat, and the body than raiment? Yes, doubtless. So He says, who understands the true value of present things, for He made them, and supports them, and supports us by them. Note, our life is a greater blessing than our livelihood. It is true, life cannot subsist without a livelihood; but the meat and raiment, represented as inferior to the life and body, are such as are for ornament and delight; for about such we are apt to be solicitous. Meat and raiment are in order to life, and the end is more noble than the means. The daintiest food and the finest raiment are from the earth, but life from the breath of God. Life is the light of men, meat is but the oil to feed that light; so that the difference between rich and poor is very inconsiderable, since, in the greatest things, they stand on the same level, and differ only in the less. This is an encouragement to trust God for food and raiment, and so relieve ourselves of perplexity about them. God has given us life and the body; it was an act of power and favor, and done without our care. What cannot He do for us who did that? What will He not? If we take care about our souls and eternity, which are more than the body, we may leave it to God to provide for us food and raiment, which are less. God has maintained our lives hitherto; if sometimes with pulse and water, that has answered the end. He that guards us against the evils we are exposed to, will supply the good things we need. If He has been pleased to kill us, to starve us, He would not so often have given his angels a charge concerning us.

Behold the fowls of the air, and consider the lilies of the field. Here is an argument from God's common providence towards the inferior creatures. A fine pass fallen man is come to, that he must be sent to school to the fowls of the air, and that they shall teach him! Job 12:7, 8.

Observe the providence of God concerning the fowls, and learn to trust Him for food. There are various sorts, they are numerous, some of them ravenous, but all are fed, and with food convenient for them; it is rare that any of them perish for want of food, even in winter, and there goes no little to feed them all the year round. The fowls, as they are least servicable to man, so they are least within his care. Men often feed on them, but seldom feed them, yet they are fed, we know not how, and some of them fed best in the hardest weather; and it is your heavenly Father that feeds them. He knows all the wild fowls of the mountains, better than you know the tame ones at your own barn-door, Ps. 50: 11. Not a sparrow lights to the ground, to pick up a grain of corn, but by the providence of God, which extends itself to the meanest creatures. But, specially, they are fed without any care of their own; they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns. The ant intake no thought; because it looks like a jealousy of God, who knows how to give what we want, when we know not how to get it. Let our souls rest in Him! This gracious carelessness is the same with that sleep which God gives his beloved, in opposition to the worldling's toil, Ps. 127: 2.

Take no thought for your life. Life is our greatest concern for this world; all that a man hath will he give for his life; yet take no thought about it; not about the continuance of it. Refer that to God, to lengthen it or to shorten it as He pleases. My times are in thy hand, and they are in a good hand. Nor be solicitous about the comforts of this life. Refer it to Him to enbitter or to sweeten it as He pleases. God has promised the necessary support of this life, food and raiment; therefore we may more confidently expect it. Say not, what shall we eat? It is the language of one almost despairing; whereas, though there be many that have prospect of little, yet there are few but have present support.

Take no thought for the morrow. Be not solicitous about the future, how you shall live next year, or when you are old, or what you shall leave behind you. As we must not boast of to-morrow, so we must not care for it, or its events.

2. One would think the command of Christ sufficient to restrain from this disquieting care; but to show what pleasure Christ takes in those that hope in his mercy, the command is backed with the most powerful arguments. To free us from anxious thoughts, Christ here suggests to us comforting thoughts. It will be worth while for us to argue ourselves out of our disquieting cares. Behold the fowls of the air, and consider the lilies of the field. Here is an argument from God's common providence towards the inferior creatures. A fine pass fallen man is come to, that he must be sent to school to the fowls of the air, and that they shall teach him! Job 12:7, 8.

Observe the providence of God concerning the fowls, and learn to trust Him for food. There are various sorts, they are numerous, some of them ravenous, but all are fed, and with food convenient for them; it is rare that any of them perish for want of food, even in winter, and there goes no little to feed them all the year round. The fowls, as they are least servicable to man, so they are least within his care. Men often feed on them, but seldom feed them, yet they are fed, we know not how, and some of them fed best in the hardest weather; and it is your heavenly Father that feeds them. He knows all the wild fowls of the mountains, better than you know the tame ones at your own barn-door, Ps. 50: 11. Not a sparrow lights to the ground, to pick up a grain of corn, but by the providence of God, which extends itself to the meanest creatures. But, specially, they are fed without any care of their own; they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns. The ant indeed does, and the bee, and they are set before us as examples of prudence and industry; but the fowls of the air do not; they make no provision for the future themselves, and yet, every day, provision is made for them. Their eyes wait on God, that great and good House-keeper, who provides food for all flesh.

Are ye not much better than they? Yes, certainly, you are. Note, the heirs of heaven are much better than the fowls of heaven, nobler beings, and by faith soar higher; they are of a better nature and nature; wiser than the fowls of heaven, (Job 35: 11.) though the children of this world, that know not the judgment of the Lord, are not so wise as the stork, the crane, and the swallow, Jer. 8: 7. You are dearer to God, and nearer, though they fly in the open firmament of heaven. He is their Maker, Lord, Owner, and Master, but besides all this, He is your Father, and in his account ye are of more value than many sparrows. You are his children, his first-born; now He that feeds his birds, surely will not starve his babes. They trust your Father's providence, and will not you trust it? In dependence on that, they are careless for the morrow, and being so, live the most cheerfully of all creatures, they sing among the branches, (Ps. 104: 12.) and, to the best of their power, praise their Creator. If we were by faith as unconcerned about the morrow as they, we should sing as merrily; for it is worldly care that mars our cheerfulness, and as much as any thing, silences our praise.

Look on the lilies, and learn to trust God for raiment. We ask, What shall we put on; for decency, for defence, and, with many, for dignity and ornament; and so much concerned are they for variety and gaiety in their clothing, that this care returns almost as often as that for their daily bread. Now not only look on the lilies, (every one does it with pleasure,) but consider them. Note, there is a great deal of good to be learned from what we see every day, if we did but consider it, Prov. 6: 6. 24: 32.

Consider how frail lilies are. Though distinguished by colors, they are still but grass. Thus all flesh is grass; though some in mind and body are as lilies, much admired, still they are grass; in nature and constitution, they stand on the same level with others. Man's days, at best, are as grass, as the flower of the grass, 1 Pet. 1: 24. This grass to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven; in a little while the place that knows us will know us no more. The grave is the oven into which we shall be cast, and in which we shall be consumed as grass in the fire, Ps. 49: 14. This intimates a reason why we should not take thought for the morrow, for then we may have occasion for our grave-clothes.

Consider how free from care the lilies are. They toil not as men do, to earn clothing; as servants, to earn livery; neither do they spin, as women do, to make clothing. It does not follow that we must neglect or do business carelessly. It is the praise of the virtuous women, that she lays her hand to the spindle, makes fine linen, and sells it, Prov. 31: 19, 24. Idleness tempts God, instead of trusting Him; but He who provides for the inferior creatures, without their labor, will much more provide for us, by blessing our labor, which He has made our duty. And, if we, through sickness, should be unable to toil and spin, God can furnish us.

Consider how fair, how fine the lilies are.

things for him, should be depended on for the less; and food and raiment should be expected from Him, in the use of only lawful means. Scott. Take no thought.] 'It is evident that the original word signifies an excessive anxiety, as in almost every other place where it is used, agreeably to the derivation of it. It need not be considered, therefore, as addressed only to the apostles, who were to cast themselves on an extraordinary providence, without being concerned for support. The arguments our Lord urges contain nothing peculiar to their case, but are built on considerations applicable to all Christians. Compare Phil. 4: 6. 1 Pet. 5: 7. Luke 22: 35, 36, and Acts 20: 34, from which it appears that the apostles themselves were not aptly to neglect a prudent care for their own subsistence, in dependence on miraculous provisions.' Dodd. The use of the phrase, take no thought, in our translation, where the Geneva version had be not careful, has often rendered explanation necessary. But it is to be remarked, as often learned friend many years since to the editor, that the word thought, at the time of our translation, was equivalent to anxiety; in proof of which he referred to Dr. P. Holland, who in his translation of Ammianus Marcellinus, anno 1609, says of the emperor Tacitus, 'his heart was broken, and so, for thought, he died;' plainly meaning excessive anxiety.

Verses 26-32.

The Householder of the universe openeth his hand and filleth his creatures with his bounty. The birds are provided for without any care of their own, being unable to use means for their sustenance. And surely the believer, as a rational creature and a spiritual worshipper, is more valuable in the sight of God, than the birds of the air! Such cares are vain. No man can add a cubit to his height, however solicitous, and hence no man thinks of it. No anxious care can add to the length of life, or to health, comfort, or prosperity. It is absurd to be anxious about raiment. The lilies, though incapable of adorning themselves, are more beautifully decorated, than Solomon in royal robes. And has the Lord adorned the vegetables, which are as soon to perish and will He not clothe the Christian? Should he desire adornings which are sur-

The blessings of Christ's kingdom, the righteousness in which his subjects are justified, the grace by which they are sanctified, and the good works in which they should walk, are intended by the kingdom of God and his righteousness. Our Lord, therefore, calls his disciples to seek admission to this kingdom, by repentance and faith, and to press on to the full enjoyment of its privileges, and conformity to the law and exhortations.

covenant in it. Though we have not attained, yet sincere seeking and an earnest endeavor are accepted. Now observe the object: the kingdom of God, and his righteousness. We must mind heaven as our end, holiness as our way. 'Seek the comforts of the kingdom of grace and glory as your felicity. Resolve not to take up short of the kingdom of heaven. Seek for this glory, honor, and immortality. Prefer heavenly blessings far before earthly delights.' We make nothing of our religion, if we do not make heaven of it. And with the happiness of this kingdom, seek the righteousness of it, God's righteousness, which He requires to be wrought in and by us, such as exceeds that of the scribes and Pharisees. We must follow peace and holiness, Heb. 12:14. Seek first the kingdom of God. Let your care for another world take place of all other cares. We must seek the things of Christ more than our own things. If they ever come in competition, we must remember to which to give the preference. Let the morning of youth be dedicated to God. Wisdom must be sought early; it is good to begin betimes, in being religious. Seek this first every day. Let waking thoughts be of God. Let Him that is the First, have the first.

The necessary supports of life shall be added unto you, given over and above, as it is in the margin. You shall have what you seek, the kingdom of God and his righteousness, for never any sought in vain, that sought in earnest: and besides that, you shall have food and raiment by way of over-plus, as he that buys goods has paper and parchment into the bargain. Godliness has the promise of the life that now is, 1 Tim. 4:8. Solomon asked wisdom, and had that, and other things beside, 2 Chron. 1:11, 12. O what a blessed change would it make in our hearts and lives, did we firmly believe, that the best way to be comfortably provided for in this world, is to be intent on another world! We begin at the right end of our work, when we begin with God. If we give diligence to make sure of the things of God, He will provide as much of the things of this life as He sees will be good for us, and we should not wish for more. Have we trusted Him for the portion of our inheritance at the end, and shall we not trust Him for the portion of our cup in our way to it? God's Israel were not only brought to Canaan at last, but had their charges borne in the wilderness. Oh that we were more thoughtful about the things that are not seen and eternal, and then the less thoughtful we should be, and need to be about the things seen and temporal! Also regard not your stuff, Gen. 45:20, 23.

The morrow shall take thought for the things of itself; sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof. We must not perplex ourselves about future events, because every day brings along cares enough with it.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 7. 34. While we are careful to choose the good part, know the right way, and attend to present duty, let us not be anxious about consequences. Let us rely on our heavenly Father to support the lives and nourish the bodies, which He has given, and not be in trouble, whether our provision be plentiful or scanty. Our lives are more than meat, our bodies than raiment. What, then, are our souls, which the divine Savior redeemed with his blood? While we feast on his spiritual provisions, and are adorned with the robes of righteousness and salvation, we cannot doubt his truth and love, which are engaged to feed and clothe us. Will He provide for fowls, adorn the flowers, and yet starve his children? How unreasonable our unbelief! We need rebuke, and should pray to Him, 'increase our faith,' and leave it to Gentiles and unbelievers to perplex of their king; to seek the peace, purity and enlargement of the kingdom, the honor of the prince, and the good of their fellow subjects. These must be sought in the first place; first as to the object, affections, and time; beginning each portion of existence with it, and making all things subservient to it. Then their Father will add whatever pertains to this life without their anxiety. They, who reverse this order, run themselves for this world and the next.—The Christian should not be careless for even the next day: it may not arrive to him; if it do, it will bring its supplies, and thus 'take thought for itself.' This should be regarded as a merciful appointment of his Father. He knows, that every day brings more evil than his children can well bear, and hence He commends them 'to cast all their care for the future on Him. And if any are still so absurd, as to load themselves with a burden, which does not belong to them, they torment themselves, and dishonor God, by their unbelief.—This is applicable to spiritual things. The Christian, doing his duty, is authorized to trust in the Lord for grace in trials, as well as for food in want. In both, 'sufficient for the day is the evil thereof.' SCOTT. Advised unto you. That is, over and above, Thoughtfulness for the morrow is needed. Let the morrow take care for the thing of itself. If wants and troubles are renewed with a day's aids and provisions are likewise; compassions that are new every morning, Lam. 3: 22, 23. The saints have a Friend that is their arm every morning, and gives out fresh supply daily, (Isa. 33: 2.) as the business of every day requires. (Ez. 3: 4.) so keeping his people constantly dependent on Him. Let us therefore refer it to the morrow's strength, to do the morrow's work, and bear the morrow's burden. To-morrow will be provided for without us; why need we so anxiously care for that, which is so wisely cared for already? This does not forbid foresight, and preparation accordingly, but a perplexing solicitude respecting difficulties, which, perhaps, may never come, or, if they do, may be easily borne. The meaning is, let us mix a present duty, and leave events to God. Do the work of the day in its day, and let the morrow bring its work along with it.

This thoughtfulness for the morrow is one of the foolish and hurtful lusts, which they that will be rich fall into; one of the many errors wherewith they pierce themselves through. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof. The present day has troubles enough; we need not borrow perplexities from to-morrow's evils. It is uncertain what the morrow's evils may be, but it is time enough to take thought about them when they come. Let us not pull that upon ourselves all together at once, which Providence has wisely ordered to be borne by parcels. The conclusion of the whole matter is, that it is the will and command of the Lord Jesus, that his disciples be not their own tormentors, nor make their passage through this world more unpleasant, by their apprehensions of trouble, than God has made it by the troubles themselves. By daily prayer we may procure strength to bear trouble, and to arm us against the temptations that attend our daily troubles, and then let none of these things move us.

CHAP. VII. V. 1-6. Our Savior here shows us how to conduct in reference to the faults of others; and his expressions seem intended as a reproof to the scribes and Pharisees, who were very rigid in condemning all about them, as those commonly are, who are conceited in justifying themselves.

1. A caution against judging. It is the office of magistrates and ministers to judge. Christ, though He made not Himself a Judge, yet came not to unmake them, for by Him princes decree justice; but this is directed to private persons, who shall hereafter sit on thrones themselves about concerns so inferior. Let us 'seek first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness,' assured, that 'all things else shall be added to us;' for our Father knows our wants. Thus we shall be encouraged in duty, and relieved from anxiety. We shall indeed find, that 'sufficient for the day is the evil thereof;' and have no need to anticipate pains and sorrow. We shall also find, that the day will bring its comforts and supports with it.—These rules and precepts of our Lord will be known by our experience, if true believers, to conduce to present comfort, as well as to future benefit; when we shall have done with temptation, be delivered from evil, and employed in praising Him whose is 'the kingdom, the power, and the glory, forever. Amen.'

which seems the exact import of the original; than which expression nothing could be more proper: for these temporal blessings are by no means essential to the covenant of grace, but are entirely to be referred to the Divine good pleasure, to add or withhold, as God shall see fit. DODDGE.

These verses do not forbid the magistrate to judge and sentence criminals; nor the rulers of the church to censure and exclude such as disgrace their profession, nor Christians to 'withdraw from every brother that walks disorderly,' for this is expressly enjoined. (Notes, 2 Thes. 3: 6-15.) Nor did Christ intend to prevent his disciples from forming a judgment of men's characters according to their principles and conduct, for He directs us so to judge. (Note, 15-20.) Many duties require us to form a judgment both in respect to the state and actions of men; but we should not be rash, or severe in forming, nor hasty in declaring it. We are not bound to believe an infidel or a profligate to be a true Christian; but should judge as favorably as we can, where the fundamentals of Christianity are professed, and not degraded by immo-

For with what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged; and with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again.

3 And why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye, but considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye?

judging, but not now; judge not. We must judge ourselves, and our own acts, but not our brother, magisterially assuming such an authority over others, as we allow not them over us; since our rule is to be subject to one another. Be not many masters, Jam. 3: 1. We must not make our word a law to every body. We must not judge our brother, that is, must not speak evil of him, as it is explained, Jam. 4: 11. We must not despise him, nor set him at naught, Rom. 14: 10. We must not judge rashly or groundlessly of our brother, making the worst of people, and inferring such invidious things from their words and actions as they will not bear. We must not judge unmercifully, with revenge, or maliciously. We must not judge of a man's state by a single act, nor of what he is in himself, by what he is to us, for in our own cause we are apt to be partial. We must not assume God's prerogative to try the heart. We must not judge of men's eternal state, nor call them hypocrites, reprobates, and castaways. What have we to do, thus to judge another man's servant? Counsel and help him, but judge him not.

That ye be not judged. He, who usurps the bench, shall be called to the bar. Commonly none are more censured, than those who are most censorious; every one will have a stone to throw at them; he, who, like Ishmael, has his hand, his tongue, against every man, shall like him, have every man's hand and tongue against him, Gen. 16: 12. No mercy shall be shown to the reputation of those who show no mercy to the reputation of others. Yet that is not the worst of it; they shall be judged of God; from greater condemnation, Jam. 3: 1. Both parties must appear before Him, who, while He relieves the humble sufferer, will also resist the haughty scorner, and give him enough of judging. If we are charitable, modest, and judge ourselves rather, we shall not be judged of the Lord. As God will forgive those that forgive their brethren, so He will not judge those that will not judge their brethren; the merciful shall find mercy, Rom. 14: 10.

The judging of those who judge others is according to the law of retaliation: with what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged. God often observes a rule of proportion, as in the case of Adonibezek, Judg. 1: 7. Rev. 13: 10. 18: 6. Thus He will be both justified and magnified in his judgments, and all flesh will be silenced before Him. With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again; perhaps in this world, so that men may read their sin in their punishment. What then shall we do when God rises up? Job 31: 14. What would become of us, if God should be as severe in judging us, as we are in judging our brethren, and should weigh us in the same balance? We may justly expect it if we be extreme to mark what our brethren do amiss. In this, as in other things, the violent dealings of men return on their own heads.

2. Some cautions about reproving. Because we must not judge others, which is a great sin, it does not, therefore, follow, that we must not reprove others, which is a great duty, and may conduce to saving a soul from death; however, it will conduce to saving our souls from sharing in their guilt. Observe, it is not every one who is fit to reprove. Those who are themselves guilty of the faults of which they accuse others, or of worse, bring shame on themselves, and are not likely to do good to those whom they reprove. Here is a just reproof to the censorious, who quarrel with their brother for small faults, while they allow themselves in great ones; who are quick-sighted to spy a mote in his eye, but are not sensible of a beam in their own. Note. There are degrees in sin. Some sins are comparatively but as motes, while others are as beams; some as gnats, others as a camel; not 't'at there is any sin little, for there is no little good to sin against; if it be a mote (or spintler, for so it might better be reul.), it is in the eye; if a gnat, it is in the throat, both unl and perilous; and we cannot be easy or well, till they are got out. Our own sins ought to appear greater to us than the same sins in others. That which charity teaches us to call but a spintler in our brother's eye, true repentance will teach us to call a beam in our own; for the sin of others must be extenuated, but our own aggravated. Many are under the guilt and dominion of very great sins, and yet are not aware of it, but justify themselves, as if they needed no repentance. It is as strange that a man can be in such a sinful condition, and not be aware of it, as that a man should have a beam in his eye, and not consider it; but the god of this world so artfully blinds them, that they say, with great assurance, we see. It is common for those who are most sinful themselves, and least sensible of it, to be most free in judging others. The Pharisees, who were most haughty in justifying themselves, were most scornful in condemning others. They were severe on Christ's disciples for eating with unclean hands, which was scarcely a mote, while they encouraged men in a contempt of their parents, which was a beam: Pride and uncharitableness are commonly beams in the eyes of those, who pretend to be nice in their censures of others. Nay, many are guilty of that in secret, which they have the face to punish in others when discovered. Refract, says Seneca, that, perhaps, the fault of which you complain, may, on examination, be found in yourself. Will you be publicly severe against your own crime? Men's being so severe on the faults of others, and indulgent to their own, is a mark of hypocrisy. Thou hypocrite, v. 5. Whatever such an one pretends, it is certain he is no enemy to sin; if he were, he would be an enemy to his own sin; therefore, he is not worthy of praise, nay, he is an enemy to his brother, and, therefore, worthy of blame. This spiritual clarity must begin at home; for how canst thou, for shame, say to thy brother, let me help to reform thee, and takest no care to reform thyself? Thou wilt do it with an ill grace, and expect every one to tell thee, that vice corrects sin. Physician, heal thyself, see Rom. 2: 21. The consideration of what is amiss in ourselves, though it ought not to keep us from administering reproof, ought to make us candid and charitable in judging others. Therefore, restore with the spirit of meekness, considering thyself, (Gal. 6: 1.) what thou hast been, what thou art, and must be, if God leave thee to thyself.

First cast the beam out of thine own eye. Our own badness is so far from excusing us in not reproofing, that our being by it rendered unality. We should put the best construction on doubtful actions, and never without proof ascribe good ones to bad motives; shun curious inquiries and injurious suspicions respecting men's conduct; and avoid giving our opinion to any one's disadvantage, unless duty requires it. We should not anathematize those who differ from us, nor condemn sects and societies, except as the Scripture condemns them. As far as we can, we should shun whatever savors of malevolence or spiritual pride; for the opinion, which a Christian is compelled to form of the heart of man and the state of the world, will give sufficient offence, and ought not to be increased by harsh judgments in particular cases.—He, who is habitually inclined to a presumptuous and censorious judging of others, gives them cause to suspect, that he is devoid of true grace, and is exposed to judgment without mercy. If a Christian yield to such an evil, he may expect sharp corrections. Nay, all will commonly judge of men, as they judge others.—Thus it is verified, that 'with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again.' (Marg. Ref.—Note, Jam. 4: 11, 12.) Scott. 'The original word may signify to judge with severity, or injustice. Our Lord does not forbid all judgments of the words and actions of others, but those which are formed with malignity, self-interest, rashness and pride.' ROSEN. 'The Jews,' says Dr. A. Clarke, 'were highly criminal here, and yet had very excellent maxims against it.' Their unjust censures of Christ are the strongest instances of it,' observes Doddridge, 'that can be conceived.' Hence he paraphrases thus: 'the scribes and Pharisees—place a great part of their own religion in condemning others; but see to it that you do not judge those about you in this rigorous and severe manner, nor pass such unnecessary or uncharitable censures upon them, that you may not yourselves be judged with the like severity.' God and man will make great allowances to the character of the candid and benevolent; but those must expect

'judgment without mercy, who have shewed no mercy;' (Jam. 2: 13.) nor can they deny the equity of such treatment.—'The evil of judging does not consist in seeing things and persons as they are, or fancying them to be good against plain evidence, but in imputing worse motives to the persons, or putting a worse construction upon their actions, than is necessary, in scorn and the pride of self-preference, without pity, prayer, or endeavor for their amendment.'

ADAM.

Verses 3-5.

This section shews, that though Christ addressed the disciples as children of God, yet He warned them, that some of them might be hypocrites. If one, whose eyes were closed by an obstruction, (which like a beam, was seen by all, and yet prevented him from seeing any object distinctly) should pretend to see a particle in another's eye, and offer to remove it, he would be ridiculous. He ought to be directed to the disease of his own eyes, and endeavor to remedy it, before offering to assist his brother. Thus, while Christians should watch over one another and point out and remedy even small mistakes, he, who undertakes to reprove every defect in others, while his own spirit and conduct are wrong, proves his own hypocrisy. A wise reproof, or minister, must begin at home, and 'take heed to himself and his doctrine, temper and conduct. When these are unexceptionable, he may offer to help his brethren in promoting their sanctification; yet he will do it with humility, tenderness and candor.—Alas! in spiritual optics, a beam in the eye renders a man quick in discerning the faults of others, and 'blind' to his own.—Our Lord probably alluded to some proverbial expressions, the knowledge of which would now throw more light on the subject than any criticism can do. 'There was a proverb,' says Dr. Hammond 'among the Jews, at the coming of Christ,' afterwards, and with some variation, put in the Talmud. They, &c. say to others, 'take out the go about to give instructions and rebukes, much less, comforts to hardened sinners, to whom it will do no good, but who will be exasperated at us. Throw a pearl to a swine, and he will resent it, as if you threw a stone at him. Reproofs will be called reproaches, as they were, Luke 11:45. Jer. 6:9. Note, Good counsel and reproof are a holy thing, and a pearl; as an ear-ring of gold, and an ornament of fine gold, so is the wise reproof, (Prov. 25:12.) and a wise reproof is like an excellent oil, (Ps. 141:5.) it is a tree of life, (Prov. 3:18.) Some of the wicked are arrived at such a pitch of wickedness, that they are looked upon as dogs and swine; they have so long walked in the way of sinners, that they have sat down in the seat of the scornful. They professedly set instruction at defiance, so that they are irreclaimably wicked; they return with the dog to his vomit, and with the sow to her wallowing in the mire. One can expect nothing, but that they will trample the reproofs under their feet, in scorn and in rage, for they are impatient of control, and will turn again and rend the good names of their reprovers, with their revilings; returning them wounding for healing words, and rendering them with persecution. Herod rent John Baptist for his faithfulness. See here what is the evidence of men's being dogs and swine. They are to be reckoned such, who hate reproofs and reprovers, and fly in the face of those who, in kindness show them their sin and danger. These sin against the remedy; who shall help those, who will not be helped? It is plain that God is determined to destroy such, 2 Chron. 25:16. This rule applies to the sealing ordinances of the Gospel, which must not be prostituted to the openly wicked, lest holy things be rendered contemptible, and unholy persons be hardened. It is not meet to take the children's bread and cast it to the dogs. Yet we must be very cautious whom we condemn as dogs and swine, nor do it but on full evidence. Many a patient is lost by being thought to be so, who, if means had been used, might have been saved. We must take heed fit to reprove, is an aggravation of our badness. I must not say, 'I have a beam in my own eye, and, therefore, will not help my brother take the mote out of his.' A man's crime can never be his defence; but I must first reform myself, that I may thereby reform my brother. Note, those who blame others ought to be blameless themselves; those who are reprovers in the gate, such as magistrates and ministers, ought to walk circumspectly; an elder must have a good report, 1 Tim. 3:2, 7. The snuffers of the sanctuary were to be of pure gold.

Further, not every one is fit to be reproved; give not that which is holy unto dogs, v. 9. This may be considered as a rule to the disciples in preaching the Gospel; not that they must not preach it to any wicked men; Christ himself preached to publicans and sinners; but the reference is to those whom they found obstinate, after the Gospel was preached to them, as blasphemers and persecutors. Let them not spend much time among such, for it would be lost labor, Acts 13:41. Or it may be taken as a rule to all in giving reproof. Our zeal against sin must be guided by discretion; we must not spend much time among such, for it would be lost labor, Acts 13:41. Or it may be taken as a rule to all in giving reproof. Our zeal against sin must be guided by discretion; we must not of calling the good bad, by judging all professors to be hypocrites; so we must take heed of calling the bad desperate, by judging them to be dogs and swine. Our Lord Jesus is very tender of the safety of his people, and would not have them needlessly expose themselves to the fury of those who would turn again and rend them. Let them not be righteous overmuch, so as to destroy themselves. Christ makes the law of self-preservation one of his own laws and precious is the blood of his subjects to Him.

V. 7-11. Christ here speaks of prayer, as the appointed means of obtaining what we need.

1. Here is a precept in three words to the same purport. Ask, Seek, Knock; that is, in one word, pray, pray often, and with sincerity and seriousness; pray, and pray again; make conscience of prayer, and be constant in it; make a business of it, and be earnest. Ask, as a beggar asks alms. They that would be rich in grace, must betake themselves to the poor trade of begging, and they shall find it a thriving trade. Ask; represent your wants and burdens to God; ask, as a traveller asks the way. To pray, is to inquire of God, Ezek. 36:37. Seek, as for a lost thing of value; or as the merchantman, seeking goodly pearls. Seek by prayer; Dan. 9. 3. Knock, as he that desires to enter the house knocks at the door. We would be admitted to converse with God and taken into his love and kingdom; sin has barred the door against us; pray, we knock, Lord, Lord, open to us. Christ knocks at our door, (Rev. 3:20. Cant. 5:2.) and allows us to knock at his, which is a favor we do not allow to common beggars. Seeking and knocking, imply something more than asking and saying. We must not only ask, but seek; we must second our prayers with our endeavors. We must, in the use of appointed means, seek for that we ask for, else we tempt God. When the dresser of the vineyard asked a year's respite for the vineyard, he added, I will dig about it, Luke 13:7, 8. God gives knowledge and grace to those who search the Scriptures, and wait at wisdom's gates, and power against sin to those who watch the occasions of it. We must not only ask, but knock; we must come to God's door, must ask importunately, not only pray, but plead and wrestle with God. We must seek diligently and continue knocking, and endure in the duty to the end.

2. Our labor in prayer shall not be in vain.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-6. While we are careful not to 'call evil good,' or darkness light, we should guard against a censorious spirit, or we shall prepare bitterness for ourselves, and may expect rebukes from God, and censures from man. But why should we, who have so many sins, expose our brother's faults, which perhaps are far less heinous than our own? Let us rather seek for more self-knowledge, deeper humility, and grace to walk circumspectly, that if we have the opportunity, we may counsel and reprove our brethren with efficacy. How unfit must unconverted men be for the ministry! Yet how many enter on the arduous office, and attempt to take notes out of the eyes of others, without 'considering the beam in their own eye!' The minister of Christ is indeed by office a reproof, and must 'rebuke with all authority.' It is, then, needful for all who aspire to the office, to 'cast the beam out of their own eye'; that they may see clearly to cast out the mote from their brother's eye.' They should be careful not to expose themselves to the retort, 'Thou hypocrite, first cast out the beam from thine own eye.' But a mote in one's eye does not disqualify him from casting out a beam from another's eye; yet many neglect reproof, and harden themselves in sin, because ministers are liable to imperfections! In giving reproof, we shall meet with men, who will scoff at precious truths, and rage at just and friendly warnings, and hence we should be ready to endure contempt and persecution with firmness; and we shall often be constrained to let the scorner alone, lest we drive him to madness or blasphemy. But, if efforts should not be thrown away on such offenders, how deplorable is it, that the sacred offices and ordinances of the church are open to their profanation, if they choose, 'for filthy lucre's sake!' This is to give that which is holy to dogs, and to cast pearls before swine!

small piece of wood from thy eye, are answered, take the beam out of thine own eyes. 'I check those who condemn others for small matters, when they are guilty of things far more reprehensible.' SCOTT. By these expressions of our Lord it is plainly intimated, that men, who themselves are grievous sinners, are by no means proper persons to be cast and severe in reproving those who, at the worst, are but their own resemblance; and that the true way to reform mankind is for each to look at home, and begin with reforming himself. How much better were it to employ ourselves in publishing the praises of God, and vindicating the innocence of our abused brethren; in setting every action in its most advantageous light, and pouring balm into bleeding reputations, wounded by artificial malice, and words which are 'very swords!'

STANHOPE.

Verse 6.

As every man is not an authorized reproof, so every offender is not the subject of reproofs. (Note, Prov. 9:7-9. 23:9.) To persevere in giving instruction to some, would be as improper, as to throw the holy things, which were the food of the priests, to unclean dogs, or to cast a pearl before swine.' The emblems here used, may be supposed to denote hardened scorners, licentious or covetous professors, untractable opposers, or manifest apostates. (Murg. Ref.) Many instances of the Lord's goodness, though precious to the humble, are not to be told to scoffers, or those, who pervert sacred things. They would only be emboldened to greater ungodliness, and more impious rage. Such persons will disdain all experimental religion, or communion with God; as swine would tread pearls in the mire; and they will be so enraged at holy warnings, that, like fierce dogs, they will turn and tear their reproofers.—The rule may extend to preaching among those who obstinately contradict and blaspheme; and the admission of openly wicked persons to the Lord's supper, and to the Christian ministry. See next grievous violation of it. SCOTT. 'Obstinate contemners of Divine truth not unusually conceive great hatred against its professors, as opposed to their gains or reputation, and as casting reproach on their vices by a total difference of conduct; hence they labor to excite the people and government against Christians. Christ and his apostles experienced this among the Jews. Justin [Martyr] found Crescens, the Cynic philosopher, such an enemy, and not without reason anticipated his own death, as the result. Nevertheless, as Christ would not allow his holy doctrine to be thrown away on the one class, He would not have it concealed on account of the other.'

the promise, as is sure, and should be as sweet, as what we have in hand. God hath spoken in his holiness, and then Gilead is mine, Manasseh is mine; (Ps. 103: 7, 8.) all mine own, if I can but make it so by believing it so. Conditional grants become absolute on the performance of the condition; so here, he that asketh receiveth. Christ puts his fiat to the petition; and He having all power, that is enough.

It is illustrated by a similitude taken from earthly parents, and their innate readiness to give their children what they ask. Christ appeals to his hearers, What man is there of you, though never so ill-humored, who, if his son ask bread, will give him a stone? Whence he infers, If

Where God finds a praying heart, He will be found a prayer-hearing God. He shall give thee an answer of peace. The precept is three fold, ask, seek, knock. There is precept upon precept; but the promise is six fold, line upon line, for our encouragement; because a firm belief of the promise will make us constant in obedience. Now the promise is made so as exactly to answer the precept. God will meet those that attend on Him. Ask, and it shall be given you, not lent, nor sold, but given; and what is more free than gift? Whatever you pray for, according to the promise, shall be given you, if God see it fit for you; and what would you have more? It is but ask, and have. Ye have not, because ye ask not, or ask not aright. What is not worth asking, is not worth having, therefore worth nothing. God is Himself found of those that seek Him, and if we find Him, we have enough. Knock and it shall be opened; the door of mercy and grace shall no longer be shut against you as enemies and intruders, but open to you as friends and children. It will be asked, 'who is at the door?' If you be able to say, a friend, and have the ticket of promise ready in the hand of faith, doubt not of admission. If the door be not opened at the first knock, continue instant in prayer; it is an affront to a friend to knock at his door, and then go away; though He tarry, yet wait. It is made to extend to all that pray aright. 'Not only you, my disciples, shall receive what you pray for, but every one that asketh receiveth, Jew or Gentile, young or old, bond or free, high or low, rich or poor, they are all alike welcome to the throne of grace, if they come in faith, for God is no respecter of persons.' It is made a grant in the present tense, which is more than a promise for the future; not only shall receive, but receiveth; by faith applying and appropriating the promise, we are actually interested in the good promised. So sure and inviolable are the promises of God, that they do, in effect, give present possession. An active believer enters immediately, and makes the promised blessings his own. What we have in hope, according to ye then being evil, yet grant your children's request, much more will your heavenly Father give you the good things ye ask.

Now this man, direct our prayers. We must come to God, as children to a Father in heaven, with reverence and confidence. How naturally does a child in distress run to its Father; My head, my head! thus should the new nature send us to God for supplies. We must come to Him for good things, which teaches us to rely on ourselves to Him; we know not what is good for ourselves, (Eccl. 6: 12.) but He does, and we must leave it with Him; Father, thy will be done. The child is here supposed to ask bread, that is necessary, and a fish that is wholesome, but if the child should foolishly ask for a stone, or a serpent, for unripe fruit to eat, or a sharp knife to play with, the father, though kind, is so wise as to deny him. We often ask that of God which would do us hurt, if we had it; He knows it, and therefore does not give it to us. Denials in love are better than grants in anger. We had been undone ere this, if we had had all we desired.

It is of use, to encourage our prayers and exhortations. We may hope that we shall not be disappointed. We shall not have a stone for bread to break our teeth, though we have a hard crust to employ them; nor a serpent for a fish to sting us. We have reason indeed to fear it, for we deserve it; but God will be better to us than the desert of our sins. The world often gives stones for bread, and serpents for fish, but God never does: nay, we shall be heard and answered, for children are by their parents. God has put into the hearts of parents a compassionate inclination to succor their children. They who have little conscience of duty, do it as by instinct. No law was ever thought necessary to oblige parents to maintain their legitimate children, nor, in Solomon's time, their illegitimate ones. God owns us for his children, that, from the readiness we find in ourselves to relieve our children, we may be encouraged to apply to Him for relief. What tenderness fathers have is from Him; not from nature, but from the God of nature; and therefore it must needs be infinitely greater in Himself. He compares his concern for his people to that of a father for his children, (Ps. 103: 13.) nay, to that of a mother, which is usually more tender, Isa. 66: 13. 49: 14, 15. But it is here supposed that his love and tenderness far excel that of any earthly parent; and therefore it is argued with a 'much more,' and it is grounded on this undoubted truth, that God is a better Father, infinitely bet-

(Note, Luke 11: 5-13.) Many importunities have been inculcated, and wisdom and grace are requisite for the practice of them, without running into extremes on the right hand or the left. Our Lord, therefore, next encouraged his hearers to seek help and every blessing by prayer, and other means of grace, assuring them that whoever thus asked, sought, and knocked at mercy's gate would be successful. But is there no asking without receiving? Undoubtedly there is. A man will ask in vain if he ask of an idol, or saint, instead of God: he may ask what the Lord never promised, or without feeling any need of the mercy; he may offer hypocritical prayers; he may pray for exemption from punishment, while he cleaves to sin; he may ask for blessings, without using the means of obtaining them; or, in contempt of the appointed Mediator, he may make in his own name, or in that of imaginary mediators. He may seek the world, and then attend to religion so far as it consists with his worldly view; he may seek salvation in a more smooth method than that of the Gospel, or when 'the master of the house hath risen up and shut to the door;' (Note, Luke 13: 22-30, v. 25) nay, a man may knock in a fright, and leave off when his fears subside. But the sinner who comes to God, through the divine Advocate, for salvation, in sincere and earnest prayer, persevering, as having hope in this way only; who seeks spiritual blessings first, in the use of all appointed means, and he who knocks, resolved to find admission, will be sure at length to succeed. The promise is absolute. 'Every one that asketh shall receive, and he that seeketh shall find, and he that knocketh shall be opened unto him.' Such a promise sometimes finds ready admission; always in due time; nor will their previous character, however bad, preclude them; for He who opened the way, has taught them to come, and He giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not. (Note, Jam. 1: 5-8, v. 6.) It would be dishonorable to God to suppose the contrary, after the displays of his compassion to sinners. What man would put off his hungry child, when asking food, with a useless stone instead of a loaf, or a noxious serpent instead of a fish? Such a parent would not deserve the name of a father, or even of a man. If, therefore, men, corrupt and selfish, who cannot give without lessening their own store, and often betraying themselves, are moved by natural affection to give salutary gifts to their children; how much more shall our heavenly Father give good things, even all things pertaining to salvation, to all who humbly seek them? Christ does not say, 'to his children,' lest the suppliant should be hindered by the fear of not being one of them, but to 'them' that ask Him; thus asking may give assurance of being heard, and of receiving mercy. Our Lord assumed it as a principle, that the disciples, as well as others, were evil. 'What man is there among you, (in all this assembly,) who, if his son, &c.' 'Young preachers,' says Dr. Doddridge, 'are desired to consider how much force it adds to these discourses of our Lord, that they are an immediate address to his hearers, and not general harangues, like the Essays now so fashionable in pulpits.' 'Being evil.' An energetic attestation of the Truth Himself to man's natural depravity and wickedness. SCOTT. Ask, seek, knock. 'These words include the ideas of want, loss, and earnestness. Ask: beg at the door of mercy: thou art destitute of all spiritual good, and God alone can give it thee; and thou hast no claim but what his mercy has given thee on itself. Seek: thou hast lost thy God, thy paradise, thy soul. Look about thee: leave no stone unturned; there is no salvation nor peace for thee, till thou get thy soul restored to the favor and image of God. Knock: be in earnest—be importunate. Eternity is at hand! and if thou die in thy sin, where God is thou shalt never come. DR. A. CLARKE. 'The multiplying of terms in the precept is not superfluous, as it exhibits our aversion in reference to prayer and God's requirement of faith, constancy, and importunity. The promise that we "shall have" signifies an answer, either in kind or value. Asking is but the verbal expression of desire. No man desires what is evil, but that which he believes good, or suitable to his wants. As earthly parents will not give their children what is really hurtful, though they conclude that, though we thought what we asked was bread, yet indeed it was a stone; though we thought it a fish, God saw it was a scorpion, and answered our general desires of good by denying us specific request.'

12 Therefore 'all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them: 'for this is the law and the prophets.

sured, therefore, do not censure. Or, that you may have the benefit of the foregoing promises, fitly is the law of justice subjoined to the law of prayer; for, unless we be honest in our conversation, God will not hear our prayers. Isa. 1: 15-17. 58: 6, 9. Zech. 7: 9, 13. We cannot expect to receive good things from God, if we do not do fair things, and that which is honest, and lovely, and of good report among men. We must not only be devout, but honest, else our devotion is but hypocrisy.

The rule of justice is laid down; Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them. Christ came to teach us, not only what we are to know and believe, but what we are to do, not only towards God but towards men also. Not our fellow-disciples only, those of our party and persuasion, but all with whom we have to do. Alexander Severus, a heathen emperor, was a great admirer of this rule, had it written on the walls of his closet, often quoted it in giving judgment, honored Christ, and favored Christians for the sake of it. Take the rule negatively or positively, it comes to the same. We must not do to others he evil they

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 7-12. Amidst evils, wants, weakness, and folly, let us give ourselves unto prayer. Thus let the sinner seek reconciliation to God, and the believer, all that he needs for his comfortable walk with Him. But let us pray with earnestness, perseverance, and expectation of success; for 'every one that asketh receiveth.' If any say they ask, seek, knock, and yet obtain not, but are still enslaved to their sins, we must conclude, that they deceive themselves, or others. 'Let God be true, and every man a liar;' if men have not, it is either because they ask not, or ask amiss. Let us never suppose, that God would erect a throne of grace, appoint a mediator, command us at. Therefore,

This is the law and the prophets. It is the summary of the second great command, that is one of the two on which hang all the law and the prophets, (ch. 21: 40.) being their concurrent language. Every thing said in them about our duty to our neighbor may be reduced to this rule. Christ here adopts it, so that both the Old and New Testaments agree in prescribing it to us. By this rule is the law of Christ commanded, but the lives of Christians are censured by comparing them with it.

2. We must make religion our business, and be interested in it. We must be strict in our conversation, which is here represented as entering a strait gate, and walking in a narrow way. Observe the account here given of the bad way of sin, and the good way of holiness. There are only two ways, the good or bad, right or wrong, to heaven or to hell ; in one of which we all are walking ; no middle place hereafter no middle way now. The distinction of men to pray, incline your hearts to it; and then refuse to hear; or give us what would be pernicious, instead of 'the bread of life' and the blessings of salvation. Far be it from us to listen to the adversary, or suspect God of what would disgrace one of the sinful race of man! Assured, then, that He will give good things to all that ask Him, let us copy his equity, truth, and goodness. Whatever we desire men to do unto us, let us study to do the same unto them; 'not rendering evil for evil, or railing for railing; but 'doing good against evil, and overcoming evil with good.' SCOTT.

SCOTT.

Verse 12.

The example of God, and his readiness to pardon and accept us, are the primary argument, which enforces this rule, and connects it with the preceding verses. It is not only enacted as a strict and holy law, but is proposed to believers as a rule of duty, with abundant motives and encouragements: that by observing it they may glorify God, and show their gratitude for his mercy. Moral precepts, thus enforced, differ widely from the same rules of action prescribed by human moralists, without authority or sanction.—This precept is often called the 'golden rule', and is equivalent to that of 'loving our neighbor as ourselves,' containing the substance of the second table of the law. It is a rule which is not only easy to be observed, but it would be absurd to suppose our Lord meant that it contains all that has been written of the love of God. 'This rule, the sum of the law and the prophets,' can never be justly so construed, as to subvert any law established by 'him. Therefore it admits limitation. What I desire according to the principles of Christianity should be done, or not done to me, that I must do, or not do to others. It would not hence follow, that if Socrates would lend his wife to a friend, the friend should do the same; for 'it is contrary to "the law and the prophets." A criminal would not have the judge condemn him, yet the judge must condemn; since otherwise offenders would go unpunished. A master is not to obey his servants, because he wishes for obedience in them; but he must be as obedient to his own master, as he can reasonably expect they should be to him; and treat his servants as kindly, as he could reasonably expect they should do to him. And a poor man may desire that one who is wealthy should give enough to make him rich; yet though, were the rich man poor, he also might desire the same kindness, he is not required by this rule, though he might lawfully do so, to make his poor man rich.' Whitby. We are not required to do to others, whatever we might unreasonably desire them to do for us. Judging by the rule of duty, and by the feelings of our own minds, we should suppose ourselves to be in the situation of another; and then inquire how they might reasonably expect him to behave toward us, if he were in our situation. Every man must perceive, that this would lead to universal justice, goodness, compassion, forgiveness and candor, and exclude every thing of an opposite character. If we proceed in this manner, we shall find that the only right conduct in the world is that which is right. But alas! professed Christians are willing to do to others, as they are done by; instead of doing to others what they would that others should do to them.—‘This maxim,’ says Dr. Evans, in his ‘Christian Temper,’ will be a monitor in conversation, in negotiation and commerce, in ‘cases where others need compassion, in censures, in provocations, ‘in the several relations of life, in religious differences, and the use of ‘such words as Schismatics and Heretics.’ SCOTT. ‘None but whose heart is filled with love to God and all mankind, can keep this precept, as it is written, and who will feel itself creep out, and be brought within its limits, but God hath spoken it, and it is the design of the law and the prophets: the sum of all that is laid down in the Sacred Writings, relative to men’s conduct towards each other. It seems as if God had written it upon the hearts of all men, for saying, ‘This kind may be found among all nations, Jewish, Christian, and Heathen.’ Dr. A. CLARKE. ‘This precept is, in effect, a summary and abstract of all the humane and social virtues recommended in the moral precepts of the law and the prophets; and it was one of the greatest ends of both to bring men to this equitable and amiable temper.—I say one of the greatest ends, because it is not the only end, but it is the first and great commandment: (Matt. 22: 38.) and it is a most absurd and fatal error to imagine that the regulation of social life is the only end of religion.—I fear many good-natured deists will perish by adopting this error, and my heart is wounded at the thought.’ DONNA.

be brought down; nay, we must be willing to deny ourselves and forsake all for Christ. The gate is strait to all, but to some straiter than to others; as to the rich, and some that have been long prejudiced against religion. The gate is strait, but blessed be God, not shut up, nor locked, nor kept with a flaming sword, as it will be shortly, ch. 25: 10.

Secondly, the way is narrow. We are not in heaven as soon as we get through the strait gate; not in Canaan, as soon as we are through into saints and sinners will swallow up all to eternity.

That which allures multitudes into the way, keeps them in it; abundant liberty is offered, the gate is wide, and the way broad, and there are many travellers. The gate is wide open, to tempt those that go right on their way. You may go in with all your lusts about you; it gives no check to your appetites. You may walk in the way of your heart, and in the sight of your eyes, with room enough. It is a broad way. No hedge. There are many paths in it. There is choice of sinful ways, contrary to each other, but all paths in this broad way. You will have abundance of company. Many there be that go in thereat. If we follow the multitude, it will be to do evil. It is natural for us to go down stream; but it is too great a compliment to be willing to be damned for company, and to go to hell with them, because they will not go to heaven with us. If many perish, we should be the more cautious.

It leads to destruction. Eternal death is at the end, (and the way of sin tends to it),—everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord. Whether it be the high way of open profaneness, or the back way of close hypocrisy, sin will be our ruin if we repent not.

We have an account of the way of holiness, that frightens so many. Let us know the worst of it, and sit down and count the cost. Christ tells us first, that the gate is strait. Conversion and regeneration are the gate by which we enter into this way, and begin a life of faith and godliness. Out of a state of sin into a state of grace, we must pass by the new birth, John 3: 3, 5. This is a strait gate, hard to find, and hard to get through, like a passage between two rocks, 1 Sam. 14: 4. There must be a new heart and a new spirit, and old things must pass away. The bent of the soul must be changed, corrupt habits broken off; what we have been doing all our days must be undone again. We must swim against the stream, and struggle with much opposition from within and from without. It is easier to set a man against all the world, than against himself, and yet this must be in conversion. It is a strait gate, for we must stoop, or we cannot enter. We must become as little children; high thoughts must the Red sea; no, we must go through a wilderness, must travel a narrow way, hedged in by the divine law, which is exceeding broad, and that makes the way narrow. Self must be denied, corruptions mortified, daily temptations resisted, and duties done, though against our inclination. We must endure hardships, wrestle, and be in an agony; we must go through much tribulation. It is a afflicted way; but though hedged about, blessed be God, it is not hedged up. Our bodies and the corruptions remaining in us, make the way of duty difficult; but as the understanding and will grow more and more sound, it will open and enlarge, and become more pleasant.

Thirdly, The gate being so strait, and the way so narrow, it is not strange that so few find it. Many pass it by through carelessness. They are well as they are, and see no need to change; others look upon it, but shun it; they do not like to be so restrained. They that are going to heaven are few, compared with those who are going to hell. A little flock, a remnant, like the grape-gleanings of the vintage, as the eight that were saved in the ark, 1 Kings 20: 27. This discourages many, they are loth to be singular; but instead of stumbling at this, say rather, if so few are going to heaven, there shall be one more for me.

This is the way to life, to present comfort in the favor of God, and to eternal bliss; the hope of which, at the end of our way, should reconcile us to all the difficulties of the road. Life and godliness are put together; (2 Pet. 1: 3.) the gate is strait, and the way narrow, and uphill, but one hour in heaven will make amends for all.

Our great concern and duty is, Enter ye in at the strait gate. The matter is fairly stated; life and death are set before us. Let it be considered impartially, and this day choose you in which you will walk. The matter determines itself, and will not admit of debate. No man in his wits would choose to go to the gallows because it is a smooth way, nor refuse the offer of a throne, because the way to it is rough and dirty. Yet such absurdities as these are men guilty of in matters relating to their souls. Deliberate not then any longer, but enter ye in at the strait gate. Knock at it, by sincere and constant prayer and endeavor, and it shall be opened; nay, a wide door, and an effectual one, shall be opened. It is true we cannot go in without divine grace; but it is as true that grace is freely offered, and shall not be wanting to those that seek it. Conversion is hard work, but it is needful; and blessed be God, it is not impossible, if we strive.

Verses 13, 14.

Our Lord's audience consisted of unestablished disciples, and the multitude. Both needed to be excited to earnestness in the concerns of their souls; for which purpose He gave them this exhortation and warning.—Our life is represented as a journey to eternity. As there are two places to which men go at death, so there are two roads; one to destruction, the other to happiness. The gate at which men enter 'the broad road' is wide, even as wide as the race of Adam; for we enter it when we are born sinners in a sinful world, and proceed in it as long as we live unconverted. As it is broad, it has paths suited to various inclinations. The covetous and the envenomed, the infidel, prodigal, and hypocrite; the antinomians and the Pharisees, the children of levity and dissipation, grave politicians, and proud philosophers, decent moralists and infamous debauchees, all have select paths and companies. Each despises the other, and yet they countenance one another in opposing the holy ways of the Lord. Here they walk without trouble, contrivance, or intention, and while pleasing or forgetting themselves, or even wasting their time in sleep, they make progress. As it is thronged by many, especially of the rich, wise, noble, and honorable, and many of its paths are fashionable, numbers have no suspicion whether it leads, as he is highly incensed at those who warn them, and so fall into destruction. But when a man believes Christ, he discovers the end of his way, feels the necessity of turning, and determines to proceed no further. He learns, that, by repentance, faith, conversion to God and holiness, he may enter another way which leads to life. But the gate is strait.—He must deny himself, take up his cross, resist temptation, mortify the flesh, endure reproach, use all the means of grace, and cordially accept Christ in all his offices, or he cannot get in. 'The way is narrow.' It is the direct way of implicit faith and obedience. A Christian cannot choose his path, as men do in the broad road. He must go straight forward. If he turn aside, he will be scourged back into the narrow path. If he meet an enemy, he must overcome him; if he come to a mountainous difficulty, he must climb over it; if the road be rough, he must still keep in it, and suffer no tribulation to drive him from it. Therefore, 'few there be, that find' this way to life. Most men either neglect religion, or rest in forms or notions; or are deluded into a foolish and fashionable religion, which 'Satan, transformed into an angel of light, and his ministers transformed into ministers of righteousness, propose to them, when uneasy about their souls. They are deterred by difficulties from entering the strait gate, and treading the narrow way; and they hope to get to heaven at an easier rate. They do not know that this narrow way has joys and consolations, which compensate for its difficulties and trials. Therefore Christ warned all to 'enter in at the strait gate' without delay, and with all earnestness; and to fear nothing so much as to be left without. For if the entrance be difficult, and found only by few, yet all, who resolutely attempt it, will succeed; and it leads to eternal life, while all others lead to destruction.—It is surprising how little satisfaction of Christ has been overlooked by his professed disciples, and how much pains have been taken to soften its asperity and explain away its meaning. It is not inconsistent with the rule of judging, to suppose most men in the way to destruction, and to exhort them to 'enter in at the strait gate'; when words like these are in the Scripture, and commented on by the ungodly lives of multitudes around us. (Notes, 1, 2. Luke 13: 22-30.)—The real disciple of Christ has always been an unfashionable character; and all, who have sided with the majority have gone in the broad road. (Notes, Eph. 2: 1-3.) Broad. Spacious, affording room. Narrow, not spacious, straitened. Scorn.

Our Savior seems here to allude to the distinction of public and private ways made by Jewish lawyers: with whom a private way was four cubits in breadth, a public way sixteen. Lightfoot. 'The strait gate' signifies literally what it called a tricket, or little door in a large gate. By gate, among the Jews, was signified metaphorically the introduction to or means of acquiring any thing. So they speak of the gate of repentance, the gate of prayers, and of tears. The way to the kingdom of God is made sufficiently manifest—the clearest assistance promised in the way—and nothing renders it either narrow, or difficult, but sin. Let all the world leave their sins, and all the world may walk in it. A. A. CLARKE. 'The way of life which our blessed Redeemer has marked out for us in such precepts as these, may indeed to corrupt nature appear rugged and narrow, and the gate strait through which we are to pass; but let us encourage ourselves against all these difficulties, by considering the eternal life and glory to which they infallibly lead. Then shall we prefer the most painful path of piety and virtue, though with fewer companions than we might reasonably expect, to all those flowery and frequented ways of vice which go down to the chambers of death. DODGE.

out false colors, but with design more successfully to attack the truth? 'Well, beware, try them, and if you discover falsehood, have nothing to do with them. Guard against this temptation, which commonly attends a revival of religion.' When God's work revives, Satan and his agents are most busy.

1. Beware; they are wolves in sheep's clothing. They come in the habit of prophets, which was coarse and unwrought. They wear a rough garment to deceive, Zech. 13:4. The Septuagint calls Elijah's mantle a sheepskin mantle. Beware of being deceived by men's dress, as by that of the scribes, who desired to walk in long robes, Luke 20:46. Or it may be taken figuratively. They pretend to be sheep; and outwardly appear so, harmless and useful. They feign themselves to be just men; and, because of their clothing, are admitted among the sheep, which gives them an opportunity of doing mischief. 'Satan turns himself into an angel of light,' 2 Cor. 11:13, 14. The enemy has horns like a lamb, (Rev. 13:11.) Faces of men, Rev. 9:7, 8. Seducers in language and carriage are soft as wool, Rom. 16:18. Isa. 30:10.

2. Carefully they are ravening wolves. Every hypocrite is a goat in sheep's clothing, but the false prophet a wolf; not only not a sheep, but the worst enemy the sheep has; that comes only to tear and scatter them, (John 10:12.) to drive them from God and each other into crooked paths. Paul calls them grievous wolves, Acts 20:29. They raven for themselves, and serve their own belly, Rom. 16:18.

3. The good rule is, prove all things; (1 Thess. 5:21.) try the spirits; (1 John 4:1.) the touchstone is, ye shall know them by their fruits, v. 16-20. You cannot always distinguish trees by the bark, leaves, or boughs, but by their fruits ye shall know them. The fruit is according to the tree. Men may, in their professions, contradict their inward principles, but their practices will agree with them. Never expect to gather grapes from thorns, nor figs from thistles; it is not in their nature to produce such fruits. An apple may be stuck, or a bunch of grapes may hang upon a thorn; so may a good truth, word, or action, be found in an ill man, but never grow there. Note, Corrupt hearts are like thorns and thistles, which are worthless, vexing, and for the fire at last. Good works are like grapes and figs, pleasing to God, and profitable to men. This good fruit is no more to be expected from bad men, than a clean thing out of an unclean. They want an influence ing principle; out of an evil treasure will be brought forth evil things. On the other hand, if you know what the fruit is, you may know what the tree is. A good tree cannot but bring forth good fruit; a corrupt tree cannot but bring forth evil fruit; that being reckoned the fruit of a tree, which it brings forth naturally, plentifully, and constantly. Men are known by the tenor of their conversation, and by the acts that are most their own, and least under the influence of external motives.

Every tree that bringeth not forth good fruit, is hewn down. This very saying, John the Baptist had used, ch. 3:10. Christ could have spoken the same sense in other words, but He thought it no disparagement to Him to use the same words John had used. Let not ministers be anxious to coin new expressions, nor people's ears itch for novelties. To write and speak the same things, must not be grievous, for it is safe. Barren trees are they that bring not forth good fruit; though there be fruit, if it be not good fruit, the tree is accounted barren. Barren trees shall certainly be hewn down and cast into the fire. God will deal with them, as men do with dry trees; He will place on them some sign, token of his displeasure; He will hark them by stripping them of their parts and gifts; will cut them down by death, and cast them into the fire of hell; a fire kindled by God's wrath, and fed with the wood of barren trees, Ezek. 31:12, 13. Dan. 4:14. John 15:16.

Would you know whether they be right or not, see how men live. The scribes and Pharisees sat in Moses' chair, and taught the law. But they were proud, false, and oppressive; therefore, Christ warned his disciples to beware of them, Mark 12:38. If men pretend to be prophets, and are immoral, they are no true friends to the cross of Christ, whatever they profess; whose god is their belly, whose glory is their shame, who mind earthly things, Phil. 3:18, 19. Those are not sent by the holy God, whose lives show that they are led by the unclean spirit. God, indeed, puts treasure into earthen vessels, but not into vessels so corrupt. They may declare God's statutes, but what have they to do to declare them?

By the fruits of their doctrine, you may know men. What do they tend to, and to what affections and practices will they lead? If the doctrine be of God, it will tend to promote piety, humility, holiness, and other Christian graces; but, if the doctrines of these prophets manifestly tend to make people proud, worldly and contentious, to make them loose in their conversation, uncharitable, factious; if it take people off from governing themselves and their

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 13-20. We ought constantly to remember, that 'wide is the gate, and broad the way, that leadeth to destruction, and many go in theret.' If we would serve God, we must be singular, as well as resolute, in religion. We 'must be born again, or we cannot see the kingdom of God.' We must believe in Christ, and be in Him new creatures, and lead godly lives; or we cannot be saved. Facts demonstrate, that so 'straight is this gate, and so narrow the way,' that 'few find it.' Yet 'every one that seeketh, findeth, and to him that knocketh, the gate shall be opened.' Though the way has difficulties, and is painful to the flesh, yet it has comforts with which a stranger intermeddeth not. The entrance is more difficult, than the further progress, and the hope of heaven, and 'joy in the Holy Ghost' render it 'the way of pleasantness and the path of peace.' But let all beware of those, who 'prophecy smooth things,' and invent easier ways to heaven. Such are 'ministers of Satan, transformed into ministers of righteousness;' they beguile unstable souls, and prejudice them against the religion of Christ, and its teachers. Whatever appearances they assume they are actuated by some corrupt principle, and are wolves in sheep's clothing. The disciple who takes Christ's character and precepts as the standard of his judgment, will generally see through them. By their fruits he will distinguish them from the servants of the Lord, and will not expect to 'gather grapes, or figs, from thorns or thistles.' He is aware, that a good tree cannot habitually bring forth evil fruit, nor a corrupt tree good fruit; and looking on to the time when 'every tree, that bringeth not forth good fruit shall be hewn down and cast into the fire,' he will take care not to be deceived by them.—Alas! most men have other rules of judgment than the Scriptures; and a confident tone, a voluble tongue, and zeal for some parts of religion in opposition to others, or new notions plausibly defended, go further than a Christian spirit and conversation, and the preaching of the whole doctrine of the Gospel; so that many follow the way of deceivers, whom the way of truth is evil spoken of. (Note, 2 Pet. 2:1.) SCOTT.

Before the coming of Christ, false prophets were the most dangerous enemies to religion, and false teachers have been so ever since. (Marg. Ref. b. c.) Nothing so prevents men from becoming true Christians, as the flattering doctrines of those who pervert the truth. (Note, 23:13.) Hence Christ warned the people to 'beware of false prophets,' who might be 'known by their fruits,' by the effects of their doctrine as exemplified in their own spirit and conduct; for they would betray themselves by their arrogance, ambition, eagerness for disputation, vehement passions, bitter resentment, or some part of their habitual temper and conduct: being contrary to the mind of Christ, and the humility, meekness and love, which characterize his ministers.—He who regards Christ's words, will no more expect good from unchristian teachers, than 'grapes from thorns, or figs from thistles.' They commonly infect all, over whom they have influence, with corrupt principles, pride, selfishness, wrath and malignity. A good tree will yield a good fruit, but a corrupt tree must bring forth evil fruit. The habit of conduct of a pious man must be good, and the tendency of his example beneficial. But the tenor of an unconverted man's actions must be evil, and the effect of his life and doctrine pernicious. As the Judge will decide upon professed Christians by this rule; and 'every tree that bringeth not forth good fruit shall be hewn down, and cast into the fire,' (Note, 3:7-10.) so we should judge by the same rule. By the 'fruits,' and not 'fair speeches,' we must know them: nor can we see call Christ, Lord, Lord; we say well, for so He is; (John 13:13.) but can we imagine this to be enough to show for us to heaven; or that He who knows and requires the heart, should he so put off with show for substance? Compliments among men are paid with compliments, but they are never paid as real services; and can they be of any account with Christ? There may be a seeming importunity in prayer, Lord, Lord; but if inward impressions be not answerable to the outward language, we are but as sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal. This is not to take us off from earnestness in prayer, but from resting in the form of godliness without the power.

To be happy, we must do the will of Christ. The will of God as Christ's Father, is his will in the gospel; for there He is made known as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and in Him our Father. It is his will that we repent, believe in Christ, live a holy life, and love one another. This is his will, even our sanctification. If we do not comply, we mock Christ in calling Him, Lord, Lord, as they did, who put on Him a gorgeous robe, and said, Hail, King of the Jews. Saying and doing are two things. He that said, I go, sir, stirred never a step; (ch. 21:30.) but these two things God has joined in his commands, and let no man that puts them asunder think to enter into the kingdom of heaven.

possess those who will lead men to heaven, who are going the contrary way.—The fascinating manner of some, who teach contrary to Scripture, is regarded by an objection to teachers, as the cause of the curse, 'by their fruits ye shall know them,' of the actions of false teachers. For the credit of his cause, Satan, no doubt, will try to give energy to the delusion, that his ministers are the ministers of righteousness. Yet in the passage, to which allusion is here made, the apostle declares 'their end shall be according to their works.' (Note, 2 Cor. 11:13-15.) The virtue or amiableness of many heresiarchs will not bear examination by the law of God. It consists principally of such 'things, as are highly esteemed among men;' and is plainly connected with habitual disregard of many duties, and indulgence in many evils, when viewed in the light of the Word of God. The Christian, thus enlightened, will see through the 'sheep's clothing,' and detect the wolf. SCOTT. 'The great purpose of our Lord's coming was to "redeem men from all iniquity, and to purify unto Himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works." Every teacher who does not exhibit that character in himself, and study to produce it in others, is a false teacher. Every doctrine which does not tend to promote individual righteousness and holiness, is false doctrine. Therefore by their fruits ye shall know them. We are not to expect a good life from unsound doctrine, or the work of an effective ministry from a corrupt teacher. "He that winneth souls" must himself be first won by "the wisdom which is from above," Bp. SUMNER. False prophets!—Or false teachers; for the Hebrews called those persons prophets who addressed the people for their instruction. But the Pharisees chiefly are intended, whose moral doctrines were in many things directly opposite to those of Christ, austere, indeed, in appearance, but in reality lax, and opening a door to all wickedness. Yet false teachers in general, who resemble the Pharisees, though they profess themselves followers of Christ, are meant.' ROSENM. (V. 19.) Is heven down, &c.] 'What a terrible sentence against Christless pastors and Christless hearers! Every tree that produces not good fruit is to be now cut down; the act of excision is now taking place: even now the curse of the Lord is on the head and heart of every false teacher and impatient hearer.' (V. 20.) By their fruits, &c.] 'This truth is often repeated, because our eternal interests depend so much on it. Not to have good fruit, is to have evil; there can be no innocent sterility in the invisible tree of the heart. He that brings forth no fruit, and he that brings forth bad fruit, are both only fit for the

The hypocrite offers things in lieu of obedience, v. 22. His plea is supposed to be in that day, that great day, when every man shall appear in his own colors; when the secrets of all hearts shall be manifest, and, among the rest the vain supports of sinners. Christ knows the strength of their cause, and it is but weakness. They put in their plea with great importunity, Lord, Lord; and with great confidence, appealing to Christ concerning it; Lord, dost not Thou know—that we have prophesied in thy name? Yes, it may be so; Balaam and Caiaphas were overruled to prophesy; and Saul was, against his will, among the prophets, yet that did not save them. These prophesied in his name, but He did not send them; they used his name but to serve a turn. Note, A man may be a preacher, have external gifts, and a external call; and perhaps some success in it, and yet be a wicked man; may help others to heaven, and yet come short himself.—That is thy name we have cast out devils? That may be, too. Judas cast out devils, and was yet a son of perdition. Origen says, that in his time, so prevalent was the name of Christ to cast out devils, that it sometimes availed when named by wicked Christians. A man might cast devils out of others, and yet have a devil, nay, be a devil himself.—That in thy name we have done many wonderful works? There may be a faith of miracles where there is no justifying faith; none of that faith which works by love and obedience. Gifts of tongues and healing would recommend men to the world, but it is only real holiness that is accepted of God. Grace and love are a more excellent way than removing mountains, or speaking with the tongues of men and angels, 1 Cor. 13: 1, 2. Grace will bring a man to heaven without working miracles; but working miracles will never bring a man to heaven without grace. Observe, That on which their hearts were set in working miracles, was the wonderfulness of them. Simon Magus wondered at the miracles, (Acts 8: 13.) and therefore would give any money for power to do the like. Observe, They had not many good works to plead. They could not pretend to gracious works of piety. One such would have passed better in their account than many wonderful works, which availed not at all, while they continued in disobedience. Miracles have ceased, and with them, this plea; but do not carnal hearts still encourage themselves in groundless hopes, with the like vain supports? They think they shall go to heaven, fire.' Dr. A. CLARKE. 'Hence we may learn, that our Lord expects from his people such knowledge of the Scriptures, that they can discern truth from falsehood; and such diligence, as to search the Scriptures, whether the things their teachers utter be according to them or not; Acts 17: 11. not taking Divine truths on trust, nor believing on the mere word of a teacher; using teachers not as dictators, but only as helpers of their faith.'

Verses 21-23.

Christ here spake not only as the Messiah, but with the authority of the Judge, and the Arbitrator of every man's eternal state, from whom there could be no appeal; and if we compare this language of majesty with his lowly appearance, the neglect and contempt to which He was exposed,—the contrast is striking.—It is implied that they, who do so acknowledge Him as their Lord, are not even professing in the way to heaven; and it is declared, that of those who openly acknowledge Him as their Savior, some will be excluded from glory; and that those who 'do the will' of God shall be saved.—It is here necessary to distinguish between the will of God, as Creator and Lawgiver, concerning his rational creatures, and his will concerning fallen and condemned sinners. The law requiring us to love Him with all our hearts, and our neighbor as ourselves, without allowance for failure, and sustained by an awful curse, is in the former sense the will of God. This 'shuts up all men under sin.' But God is now the Savior of sinners. What, then, as a God of salvation, is his will concerning sinners? It is his will that we should repent, forsake and hate all sin, believe, love and obey his Son, love one another, and walk according to all his commandments. His first requirement in this view is, 'this is my beloved Son, hear ye Him.'—When this is done, all else follows. Without it, all else is vain. Obedience in all things is sincerely attempted, and habitually performed, in the tenor of the believer's life, from his first acceptance of salvation. In this sense, he does the will of God, though far from doing his will, as Governor of the world, in such manner as to be justified by the law. Hypocrites do not sincerely attend to this will of God, and so cannot enter heaven. The Lord declares, that 'in that day,' even of such as have preached the Gospel, prophesied in his name, and wrought miracles, shall be rejected, because they are workers of iniquity. Not one Balaam only, or one Judas, will be thus condemned, but many will plead in vain their professions, gifts, services and miracles. He will then disavow all; & probation of them. He knew be likened unto a foolish man, which built his house upon the sand:

27 And the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house; and it fell: and great was the fall of it.

28 And it came to pass, when Jesus had ended these sayings, the people were astonished at his doctrine;

29 For he taught them as one having authority, and not as the scribes.

rein Christ, and be found in Him. Building upon a rock requires care and pains. They who would do it, must give diligence. They are wise builders who begin so to build that they may be able to finish, (Luke 14:30.) and therefore lay a firm foundation.

There are many who think they shall go to heaven, but despise this Rock, and build their hopes upon the sand. Every thing besides Christ is sand. Some build their hopes on worldly prosperity, as if that were a sure token of God's favor; (Hos. 12:8.) others, upon their profession, privileges, or reputation. They are called Christians, were baptized, say their prayers, go to church, and do nobody harm, and if they perish, God help a great many. This is the light of their own fire, which they walk in. That upon which they venture, though with great assurance, is all sand.

A storm is coming that will try what our hopes are bottomed on, and every man's work; (1 Cor. 3:13,) that will discover the foundation, Hab. 3:13. Rain, and floods, and wind, will beat upon the house. The trial is sometimes in this world, when tribulation and persecution arise because of the word. Then it will be seen who but heard the word, and who practised it.

Our hopes will then be tried. When death and judgment come, then the storm comes, however calm it may be now. Then our hopes, if ever, will be turned into everlasting fruition.

Those hopes which are built on Christ, will stand the builder in stead,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 21-29. Our future Judge assures us, that 'not every one who calls Him Lord, shall enter heaven, but only they, that doeth the will of God.' Let us remember, that grace is more valuable than splendid accomplishments, and even prophecy and miracles. If an admired and useful minister had no better evidence of his conversion, than his success as a preacher, he would 'preach to others and be a castaway'; while the meanest believer among his hearers would be received into heaven. Let us, then, be warned by Christ's admonitions, examine whether we be in the faith, and have that love, without which our attainments are nothing. (Notes, 1 Cor. 13:) Let us beware of profligacy, infidelity, and self-righteousness; of a dead faith, a formal profession, and a perversion of the Gospel. Let no one imagine, that he builds on the tried Foundation, who hears the words of Christ, but obeys them not. He when the storm comes; his profession will not wither, his comforts will not fail. They will be his strength and song, as an anchor of the soul! sure and steadfast.

When he comes to the last encounter, those hopes will take off the terror of death, will carry him cheerfully through that dark valley, will be approved by the Judge, stand the test of the great day, and will be crowned with endless glory, 2 Cor. 1:12. 2 Tim. 4:7, 8. Blessed is that servant, whom, when his Lord cometh, He shall find so doing, so hoping.

The hopes which the foolish builders indulge, will yield no comfort in the hour of trouble, in death, or in the day of judgment; will be no fence against temptations to apostasy, in a time of persecution. When God takes away the soul, where is the hope of the hypocrite? Job 27:8. It is as the spider's web, and as the giving up of the ghost. He shall lean upon his house, but it shall not stand, Job 8:14, 15. It fell when the builder most needed it, and expected it would be a shelter to him. It fell, when it was too late to build another. When a wicked man dies, his expectation perishes. It was a great disappointment to the builder; the shame and loss were great. The higher men's hopes have been raised, the lower they fall. It is the sorest ruin of all that attends formal professors; witness Capernaum's doom.

3. We are here told the effect of Christ's discourse. It was an excellent sermon; and it is probable that He said more than is here recorded. Doubtless the delivery of it from Him, into whose lips grace was poured, did mightily set it off. They were astonished at his doctrine, though it is to be feared that few were brought to follow Him. For the present, they were filled with wonder. Note, it is possible for people to admire good preaching, and remain in ignorance and unbelief; to be astonished, and yet not sanctified. The reason was, because He taught them as one having authority, and not as the scribes. The scribes pretended to as much authority as any teachers - whatever, and were supported by all external advantages that could be obtained; but their preaching was mean, flat, and jejune. They spake as those that were not masters themselves of what they preached. The word did not come from them with life or force, but they delivered it as a school-boy says his lessons. Christ delivered his discourse, as a judge gives his charge; his lessons were laws, his word commands. Christ, on the mountain, showed more authority, than the scribes in Moses' seat. Thus when Christ teaches by his Spirit in the soul, He teaches with authority. He says, let there be light, and there is light.

confounded all worldly schemes of happiness, binds the law upon us, in its spirituality and extent, as reaching the heart and all its motives, and lays us, as guilty and condemned sinners, at his feet; one end of his interpretation being to define sin and promote conviction of it. Then the necessity and great blessing of the Gospel, in its capital points of forgiveness and supernatural aid, open upon us. For Christ convinces of sin, to bring us to faith - and thence back to the law, with all advantage for performance; that is, under a sense of God's love to us, and with hearts warmed with redeeming mercy. And woe to him who does not here follow Christ, in taking the law, as He expounds it, for the rule of his conscience and guide to perfection. Christ does indeed preach morality, and just such a pure morality as we need, for the recovery and happiness of our natures. But all our endeavours will be frustrated, if we do not comply with his method of attaining it, by first believing in Him for the remission of sin and sanctification by the Spirit. ADAM.

the mountain torrents common in Syria and Palestine, which, swollen by rain, sweep away the slightly built dwellings. Ed.

Verses 23, 29.

Those who heard this discourse, were astonished at the wisdom and energy of the doctrine of Christ, and the authority with which He enforced it. They perceived that his instructions had an influence on their understandings, consciences, and affections, which compelled conviction and approbation; and that He spoke very differently from their scribes, who inculcated ceremonial observances, external duties and their own traditions, or those of some rabbi, in a disputatious and uninteresting manner. SCOTT. 'If we may judge of the teachings of the scribes in Christ's day, by the Jewish traditions, or even by their Mishnah, this was so eminently the character of it, (as described above,) that nothing could be more justly contemptible; and their frigid and insipid comments and lessons could no more be compared with the strains of divine eloquence, with which our Lord's discourses abound, than a glow-worm can be compared to the sun.' CHAP. VIII.

Christ cleanses a leper, 1-4; heals a centurion's servant, 5-13; rebukes the calling of the Gentiles and rejection of the Jews, 5-13; heals Peter's wife's mother, 14, 15, and many others, fulfilling a prophecy of Isaiah, 16, 17; shows in what spirit he ought to be followed, 18-22; calms the tempestuous sea by his word, 23-27; and casts out devils from two possessed men suffering from them to go into the swine, 28-32. The Gentiles desire him to leave them, 33, 34.

WHEN he was come down from the mountain, great multitudes followed him.

2 And, behold, there came a leper and worshipped him, saying, Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean.

3 And Jesus put forth his hand, and touched him, saying, I will; be thou clean. And immediately his leprosy was cleansed.

for Christ, as the High Priest of our profession. He comes to do that which the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, Rom. 8: 3. The law discovered sin, and pronounced sinners unclean; it shut them up, (Gal. 3: 23.) as the priest did the leper, but could go no further; it could not make the corner thereunto perfect. But Christ cleanses us from sin, and so perfects forever them that are sanctified.

1. The leper came and worshipped Christ, as one clothed with divine power. Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean. It was a great temporal mercy. It teaches us not only to apply to Christ for the cure of bodily diseases, but in what manner to apply, assured of his power, but with submission to his will. Lord, if Thou wilt, Thou canst. As to temporal mercies, we cannot be so sure of God's willingness, as of his power. His promise of them is limited to his glory and our good. When we cannot be sure of his will, we may be of his wisdom and mercy, to which we may cheerfully refer ourselves; Thy will be done; and this makes the expectation easy, and the event comfortable. It was a typical mercy. Sin is the

NOTES.

CHAP. VI. V. 1-4. In commenting on the miracles, parables or discourses recorded by more than one evangelist, it is proposed to be particular where they first occur, and to reserve slight variations for consideration in the other gospels; except where the narrative in other evangelists is more full. The harmony of the evangelists has troubled expositors, and many things still remain in uncertainty. As it is a matter of more difficulty than importance to us, I shall not perplex the reader with conjectures, nor attempt exactness in this respect; for we need to know the things Christ said and did, rather than the time or order of them. Matthew is supposed to regard the order of time more than Mark or Luke. John, perhaps, more than the other evangelists, observed the regular succession, in his history, and chiefly wrote things which they had omitted.—Matthew, however, seems to fix the date of this miracle immediately after the sermon, while Christ was surrounded by the multitude.—Lepers, and the laws concerning them, have been considered. (Notes, Lev. 13: 14.)—This poor leper was probably, by what he had heard of Jesus, convinced He was the promised Messiah; and, believing that He could heal him, hoped He would. Hence his reverential application on, and its immediate answer. Holy men and holy angels declined such worship as not their due; (Marg. Ref. c.) but Christ intimated no disapprobation of any who rendered it Him. On the contrary, He approved, expressing decisively that He was conscious of having undeniable right to divine honor.—From the charge of secrecy, it is probable Jesus took the man aside from the multitude to cleanse him. He would avoid ostentation in his miracles; or, perhaps, would not exasperate his enemies, and hasten too early their designs against his life. Witzgen, quoted by Whitty, says, on the Savior's expres-

CHAP. VIII. V. 1-4.—Though Christ was a lawgiver so strict, and so faithful a re-prover, the people diligently attended on Him. Note, Those to whom Christ has manifested Himself, cannot but desire a better acquaintance with Him. Those who know much of Christ, should covet to know more. It is pleasing to see people so well affected to the best things as thus to follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth. Now was Jacob's prophecy fulfilled, unto Him shall the gathering of the people be; yet they who gathered to Him did not cleave closely to Him. He had but few constant followers.

By comparing Mark 1: 40. and Luke 5: 12. it would seem that this miracle of cleansing the leper happened some time before. But it is not at all material. This miracle is fitly recorded first. The leprosy was looked upon, among the Jews, as a particular mark of God's displeasure; hence we find Miriam, Gehazi, and Uria smitten with leprosy for some particular sin, and thus Christ, to show that He came to turn away the wrath of God, began with the cure of a leper. As it was supposed that God alone caused this disease, so was it supposed that He alone could take it away; its cure was not attempted by physicians, but it was submitted to the inspection of the priests, the Lord's ministers, who waited to see what God would do. And its being in a garment, or in the walls of a house, was altogether supernatural; seeming to be a disease very different from what we call the leprosy. The king of Israel said, Am I God that I am sent to recover a man of a leprosy? 2 Kings, 5: 7. Christ proved Himself to be God, by recovering many from the leprosy, and by authorizing his disciples, in his name, to do so too, ch. 10: 8. and it is put among the proofs of his being the Messiah, ch. 11: 5. He also showed Himself to be the Savior of his people from their sins. The leprosy was specially the fruit of sin, and a figure of a disorder in the soul; for it contracted such a pollution, and obliged to such a separation, as no other disorder did. In the laws, (Lev. 13: and 14:) it is treated not as a sickness, but as a pollution; the priest was to pronounce the party clean or unclean, according to the indications; but the honor of making the lepers clean, was reserved leprosy of the soul; it shuts us out from communion with God; to which that we may be restored, it is necessary that we be cleansed from this leprosy, and this ought to be our great concern. Observe, It is our comfort when we apply ourselves to Christ, as the great Physician, that if He will, He can make us clean; and we should, with an humble boldness, go, and tell Him so. That is, we must rest on his power, must believe that Christ can make us clean, that there is no guilt so great, but He can atone for it; no corruption so strong, but his grace can subdue it. God would not appoint a physician to his hospital that is not every way qualified for the undertaking. We must commend ourselves to his pity; we cannot certain as a debt, but may humbly ask it as a favor. Lord, if Thou wilt. I throw myself at thy feet, and if I perish, I will perish there.

2. He put forth his hand and touched him. The leprosy was a loathsome disease, yet Christ touched the leper. There was a ceremonial uncleanness contracted by touching a leper; but Christ would show that when He conversed with sinners, He was in no danger of being infected by them, for the price of this world had nothing in Him. If we touch pitch, we are defiled; but Christ was separate from sinners, even when He lived among them.

I will, be thou clean. He did not say, as Elisha to Naaman, 'Go wash in Jordan,' nor put him on a tedious course of physic; but spake the word, and healed him. Here is a word of kindness, I will; I am as willing to help thee, as thou art to be helped. Those who apply to Christ by faith, may be sure that He is ready to give them freely the help they need. Christ is a physician that does not need to be urged, but while we are speaking He hears. Nor needs He to be fed; He heals not for price or reward. Be thou clean. Authority and energy are exerted in this word; 'Be willing to be clean, and use the means; cleanse thyself from all filthiness.' But with this goes a word of command concerning us, I will that thou be clean. The Almighty grace that thus speaks, shall not be wanting to those who truly desire it.

3. Immediately his leprosy was cleansed. Nature works gradually, but the God of nature immediately; and yet He works effectually; He commands and it stands fast. One of the first miracles Moses wrought, was to cure himself of leprosy, (Exod. 4: 7.) for the priests offered sacrifice first for their own sin; but one of Christ's first miracles was curing another of leprosy; for He had no sin to atone for.

4. See thou tell no man. 'Tell no man till thou hast showed thyself to the priest, and hast leaved proof that thou wast a leper, and art now thoroughly cleansed.' Christ would have his miracles appear in their full evidence, and not be published till they could so appear. Note, Those who preach truths should be able to prove them, to defend what they say, and convince gainsay-

ers. 'I will,' &c. 'Here shines the divine power of Christ; that He could do so great things only by his command.' So also Moses writes 'that the world was created by God, saying "Let there be light; and there was light." And Beza remarks that 'Christ, in healing the leprosy with the touching of his hand, sheweth that He abhorreth no sinners who come to Him, be they never so unclean.' Scott. Although Mr. Henry, as appears above, was led to question the identity of the ancient and modern leprosy, yet the account given by Jarrin, and inserted in the valuable American edition of Calmet, is so terrific and distressing, that we can hardly doubt they are the same. Bp. Porteus remarks, 'The leprosy is a disorder of the most malignant and disgusting nature. It was once common in Europe. Such as had it were called Lazars, and separated from all human society, (the disease being highly contagious,) being confined in hospitals called lazarettos, of which it is said there were in Europe at one time no less than nine thousand. For two hundred years it has almost vanished from European countries, and an instance is now seldom met. In the East it extends to a certain degree; and there had its origin, raging violently a great length of time.' How medical gentlemen regard the following observations of Dr. A. Clarke, whose attention to nosology was considerable, the editor is not fully aware, but transfers them into these notes as an incitement to inquiry. 'Probably,' he remarks, 'on account of its tendency to produce this disorder in that warm climate, I forbade the use of swine's flesh to the Jews.' 'The use of this bad animal,' he adds, 'in union with ardent spirits, is, in all likelihood, the grand cause of the scurvy, which is so common in the British nations, and which would probably assume the form and virulence of a leprosy, were the climate hot as that of Judea. See notes Ex. 16 and Lev. 13: and 14. For and sometimes where grace quor. This soldier, who was good, was very good. Though a Roman, and his very dwelling among the Jews a badge of their subjection to the Roman yoke; yet Christ, who was King of the Jews, favored him: teaching us to do good to our enemies, and not needlessly to interest ourselves in national enities. It is true, Christ went not to any Gentile towns; the land of Canaan being Immanuel's land; Isa. 8: 8. yet he received addresses from the Gentiles. Now good old Simeon's word began to be fulfilled, that He should be a light to lighten the Gentiles, as well as the glory of his people Israel. The leper Christ touched, and cured, for He preached personally to the Jews, but the paralytic Gentiles, He cured at a distance: for He did not go in person to them, but sent his word and healed them. The centurion's servant was the potent, and herein it appears that Christ had no respect for persons. For, in Christ Jesus, there is neither circumcision nor uncircumcision, bond nor free.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-4. The diseases of our bodies, which entered by sin and end in death, are emblems of those, which infect our souls, and issue in final misery, unless cured by the heavenly Physician. Other help is unavailing. Sick men willingly incur expense, and use means for deliverance, while but few know their misery as sinners, or take pains to be cured.—Were the Savior to return, and renew his miracles, He would find multitudes asking relief from their pains; but He is always present, ready to save us from sin; yet few come to Him for it, though his benefits are 'without money or price.' And all are healed, who wait on Him. Those are blessed afflictions, which bring us to know Christ, and to seek salvation from Him. If we see, that we are polluted with spiritual leprosy, and are humbled on that account, we need not fear disappointment in seeking to Christ to cleanse us, however inveterate our maladies. He did not take our nature on purpose to cleanse leprous

Christ took upon Him the form of a servant, to show his regard to the meanest.

Observe first, the grace of the centurion working towards Christ. Can any good thing come out of a Roman soldier, or any thing laudable? Come and see; and you will find abundance of good in this centurion. Observe his affectionate address to Christ, as able and willing to relieve him; beseeching Him, not as Naaman the Syrian came to Elisha, demanding a cure, but as an humble suitor. By this it seems he saw more in Christ than appeared at first view; though, to those who looked no further, his visage was marred more than any man's. The officers of the army, being controllers of the town, made, no doubt, a great figure; yet the centurion comes beseeching Him. Note, The greatest men must turn beggars when they have to do with Christ. The centurion owns Christ's sovereignty, in calling Him Lord, referring the case to Him. He knew he had to do with a most wise and gracious Physician, to whom the opening of the malady was equivalent to the most earnest request. Pour out thy complaint, and mercy shall be poured out.

We read of many that came to Christ for their children, but this is the only instance of any one's coming to Christ for a servant. Note, It is the duty of masters to concern themselves for their servants, when they are in affliction. The palsy made the servant troublesome as any distemper could, yet did not his master turn him away when sick, as that Amalekite did his servant, 1 Sam. 30: 13. nor send him to his friends, nor let him lie by neglected, but he sought out the best relief. The servant could not have done more for the master, than the master did for the servant. The centurion's servants were very dutiful to him, and we here see the reason. He was very kind to them, hence were they the more cheerfully obedient to him. As we must not despise the cause of our servants when they contend with us, (Job 31: 13, 15.) so we must not despise their case when God contends with them; for we are made in the same mould, and stand on the same level with them before God, and must not set them with the dogs of our flock. The centurion applies, not to witches or wizards, but to Christ. The palsy commonly mocks the physician's skill. It was therefore great evidence of his faith in Christ, to come to Him for a cure. How pathetically he represents the case:—sick of the palsy, which commonly makes the patient senseless; but this bodies, but leprous souls: we need not say, 'if Thou wilt,' for we may rely on his willingness. Let us, then, confess how vile we are, and adore his power and grace. In due time He will say, 'be thou cleansed,' and the effect will be as certain as when He said, 'Let there be light.' Now should we conceal our obligations to his cleansing power, but proclaim them to his glory, that others may hear and apply for cure. We should also copy his humility, and learn to do good to the wretched without ostentation.—But if men would honor their Benefactor, let them attend on the ordinances of God. When, in the judgment of faithful ministers, they are cleansed from sin, they should, at the Lord's table, offer a sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving, and join themselves to his people. This will be a testimony for the instruction of their neighbors, and the edification and encouragement of the ministers of Christ.

SCOTT.

Verses 5-7.

A centurion was the captain of a hundred men in the Roman legions. These were not composed of the lowest of the people, but reputable citizens; and so a centurion was higher in rank than a captain in our armies. It is probable, that he was of good family and fortune. He was a soldier, and educated a heathen. His countrymen exceedingly despised the Jews and their religion. Yet, his lot being cast in Judea, his prejudices had been overruled, he had learned the Scriptures, and was a spiritual worshiper of God, though not a proselyte to the Mosaic law. He esteemed and loved the people of God, and by good conduct had overcome his prejudices against him as a Gentile, and an officer of the army which had subjected their nation. His tenderness for his languishing servant should be considered as the effect of his religion. This palsy had won some of his domestics to the worship of God. He had probably heard of the miracles and doctrine of Christ, and perhaps of a similar miracle on the nobleman's son: (Notes, John 4: 46-51.) He had formed exalted ideas of his excellency as the promised Messiah; so that when his servant was seized with a palsy, disabled from business, and filled with pain, the centurion hoped for a cure by him, and applied to Jesus for that purpose.—We learn from Luke, that he did not go in person, at least at the first, but humbly sent elders of the Jews, and then his friends: some suppose, he at last went himself. Nothing is more common than for men to be described as doing the things, which are done at their instance. Palsy is a disease not mentioned in the Old Testament. SCOTT. Fritzsche maintains that this centurion was not of the Roman army, (because at that time the Romans had no forces in Galilee,) but belonged to the troops maintained by Herod Antipas, who, although a Jew, yet, according to Josephus, had Gentiles in his army. He cites Webster, who alleges Mark 6: 21. as proving the sway of Herod in Galilee. But Dr. Willoughby, quoted by Hewlett, asserts that the 'Romans' had soldiers stationed in the principal cities of Judea, as well as in other parts of their empire, in order to keep those whom they had subjected from making any attempt to recover their liberties.' This, indeed, might not necessarily have affected Galilee, but Grotius, from whom the remark is made, specially mentions Capernaum. Dr. Hales, likewise, simply styles the officer, 'the Roman centurion stationed at Capernaum.' The matter is of little moment, for it may well be granted that Herod, in his military arrangements and designations, conformed not inexactly to the Roman standard.

Ed.

8 The centurion answered and said, Lord, I am not worthy that thou shouldst come under my roof: but speak the word only, and my servant shall be healed.

9 For I am a man under authority, having soldiers under me: and I say to this man, 'Go, and he goeth; and to another, Come, and he cometh; and to my servant, 'Do this, and he doeth it.

10 When Jesus heard it, He marvelled, and said to them that followed him, person was grievously tormented. Being young, nature was strong to struggle with the disease. We should thus concern ourselves for the souls of our children and servants, spiritually sick of palsy,—a dead-palsy,—a dumb-palsy; and bring them to Christ by faith and prayer.

Observe the centurion's great humility. After Christ had intimated his readiness to heal the servant, he expressed more humbleness. Note, Humble souls are made more humble by Christ's gracious condescensions to them. Lord, I am not worthy that thou shouldst come under my roof. He does not say, 'My servant is not worthy that thou shouldst come into his chamber, because it is in the garret,' but I am not worthy that thou shouldst come into my house. Note, Humility very well becomes persons of quality. Christ now made but a mean figure in the world, yet the centurion looked upon Him as more than a prophet. Note, We should have a value for what we see of God in others, who, in outward condition, are our inferiors. In all our approaches to Christ, and to God through Christ, we must come as mean creatures, and vile sinners, to do any thing for God, or to receive any thing from Him.

Note his great faith. The more humility, the more faith. The more diffident we are of ourselves, the stronger will be our confidence in Christ. He believed that Christ could cure his servant at a distance. There needed not any physical contact, as in natural operations, nor any application to the part affected, but he wrought without bringing the physician and patient together. We afterwards read of those who brought the man sick of the palsy to Christ, though with great difficulty, and Christ commended their faith for a working faith. This centurion did not bring his man sick of the palsy, and Christ commended his faith for a trusting faith. Christ puts the best construction on the different methods of religion that people take. The power of Christ knows no limits, and therefore nearness and distance are alike to Him. He fills all places. Am I a God at hand, saith the Lord, and not a God afar off? Jer. 23: 23.

Speak the word only, not send medicine, much less a charm, and my servant shall be healed. He thus owns Him to have a command over all the powers of nature, as at first He raised that kingdom by an almighty word, when He said, Let there be light. With men, saying and doing are two things; but not so with Christ, who is therefore the Arm of the Lord because He is the Eternal Word. His saying, Be ye warmed and filled, (Jam. 2: 16.) and healed, warmed, and fills and heats.

The centurion illustrates his faith by his own authority over his servants. They were all at his beck; his word at a distance was a law to them. Well disciplined soldiers know that the commands of their officers are to be obeyed. Thus could Christ speak, and it is done; such a power had He over all diseases. Though the centurion was a man under authority, not absolutely a commander-in-chief; much more had Christ this power, who is God over all. The centurion's servants were very obsequious, would come and go instantly. Such servants we should all be to God: come and go at his bidding, by his word and providence; run where He sends us, and return when He remands us. What saith my Lord unto his servant? When his will crosses ours, his must be done. Such servants bodily diseases are to Christ. They seize us when He sends them; they leave us when He calls them back. It is a matter of comfort to Christians, that every disease has Christ's commission, and is made to serve the intentions of his grace. They need not fear sickness, who see it in the hands of such a Friend.

2. To the gracious, Christ shows Himself gracious. The centurion did but tell Him his servant's case, when Christ anticipated his request. I will come and heal him; not I will come and see him. That would have been kind, but will heal him. This shows Him an almighty Savior. It was a great word, but no more than He could make good. For He has healing under his wings. Those who wrought miracles by a derived power, did not speak thus freely. When a minister is sent for to a sick friend, he can but say, 'I will come and pray for him;' but Christ says, I will come and heal him. The centurion desired He would heal him; He says, I will come, and heal him; thus expressing more favor than he asked. Note, Christ often outdoes the expectations of poor supplicants. See an instance of Christ's humility, that He would make a visit to a poor soldier. He would not go to see a nobleman's sick child, who insisted on his coming down (John 4: 47—49.) but He proffers to go and see a sick servant; thus does He regard the low estate of his people, and give more abundant honor to the part which lacked. Note, Christ's gracious condescensions to us should make us the more humble before Him.

He commends his faith, and takes occasion to speak a word for the poor Gentiles. See what great things, even of public concern, a strong faith can obtain from Christ! He not only approved the centurion, but applauded him; that honor great believers have, as Job; there is none like him in the earth. Christ admired him, not for his greatness, but for his grace. He marvelled, not as if surprised; He knew the centurion's faith, for He wrought it; but it was great, excellent and rare. Christ spoke of it thus, to teach us what to admire; not worldly pomps, but the ornaments which, in the sight of God, are of great price. Note, The wonders of grace should affect us more than the wonders of nature or providence. Of those that are rich in faith, not of those that are rich in gold and silver, we should say that they have gotten all this glory, Gen. 31: 1. But, whatever is admirable in the faith of any, it must redound to the glory of Christ, who will shortly be admired in all them that believe, as having done in and for them marvellous things. He applauded the centurion in what He said to them that followed. All believers shall be, in the other world, but some believers are, in this world, acknowledged by Christ before men, in his eminent appearances for them, and with them. Verily, I have not found so great faith, no not in Israel. This speaks honor to the centurion, who, though not a son of Abraham, was an heir of Abraham's faith. Note, The thing that Christ seeks is faith, and wherever it is, He finds it, though but as a grain of mustard seed. He had not found so great faith, all things considered, and in proportion to the means; as the poor widow cast in more than they all, Luke 21: 3. Though the centurion was a Gentile, yet he was thus commended. Note, We must be forward to give those their due praise, who are not within our denomination or pale. Again, it speaks shame to Israel, to whom pertained the adoption, the glory, the covenants, and all the assistances of faith. Note, When the Son of Man comes, He finds little faith, and, therefore, so little fruit. Note, The attainments of some, who have not but little helps for their souls, will aggravate the ruin and sin of many, who have had great means of grace, and made no good improvement of them. Christ said this to those that followed

Verses 8, 9.

The centurion, surprised perhaps at Christ's condescension and ready attention to his request, and conscious of his own sinfulness, regarded himself as unworthy of a visit from a person so holy—and his house (the abode of a Gentile) an improper place for Christ to enter.—When we remember, that our Lord appeared like a poor Jew, and had not 'where to lay his head,' and that this man was one of the victorious Romans, to whom the Jews were subject, and lived in affluence; we shall see, that his reverence for Christ was extraordinary.—He added, that it was unnecessary for Jesus to degrade Himself by coming, as He could cure the disease by a word spoken at a distance; and illustrated his meaning by the fact, that he, a Roman officer, accomplished what he desired by ordering his soldiers, who readily obeyed his commands. We can hardly conceive of higher confidence, than this in the power and authority of the 'Son of God.' If, subject to the control of another, as Woltzen, quoted by Whitby, paraphrases, 'I have such power over my servants, that they do whatever I say; much more shall all things be done at thy command, who art subject to the power of none! How can we deny Him to be God, in whom shaltest forth the power which God exerted in creating the world, and at whose word all things must be done, and who is subject to the power of none.' Scott. 'Being a Gentile, the centurion thought it too great a favor, that Christ should visit him in person; the Jews not holding it lawful to keep company with, or go in unto even those who were at most proselytes of the gate, as appears to have been his standing. See Acts 10: 28, and 11: 3. The Jews called such persons, half-converts; they are named devout men in Acts 15: 5. 10: 2. &c.' Ep. Pearce. 'Pagans who embraced Judaism are mentioned in the New Testament as "proselytes," and of two kinds, either wholly, or in part such. The former, or proselytes of the covenant, (or righteousness, says JAHN,) were circumcised, and obliged to keep the whole law: the latter were called proselytes of the gate, as having a dwelling in the cities (or gate-) of Israel, and were not compelled to observe the ceremonial law, but to renounce idolatry, and keep certain general precepts.'

Verses 10—12.

'Christ, by setting before them the uncircumcised centurion, of excellent faith, exciteth the Jews to emulation, and warneth them of being cast off, and of the calling of the Gentiles.' Beza.—Our Lord might have commended many things in the centurion's character, but He especially expressed his approbation of his faith, as surpassing, considering the disadvantages under which, as a Gentile, he had labored. Thus He instructed the people, that He best approved of those, who formed exalted apprehensions of Him, and that they could not honour Him more than was right. He said, He had not found such faith in Israel, where it might have been expected; not even among his disciples. Hence He declared, that many Gentiles, from distant parts of the earth, would, by faith in Him, become heirs with the patriarchs of the heavenlowed, Verily, I say unto you, 'I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel.

11 And I say unto you, 'That many shall come from the east and west, and shall sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of heaven.

12 But 'the children of the kingdom shall be cast out into outer darkness: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.

13 And Jesus said unto the centurion, 'Go thy way; and as thou hast believed, so be it done unto thee. And his servant was healed in the self-same hour.

V. 5.—13. True piety is connected with humility. The more we know of God, his law and truth, and the more we examine ourselves according to this rule, the deeper will be our abasement, and the more unreservedly shall we 'sit in the lowest place,' and subscribe even the degrading opinions, which others, by prejudice or mistake, have formed of us. But if we thus 'know the grace of Christ,' we shall not be discouraged; for we shall see that He is ready to help the most unworthy. He is 'the same yesterday, to-day, and forever.' He is ready to hear our petitions; and though unworthy that He should come under our roof, or dwell in our hearts, yet, at our desire, He will come and bring salvation. At his word, the strongest evil tendencies are subdued, as palsies and fevers of old; and then, strength, liberty, victory, peace and holiness succeed.

felicity, to which they had attained; while the Jews, who had long enjoyed the privileges of 'the kingdom;' to whom the Gospel was first to be preached; and who supposed themselves solely entitled to the blessings of the Messiah's reign, would be excluded from the church, and left in a wretched condition. Numbers of them would be consigned to final despair, where they would weep, and gnash their teeth in anguish, at the happiness lost, and the ruin incurred, by their unbelief. The future state must exclusively be meant. 'It cannot be said,' observes Doddridge, 'either that the patriarchs share with Christians in the present privileges of the Gospel on earth; or that the Jews weep and wail, on account of being excluded from them.' Scott. 'In this centurion, we have an illustrious example of the eminent Christian virtues, humanity, piety, generosity, humility, and faith. His humanity appears more strikingly, because in general the treatment servants experienced from their Roman masters was very different indeed. Being mostly slaves, extreme rigor and cruelty were used toward them. They were strained in labor beyond their strength, confined to dungeons, chained, scourged, tortured without reason, died in sickness and old age, and put to death on slight suspicions, or for trivial faults. Barbarity of this kind, which shows the danger of trusting absolute power to such a creature as man, is a striking contrast to the conduct of the centurion. His piety and generosity appear, (Luke 7:5.) in his building for the Jewish people a place of worship at his own expense. Let this be compared with the history of Verres, in his government of Sicily, which is but a specimen of the Roman management, and we see a gallant soldier, in the midst of the brutality and insolence of power, stand up to patronize and assist a distressed, injured people. His humility, a virtue with which the ancients, and more particularly the Romans, were unacquainted, yet in which, more perhaps than in any other, consists the vital principle of the Christian temper, is evident from the manner of his soliciting our Savior. How cautious, how modest, how careful of offending! Of his faith our Lord Himself pronounced his

Him, if by any means He might provoke them to a holy emulation, as Paul speaks, Rom. 11:14. They were Abraham's seed, jealous for their honor; let them not be outstripped by a Gentile, especially in that grace for which Abraham was eminent.

Christ takes occasion to say, that a great many of the Gentiles should be saved. The faith of the centurion was but a specimen of the conversion of the Gentiles. Christ often speaks upon this topic and with assurance; 'I say unto you, I, who know all men;' and He could not say any thing more pleasing to Himself, or more displeasing to the Jews. An intimation of this kind enraged the Nazarenes, Luke 4:27. Christ here gives us an idea of the persons that shall be saved; many from the east and the west. He had said, (ch. 7:14.) Few there be that find the way to life; and yet here, many shall come. Few at one time, and in one place, yet, all together, a great many. We shall shortly see the Captain of our salvation bringing many sons unto glory, Heb. 2:10. He will come with ten thousands of his saints, (Jude, 14.) with such a company as no man can number, (Rev. 17:9.) with nations of them that are saved, Rev. 21:24. They shall come from the east and from the west; yet they shall all meet at the right hand of God, the centre of their unity. Note, God has his remnant in all places: from the rising of the sun, to the going down of the same, Mat. 1:1. The elect will be gathered from the four winds, ch. 24:31. They are sown in the earth, some scattered in every corner of the field. The Gentile world lay from east to west, and they are especially meant here; though strangers to the covenant of promise then and after, yet who knows what hidden ones God had among them? So in Elijah's time in Israel, (1 Kings, 19:14.) Soon after which, they flocked into the church in great multitudes, Isa. 60:3, 4. Note, when we come to heaven, as we shall miss a great many there that we thought had been going thither, so shall we meet many whom we did not expect. They shall come together to Christ, 2 Thess. 2:1. They shall be admitted into the kingdom of grace on earth, into the covenant made with Abraham; they shall be blessed with faithful Abraham, whose blessing comes upon the Gentiles, Gal. 3:14. This makes Zaccheus a son of Abraham, Luke 19:9. They shall be admitted into the kingdom of glory in heaven. They shall come cheerfully, flying as doves to their windows. They shall sit down to rest from their labor. Sitting denotes continuance. Heaven is a remaining rest, it is a continuing city. They shall sit down, as on a throne, Rev. 3:21.) as at a table, that is the metaphor here. They shall sit down to be feasted, which denotes both fullness of communication, and freedom of communion, Luke 22:30. With Abraham. They who, in this world, were ever so far distant from each other, in time, place, or outward condition, shall all meet together in heaven, ancients and moderns, Jews and Gentiles, rich and poor. The rich man in hell sees Abraham, but Lazarus sits down with him, leaning on his breast. Note, Holy society is a part of the happiness of heaven. They on whom the ends of the world are come, and who are most obscure, shall share in glory with renowned patriarchs.

The children of the kingdom shall be cast out. The Jews, who persist in unbelief, though they were, by birth, children of the kingdom, yet shall be cut off from being members of the visible church. The kingdom of God shall be taken from them, and they shall become, not a people, not obtaining mercy, Rom. 9:31, 11:20. In the great day, it will not avail men to have been children of the kingdom; for men will be judged not by what they were called, but by what they were. If children, indeed, then heirs. But many are children in profession, who will come short of the inheritance. To be born of professing parents may denominate us children of the kingdom; yet, if this be all our claim on heaven, we shall be cast out.

They shall be cast into outer darkness, the darkness of those that are without. Into the darkness of the Gentiles were the Jews cast, and into worse. They were blinded and hardened, and filled with terrors, Rom. 11:8—10. A peo-

PRactical OBSERVATIONS.

The more we honor his power and grace, the clearer will our tokens be of his approbation; and the answer of prayer will bear some proportion to the degree of our faith.—What cause have we, in these distant regions, to rejoice, that by the Gospel we are invited to enter into his family, and ere long 'sit down with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob in heaven!' Let us also remember, that we now are 'the children of the kingdom,' and be warned by the example of the wretched Jews. Let us fear lest any of us fall from our height of privilege, through unbelief, and be cast into outer darkness, where there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth; while the Lord shall replenish his church by the conversion of the heathen, or of the most abject sinners in our land.

SCOTT.

high estimate; because, being bred up in heathenism, he yet frankly submitted himself to sufficient evidence. This is the disposition we ought more particularly to cultivate—a freedom from self-sufficiency, pride and prejudice, a simplicity of heart open to conviction, which receives, without resistance, the sacred impressions of truth. Want of this makes infidels now as it did at first. Operating variously, it induces to fraud and collusion the miracles which Jews ascribed to Beelzebub, and rejects all human testimony, as it formerly did the very perceptions of sense.' Bp. PORTERUS. 'The kingdom of God is here and elsewhere represented as a nuptial feast, or banquet, at which the guests sit down, [or rather, recline, the recumbent posture, used in the East at meals, being alluded to in the original,] with the master of the feast. These banquets were commonly at night, and continued long. See Luke 14:16. Matt. 25:6. Hence, the house of reception was filled with various lights, and those who attended the banquet had benefit of the light; while those who were shut out were in darkness. Thus the unhappy state of such, as are excluded from the kingdom of God, or from future happiness, is expressed by being cast out into outer darkness, ch. 22:13. And, as those, who were thus shut out from the marriage feast, were exposed not to shame only, but to cold and hunger, it is added, there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth. Oh, how contrary is our Lord's prediction to the vain expectation of the Jews, who were wont to say, that all Israel shall have a portion in the world to come, but heathens be fuel for hell!' WHITNEY. 'This [prediction, v. 11.] was spoken, to soften the unreasonable prejudices of the Jews, entertained against the Gentiles, and to prepare them to receive their brethren of mankind into religious fellowship with themselves, under the Christian dispensation.'

SCOTT.

14 ¶ And when Jesus was come into Peter's house, he saw his wife's mother laid, and sick of a fever.

15 And he touched her hand, and the fever left her: and she arose, and ministered unto them.

16 ¶ When the even was come, they brought unto him many that were possessed with devils: and he cast out the spirits with his word, and healed all that were sick:

17 That it might be fulfilled which was spoken by Esaias the prophet, saying, 'Himself took our infirmities, and bare our sicknesses.'

18 ¶ Now when Jesus saw great multiple so unchurched, are in utter darkness already, but it looks further, to the state of damned sinners in hell, to which the other is a dismal preface. They shall be cast out from the favor of God. In hell is fire, but not light; it is utter darkness; darkness in extremity, the highest degree of darkness, without any remainder, or mixture, or hope of light; it is darkness that results from their being shut out of heaven. Yet this is not the worst. There shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth. There will be great grief, floods of tears shed to no purpose; anguish of spirit, preying eternally on the vitals, in the sense of the wrath of God, is the torment of the damned. Great indignation; damned sinners will gnash their teeth for spite and vexation, full of the fury of the Lord; seeing with envy the happiness of others, and reflecting with horror on the former possibility of their being happy themselves, which is now past.

Our Lord cures the servant. As thou hast believed, so be it done unto thee. The servant got a cure, but the master a confirmation of his faith. Note, Christ often gives encouraging answers to his praying people, when they are interceding for others. It is a kindness to us to be heard for others. God turned the captivity of Job when he prayed for his friends, Job 42: 10. Be it done as thou believest; a great honor to the centurion. Yea, what is said to him is said to us all. Believe, and ye shall receive; only believe. See the power of Christ and the power of faith. As Christ can do what He will, so an active believer may have what he will from Christ. The oil of grace multiplies, till the vessels of faith fail.

The prayer of faith was a prevailing prayer; it ever was so, and ever will be so. The suddenness of the cure, showed that it was miraculous. Christ spake, and it was done. A learned physician says, that the diseases Christ cured were chiefly if the most obstinate and hopeless kind.

V. 14—17. Critics place this passage before the sermon on the mount, according to the order which Mark and Luke observe.

1. The case was not extraordinary, as fevers are the most common of distempers; but the person being a relative of Peter's, the case is recorded as an instance of Christ's peculiar attention to the families of his disciples. Here we find that Peter had a wife, and yet was called to be an apostle of Jesus Christ. The church of Rome, therefore, which forbids ministers to marry, goes contrary to the example of that apostle, from whom they pretend to derive infallibility. Peter had a house, though Christ had not; thus was the disciple better provided for than his Lord. It seems he had a house at Capernaum, though he was originally of Bethsaida. It is probable that he removed to Capernaum when Christ went thither, and made that his principal residence. Note, It is worth while to change our quarters, that we may be near to Christ. When the ark removes, Israel must remove. It seems he had his wife's mother with him; an example to yoke fellows, to be kind to each other's relations. Probably she was old, but was taken care of with all possible tenderness, as all the old should be. She was ill of a fever. Neither the strength of youth, nor the feebleness of age, are a defence against such diseases. The palsy was a chronic complaint, the fever an acute one; yet both were brought to Christ, and healed.

He touched her hand, not as physicians do the pulse, but to heal her. This intimated his tenderness. He is Himself touched with the feeling of our infirmities; it also shows the way of spiritual healing by the exerting of the power of Christ with his word, and the application of Christ to ourselves. The Scripture speaks the word, the Spirit gives the touch. The fever left her, she arose and ministered to them. It appears that the mercy was perfected. Those who recover from fevers, by the power of nature, are commonly feeble a great while after to show, therefore, that the cure was above the power of nature, she was able to enter at once on the business of the house. The mercy was sanctified, and so perfected; yet, though dignified by so peculiar favor, she did not assume particular importance, but was ready to wait at table. Those must be humble whom Christ has honored. Being thus delivered, she studies what she shall render.

2. The cure of Peter's mother-in-law brought Christ many patients. 'He healed such a one, why not me? such a one's friend, why not mine?' He cast out the evil spirits with his word. There may be much of Satan's agency, by the divine permission, in those diseases for which natural causes may be assigned, as in Job's boils, especially in diseases of the mind. But about the time of Christ's coming into the world, there seems to have been more than an ordinary letting loose of the devil, to possess the bodies of people. He came having great wrath, for he knew that his time was short, and Christ wisely ordered that it should be so, that He might the better show his power over Satan, and his design in coming into the world, which was to destroy the works of Satan. His success was as glorious as his design was gracious. He healed all that were sick, without exception; though the person were ever so mean, or the case ever so bad.

The accomplishment of the Old Testament prophecies was the thing Christ had in his eye, and the great proof of his being the Messiah. Among other predictions, it was written of Him, (Isa. 53: 4.) Surely He hath borne our griefs and carried our sorrows. It is referred to 1 Pet. 2: 24; and is there construed, He hath borne our sins. Here it is construed, He hath borne our sicknesses. Our sins make our sicknesses. Christ bore away sin by the merit of his death, and sickness by the merit of his life; nay, though those miracles have ceased, we may say, that He bore our sins then, when He bore our sicknesses on the tree; for sin is the cause and the sting of sickness. We have many diseases and calamities, and there is more in this one line to support us under them, than in all the writings of philosophers—that Jesus Christ bore our sicknesses, and carried our sorrows. Though He was never sick, yet He was hungry, thirsty, and weary, troubled in spirit, sorrowful, and very heavy. He bore them for us in his sufferings, and in compassion bears them with us, being touched with the feeling of our infirmities; and thus He bears them off from us, and makes them sit light, except by our own fault. Observe how emphatically it is expressed. Himself took our infirmities, and bare our sicknesses. He was both able to bear with our infirmities, and deal with our sicknesses as our Physician. That part of the calamity of human nature was his particular care, and He is no less powerful, no less tender now; for we are sure that never were any the worse for going to heaven.

Verses 14, 15.

This miracle was wrought on the Sabbath, after the return from the synagogue. (Mark 1: 29—31. Luke 4: 38, 39.) It seems, that Peter and Andrew had a house at Capernaum; that Peter's wife's mother was there; and Christ lodged in the house, when in that city. She had been seized with a fever, which confined her to the bed. But Jesus rebuked the fever. (as a servant, going beyond orders), and it immediately left her. Thus without delay, she rose and waited upon them. This is wholly different from the ordinary way of recovering from violent fevers; for extreme debility succeeds the proxyen of the disease. Scott. "Learn hence," says Theophylact, "that marriage is no hindrance to virtue, since the chief of the apostles had a wife." Marriage was one of the first of Divine institutions, and a positive command of God, who declared the state of celibacy not good, Gen. 2: 18. Those who pretend that the single state is more holy than the other, slander their Maker, and say in effect, "we are too holy to keep the commands of God." Dr. A. CLARKE. Basil and Ambrose, as quoted by Dr. Whitby, mention others of the apostles, who were married men; and the latter father asserts that they all were, 'excepting John and Paul.' An interesting account is given from Eusebius by Gibbon, the historian, of the appearance of two grandsons of Jude, the brother of James, before a Roman tribunal, during the reign of Domitian.

Verses 16, 17.

(Marg. Ref.) The Jews began their Sabbath at sunset, and ended again at the same time the next day. The people were restrained by regard for the Sabbath from bringing the sick and demoniacs, but the miracles which Christ had done, being known, may have led them in the evening to throng to him; and Jesus did not complain of weariness, or of the unseasonableness of the hour, but restored all demoniacs to the use of their faculties, and healed all the other sick persons. Thus the prophecy of Isaiah was fulfilled, (Isa. 53: 4—6) though the prophet more directly predicted in this passage the sufferings of Christ on the cross for our sins. Scott. 'Our Lord's sympathy with the distressed was a part of his suffering; and his removal of diseases was the fruit of his bearing our sins, and the punishment of them.' Brown.

Verses 18—20.

When multitudes were gathered to Jesus, and He might have been expected to instruct them, He either perceived, that He had taught them as much as they could receive and digest at that time, or intended to try their sincerity, and to procure leisure for relaxation. He gave orders therefore to his disciples to cross the sea of Tiberias. Here an interpreter of the law and traditions, (Marg. Ref.) a scribe, came and offered to be his follower. He seems to have regarded Jesus as the Messiah, admired his discourses, and having a confused idea of his dignity, probably built his hopes of preferment on joining Him at an early period; expecting Christ to accede to his proposal, seeing his followers were untried fishermen, or of low rank. But our Lord saw his carnal motives, knew that he had not counted the cost, and discouraged his proposal by intimating, that it would not answer his expectations; for though the beasts and birds had an abode, yet He, 'the Son of man, in tudes about him, he gave commandment to depart unto the other side

goest; not only to the other side of the country, but if it were to the utmost regions of the earth. Now we should think ourselves sure of such a man as this; and yet it appears by Christ's answer, that his resolution was rash, his ends carnal. Either he did not consider at all, or not that which was to be considered. Note, There are many resolutions for religion, produced by some sudden pangs of conviction, that come to nothing: soon ripe, soon rotten.

Christ informed him, that this Son of man, whom he is so anxious to serve, has not where to lay his head. Observe, how strange it is in itself, that the Son of God, when He came into the world, should put Himself into to such a very low condition, as to want the convenience of a certain

V. 18-22. 1. The influences of this Sun of Righteousness were not to be confined to one place, but diffused all the country over. The necessities of souls called to Him, Come over, and help us, Acts 16: 9. He removed when He saw great multitudes about Him. He knew there were others as desirous to have Him with them, and they must have their share. His being acceptable and useful in one place, was no objection against, but a reason for, his going to another. Thus He would try the multitudes that were about Him, whether they would follow Him when his preaching was at some distance. Many will not be at the pains to go the other side; and thus Christ shook off those who were less zealous, and the perfect were made manifest.

2. Here is an account of two persons who desired to come into communion, and yet were not right, given here as a specimen of the hindrances by which many are kept from closing with Christ, and cleaving to Him, and a warning to us, so to set out in following Christ, that we may not come short; to lay such a foundation, that our building may stand.

Here was one too hasty in promising, and he was a certain scribe, a learned man, one of those that expounded the law. We generally find them in the gospels to be men of no good character, usually coupled with the Pharisees, as enemies to Christ. Where is the scribe? 1 Cor. 1: 20. He is very seldom following Christ; yet here was one who did pretty fair for discipleship, a Saul among the prophets.

Master, I will follow thee whithersoever Thou goest. I know not how any man could have spoken better. His profession seems to have been by his unbiassed inclination. He is not called to it by Christ, nor urged by any of his disciples, but, of his own accord, he professes himself to be a close follower of Christ; he is not a pressed man, but a volunteer. He does not say, I have a mind to follow thee, but I am determined, I will do it. Whithersoever Thou resting-place, which the necessities of the creatures have. If He would take our nature upon Him, one would think He should have taken it in its best estate; no, He takes it in its worst. The foxes have holes; though they are not only not useful, but hurtful to man, yet God provides holes for them. Man tries to destroy them, but they are sheltered. The birds of the air, though they take no care of themselves, yet have nests; (Ps. 104: 17.) nests in the field some of them nests in the house. In God's courts, Ps 81: 3. How poorly Christ was provided for! It may encourage us to trust God for necessities, when the birds and beasts have such good provisions. If we want necessities our Master did before us. Note, For our sakes He became poor, very poor. He had not a place of repose, not a house of his own, to put his head in; not a pillow of his own to lay his head on. He and his disciples lived on the charity of people, who ministered to Him of their substance, Luke 8: 2. Christ did this, not only to humble Himself, and fulfil the Scriptures, but to show us the vanity of worldly wealth, and that He might purchase better things for us, and so make us rich, 2 Cor. 8: 9.

When a scribe offered to come to Christ, one would think it strange that he was not encouraged. One scribe might do Christ more credit than twelve fishermen; but Christ saw his heart, and answered to the thoughts of that. The scribe's resolve seems to have been sudden, and Christ would have us, when we make a profession of religion, count the cost, (Luke 14: 28.) to do it intelligently, and with consideration, not because we know no other way, but because we know no better. It is no advantage to religion to take men by surprise. Those who take up a profession in a pang, will throw it off again in a fret; let them, therefore, take time, and they will have done the sooner. Let him that will follow Christ, know the worst of it, and expect to lie hard, and fare hard. His resolve seems to have been from a worldly principle. He saw what abundance of cures Christ wrought and concluded that He had large fees, and would get an estate quickly, and therefore he would follow Him in hopes of growing rich with Him, but Christ rectifies his mistake. Note, Christ will accept none for his followers that aim at worldly advantages in following Him, or design to make any thing but heaven of their religion. We have reason to think that this scribe, therefore, went away sorrowful, being disappointed

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 14-22. Persons detained from public ordinances by sickness, or any other real hindrance, may expect the Savior's presence in retirement, soothing their sorrows and abating their pains.—When our maladies are cured by ordinary methods, we should minister to Christ and his people, praising Him as our Healer, and dedicating ourselves to his service; and when He removes the fever of sinful passion, we shall delight to do his will. He deems no hour unreasonable, for an application to deliver us from temptation; nor should we excuse ourselves from helping others because it is late, or we fatigued, when the case is urgent.—While we rejoice in the salvation of Christ, let us remember what He endured in taking 'our infirmities' and bearing 'our sicknesses' and sins, that we may not dread the toil necessary in doing good to others.—Let us contrast the divine majesty of Christ with the external poverty to which He submitted. Was He weary, and without a place to recline his head? Was He more destitute than the 'foxes or the birds?'

and shall we try to make religion subserve our interests, and preach or profess it merely to grow rich or great? Shall we deem honor, or happiness, to be connected with affluence, or indulgence? Shall we court the wealthy, because of their wealth, or despise the poor for his poverty? Shall we seek great things for ourselves, or be uneasy with accommodations far better than those of Christ? God forbid! His disciples must not only profess a readiness to follow Him 'whithersoever He goeth'; but must be ready to go by sea and land through storms, tempests, poverty, hardship, reproach, and persecution; otherwise they will not 'endure to the end.' If He require our service, the tender affections must give place. Enough will take care of ordinary affairs, but he who is called to follow Christ, and preach his Gospel, must leave 'the dead to bury their dead; and not allow secular affairs to take him from his work.

SCOTT.

'his humiliation, had not where to lay his head,' even when wearied by labor, and needing sleep. His disciples, then, must expect to be destitute, to endure hardship, and be rewarded by spiritual good. —It is likely, that this intimation induced the scribe to abandon his design. (Note Luke 9: 57-62.) SCOTT. I will follow Thee. 'The natural man thinks himself capable of any thing; he alone who is divinely taught, knows he can do nothing but through Christ's strengthening him. Every teacher among the Jews had, of his disciples, some that followed & accompanied him wherever he went, that he might have some at hand to converse with, concerning the divine law.' —'Foxes have holes.' Reader, art thou a poor man, fearing God? Then, what comfort must thou derive from so nearly resembling the Lord Jesus? But how unlike is the rich vanity of pleasure, and slave of sin, to this heavenly pattern! —'Son of man.' A Hebrew phrase, expressive of humiliation and abasement; and on that account applied to Himself, by the meek and lowly Jesus. It seems also to be used here to point out the incarnation of the Son of God, according to the predictions of the prophets, Ps. 8: 5. Dan. 7: 13. And as our Lord was now showing forth his eternal divinity in the miracles He wrought, He seems studious to prove to them the certainty of his incarnation, because on this depended the atonement for sin. Indeed, our Lord seems more intent on giving the proofs of his humanity, than of his divinity, the latter being necessarily manifested by the miracles He was continually working.' Dr. A. CLARKE. It is observable, however, that, with the exception of the first martyr, Stephen, Acts 7: 56. [and John, Rev. 1: 13.] no one, as is said by Beausobre, uses this epithet concerning our Lord, beside Himself. 'This title,' continues that estimable writer, 'our Lord employed, to counteract the false opinions of the Jews respecting the nature of his reign, [for kingdom,] and to intimate to them, that He was to attain his glory only through humiliation and suffering.' Dr. Paley remarks, that, though the title be used sixty-one times in the gospels, it is always with the restriction of being applied by our Lord to Himself, and 'never used of Him, or towards Him, by any other person.' Ep. Verses 21, 22.

Another person, who had followed Christ as his disciple, was called constantly to attend Him, that he might be sent to preach the Gospel, but he excused himself to attend the funeral of his father, who had just died: for Christ's answer implies that this was his request, and not that 23 ¶ And when he was entered into a ship, his disciples followed him.

24 And, behold, there arose a great tempest in the sea, inasmuch that the ship was covered with the waves: but he was asleep.

25 And his disciples came to him, and awoke him, saying, Lord, save us; we perish.

in a batga'n, while he thought would turn to account; he is not following Christ, unless he can get by Him.

Here is another hat was too slow in performing. Delay in execution is as bad, on the one hand, as precipitancy of resolution on the other. This candidate for the ministry was one of Christ's disciples already; a follower of Him at large. Clement of Alexandria tells us, from an ancient tradition, it was Philip. He seems to be better disposed than the former, because not so presumptuous; a bold temper is not the most promising in religion; sometimes the last are first, and the first last. Lord, suffer me first to go and bury my father, before I come to be a follower of Thee. Let it suffice to hear Thee now and then, when I can spare time. His father was now sick, or dying, or dead, or some thing aged, and not likely to live long. He desired to attend upon him in his sickness, at his death, and to his grave, and then would follow Christ. This seemed a reasonable request, and yet it was not right. He had not the zeal necessary, and therefore pleaded this, because it seemed a plausible plea. Note, An unwilling mind never wants an excuse. Suppose it to have proceeded from a filial affection for his father, yet he ought to have given the preference to Christ. Note, Many are hindered from godliness, by an over-concern for their families; and duty to God is postponed, under color of discharging our debts to the world. Here we need to have a double guard.

Jesus said unto him, Follow Me; and no doubt power accompanied this word, and he did follow Christ and clave to Him, as Ruth to Naomi; when the scribe, like Orpah, took leave of him. That said, I will follow Thee. To this, Christ said, Follow Me. Comparing them together, it is intimated that we are brought to Christ by the force of his call to us, not of our promise to Him; it is not of him that willetth nor of him that runneth, but of God that sheweth mercy. He calls whom He will, Rom. 9: 16. Note, Though chosen vessels may make excuses, yet Christ will conquer their unwillingness. When Christ calls, He will make the call effectual, 1 Sam. 3: 10. Let the dead bury their dead. It is a proverbial saying, 'Let one dead man bury another; let the dead lie unburied, rather than the service of Christ should be neglected. Let the spiritually dead bury the corporally dead. Burying the dead, especially a father, is a good work, but not the work at this time. It may be done as well by others, not called and qualified as thou art, to preach the Gospel.' Note, Piety to God must be preferred before piety to parents, though that is a needful part of our religion. The Nazarites, under the law, were not to mourn for their own parents, because they were holy unto the Lord. Num. 6: 6-8. Nor was the high priest to defile himself for the dead, no, not for his own father, Lev. 21: 11, 12. Christ requires of those who would follow Him, that they hate father and mother, (Luke 14: 26.) love them less than God. We must comparatively neglect our nearest relatives, when they come in competition with Christ.

V. 23-27. Christ had given sailing orders to his disciples, that they should depart to the other side of the sea of Tiberias, into the country of Gadara, in the tribe of Gad, which lay east of the Jordan; thither He would go to rescue a poor creature that was possessed with a legion of devils, though He saw how He should be affronted there. He chose to cross the lake, that He might have occasion to manifest Himself the God of the sea, as well as of the dry land, and to show that all power is his, both in heaven and in earth. It is a comfort to those who go down to the sea in ships, to know that they have a Savior whom to trust, who knows what it is to be a sea, and to be in storms there. But observe, He had no yacht, or pleasure-boat, to attend Him, but made use of his disciples' fishing boats. The twelve kept close to Him, while others staid on firm land. Note, Those alone are the true disciples of Christ, who are willing to go to sea with Him, to follow Him into dangers and difficulties. Many would be content, to go the land-way to heaven, and will rather stand still, or go back, than venture on a dangerous sea; but those who would rest with Christ hereafter, must follow Him now, into a ship, or into a prison, as well as into a palace.

1. There arose a very great storm. Christ could have ordered a pleasant passage, but that would not have been so much for his glory, and the confirmation of their faith, as their deliverance was; this storm was for their sakes, John 11: 4. One would expect that, having Christ with them, they would have had a favorable gale; but it is quite otherwise. Christ would show that they who are passing with Him over the ocean of this world, must expect storms by the way. The church is tossed with tempests, (Isa. 54: 11.) Only the upper region enjoys a perpetual calm.

Christ was asleep. We never read of his sleeping but at this time. He was, n watchings often, and continued all night in prayer to God. It was not like Jonah's sleep in a storm; it was a sleep of holy serenity and dependence on God: He slept to show that He was truly man subject to the sinless infirmities of our nature. His work made Him weary; He had no guilt, or fear within, to disturb His repose. Those who can lay their heads on the pillow of a clear conscience, may sleep sweetly in a storm, (Ps. 4: 8.) as Peter, Acts 12: 6. He slept to try the faith of his disciples, whether they could trust Him when He seemed to slight them. He slept not so much with a desire to be refreshed, as with the design to be awakened.

The poor disciples, though used to the sea came to Him in a great fright. Whither else should they go? Lord, save us, we perish. They believed He could save them; they begged He would. His errand into the world was to save, but those only are saved who call on the name of the Lord, Acts 2: 21. They who, by faith, are interested in Christ's salvation, may with humble confidence apply themselves to Him for temporal deliverances. Lord, save us. Note, Christ will save none but those who are willing to take Him for their Lord; for He is a Prince and a Savior. We perish: the language of their fear. They gave up all for lost. We perish, if thou dost not save us: look on us, therefore, with pity. They pray as men in earnest, that beg for their lives; it becomes us he might say with an aged father till his death, as some explain it. But Jesus perceived reluctance to the service appointed him, which might have increased by his going to bury his father, and associating with his relations. He also would shew, that personal and relative concerns must yield to his command. Refusing the request, He ordered him to leave this care to his relatives, who were dead in sin and incapable of spiritual services. (Marg. Ref. c.) but could provide for the burial of the dead, and would attend to it. Scorr. 'The dead, in Scripture, often signify those, who are "alienated from the life of God." Here, then, Christ teaches, that when we are called by Him to the profession of the Gospel, we must not suffer that, which may be done by others unfit to be employed in spirituals, to hinder us from instant obedience.' Whitney. 'Here was a plausible reason; but this doing something else first, ruins us: and if we have an excuse for not coming to Christ now, it is to be feared we shall die with one in our mouths.'

ADAM.

Verses 23-27.

Mark and Luke relate this and what follows, in a different connection. Christ, however, having entered the ship, or fisher-boat, which the disciples provided, set sail, in company with other small vessels. (Note, Mark 4: 35-41.) Instead of a fair voyage, they were overtaken by a storm; so that the ship was covered with waves, and apparently ready to sink. But, in this distress, Jesus lay asleep. His human nature, like ours, was wearied with incessant fatigue, and he yielded to sleep, foreseeing the storm, that his power might thus be more noticed. But the disciples trembling lest they should be swallowed up, and having no resource but in his power, awoke Him, saying, 'Lord, save us, we perish!' Consider what they had seen of his power, this faith was comparatively weak, and their fears were evidences of remaining unbelief. It was impossible for the vessel, which bore Him, to sink; and in his divine nature He was as able to restrain the winds and waves, when his human nature lay asleep, as to cure the paralytic by a word spoken at a distance. Having rebuked them, as men of little faith, He, as I ord of creation, rebuked the winds and the waves; (just as a master his unruly servants;) and at his word the winds ceased, the tempestuous sea became smooth, and a calm succeeded. The disciples were astonished, and asked, 'what manner of person is this? He is more than man; for with authority He commands the winds and waves, and they obey Him.' Thus the tempest was overruled to the increase of their faith and admiration of his majesty and power. (Marg. Ref. m.) 'It being so often made the property of God,' says Whitney, 'to still the raging of the sea, it is not wonderful, that Christ's disciples should conceive a divine power to be in Him, who could perform such things.' Scorr. Lord, save us, we perish. 'One advantage of trials is, to make us know our weakness, so that we shall apply to God by faith in Christ. It is by faith alone that we may be said to approach Him; by love we are united to Him, and by prayer we awake Him. All good perishes in us without Christ: without his grace we are in momentary danger of utter ruin. How proper, then, is this short prayer for us, and how familiar should it be to us! Taken in an extensive sense, it is exceedingly expressive; comprehending the power of our Lord's might, the merit of his atonement, and the depth of our misery and danger.' Dr. A. Clarke. 'The inland sea, or lake, which is called indifferently the sea of Tiberias, Galilee, Gennesareth or Chinnereth, from cities or territories on its shores,' lies, says Mr. Buckingham, 'in a deep basin, surrounded on all sides with lofty hills, excepting only the narrow entrance and outlet of the Jordan at each extreme.' It is in length about seventeen, in breadth nearly six miles, and 'affords,' says Dr. E. D. Clarke, 'one of the most striking prospects in the Holy Land.' He adds, 'The river Jordan maintains its course through the middle of the lake, causing a strong current; and when this is opposed by contrary winds, which blow here with the force of a hurricane from the south-east, sweeping from the mountains into the lake, it may be conceived that a boisterous sea is instantly raised: thus the small vessels of this country are ill qualified to resist.' Ed.

20 And he said unto them, 'Why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith? Then he arose, and rebuked the winds and the sea, and there was a great calm.

27 But the men marvelled, saying, What manner of man is this, that even the winds and the sea obey him? [Practical Observations.]

28 ¶ And when he was come to the other side, into the country of the ⁹Gergesenes, there met him two possessed with devils, coming out of the tombs, exceeding fierce, so that no man might pass by that way.

happiness of those who have Him on their side. There was a great calm. Ordinarily, after a storm, there is such a fret of the waters, that it is long ere they can settle; but if Christ speak the word, not only the storm ceases, but all the remains of it. Great storms of doubt sometimes end in a wonderful calm, created by the spirit of adoption.

The men marvelled. Though long acquainted with the sea, they never before saw a storm so immediately turned into a calm. It has all the marks of a miracle on it. It is the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in their eyes. What manner of man is this? Note, Christ is a Nonesuch; every thing in Him is admirable; none so mighty, none so amiable. Even the winds and seas obey Him. Others pretend to cure diseases, but He only undertook to command the winds. We know not the way of the wind, John 3:8, but He that bringeth forth the wind out of his treasury, (Ps. 135: 7.) when thus to wrestle in prayer. Christ slept that He might draw out this importunity.

2. The Lord Jesus awakened, as one refreshed, Ps. 78: 15. Christ may sleep when his church is in a storm, but He will not outsleep Himself. The set time to favor his distressed church will come. Ps. 102: 13. Why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith? He does not chide them for disturbing Him with their prayers, but for disturbing themselves with their fears. Christ reproved them first, and then delivered them. He prepares us for mercy, and then gives it to us. Why are ye, my disciples, fearful? Let the sinners in Zion be afraid; let heathen mariners tremble in a storm, but ye shall not be so. O ye of little faith. Many that have true faith, are weak in it. Note, Christ's disciples are apt to be disquieted with fears in a stormy day, to torment themselves with jealousies that things are bad with them, and dismal conclusions that they will be worse. Inordinate fears in a stormy day are owing to the weakness of our faith, which should be as an anchor to the soul, and ply the oar of prayer. By faith, we might see through the storm to the quiet shore. Their fearfulness is very displeasing to the Lord Jesus, for it reflects dishonor on Him, and creates disturbance to themselves. He rebuked the wind. The former He did as the God of grace, who can do what He pleases in us: this He did as the Sovereign of nature, who can do what he pleases for us. It is the same power that stills the noise of the sea, and the tumult of fear. Ps. 65: 7. See how easily it was done. Moses commanded the waters with a rod: Joshua with the ark of the covenant; Elisha, with the prophet's mantle; but Christ, with a word. See his absolute dominion over all the creatures, which bespeaks both the honor and the

it is out, gathers it into his fists, Prov. 30: 4. He that can do this, can do any thing; can do enough to encourage our confidence in Him in the most stormy period, within or without, Isa. 25: 4. The Lord sitteth on the flood, and is mightier than the noise of many waters. Christ, by commanding the seas, showed Himself to be the same that made the world, when, at his rebuke, the waters fled, (Ps. 104: 7, 6.) as now, at his rebuke, they fell.

V. 28-30. The scope of this chapter shows the divine power of Christ, by his dominion over bodily diseases, to us irresistible; over winds and waves yet more uncontrollable; over devils more formidable than all. Christ has not only all power in heaven and earth, and all deep places, but in hell, too. Principalities and powers were made subject to Him, even while in a state of humiliation, as an earnest of what should be in his glory, Eph. 1: 21. He spoiled them, Col. 2: 15. Christ, in general, cast out the spirits with his word; here we have a particular instance of it. It was wrought in the country of the Gergesenes. Some think they were the remnant of the Girgathites, Deut. 7: 1. Though Christ was sent chiefly to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, yet some saith He made among the borderers. Besides this general instance, which Christ gives us of his power over Satan, we have especially discovered to us the manner of evil spirits in their enmity to man. Observe, concerning this legion of devils,

1. What work they made where they were, which appears in the miserable condition of these two persons. They dwelt among the tombs. The devil, having the power of death, not as judge, but as executioner, delights to hold converse among the trophies of his victory; but there, where he thought himself in the place of his greatest triumph, as in Golgotha, the place of a skull, did Christ subdue him. Conversing among graves, increased the frenzy of the poor possessed creatures, strengthening the hold he had of them by their bodily distemper; and made them more formidable to the people, who generally startle, if any thing stirs among tombs. They were exceedingly fierce; not only ungovernable, but mischievous; so that no man durst pass that way. Note, The devil bears malice to mankind, and shows it by making them malicious towards one another. Mutual enmity, where there should be mutual endearment, is an

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 23-27. When following Christ, we may expect tribulations. Satan will endeavor to obstruct our course, or dismay our souls, by raising a storm; and the Lord may suffer him, for our humiliation and the trial of our faith. Though the Savior seems to disregard his church, when conflicting with the winds and waves of temptation, or persecution, and ready to be overwhelmed; yet his presence secures their safety, and He purposes to excite more earnest prayer for deliverance, and more simple and entire dependence on Him for it. Weak faith will call forth the cry, 'Lord, save us, we perish.' Terrors often prove our faith to be small, though it had seemed to be strong. But Christ regards that faith as 'little,' of which we have a high opinion. He will not leave the weak believer to perish, but rebuke him for his fears, and openly disapprove every suspicion of his truth and love. He leads men into peril, to detect the weakness of their faith, and to shew the power of Him whom winds and waves and all things obey; and thus invigorates their faith, and excites their adoring love. Scott.

Verses 23, 29.

The country of the Gergesenes included the region of Gadara. It seems to have been inhabited chiefly by Jews, but surrounded by Gentiles who mingled with the inhabitants.—The other evangelists mention one demoniac, because one perhaps was more remarkable than the other, but they do not say there was only one; this, then, is no real disagreement. (Notes, Mark 5: 1-20. Luke 8: 26-39.)—The circumstances of this narration, like those of several others, prove the reality of possessions by evil spirits; for things were said and done by demons, and events occurred in consequence of dispossession, which, one would think, cannot be ascribed to lunacy. But one point of modern madducism denies the existence and agency of apostate spirits; and they maintain their empire more successfully for this species of infidelity. Some, not skeptical in other respects, will not admit the reality of these possessions. It cannot be, that evil spirits want power or malice to torment men's bodies and minds, as well as tempt them to sin, if God permit them; nor can it be known how far they have influence in diseases, which affect both body and mind. If they do not immediately cause lunacies, or other maladies, it cannot be denied, that they may take advantage of the disordered state of the body to disturb the mind. (Notes, Job 1: 6, 7. 2: 6.) But when Christ was 'manifested to destroy the works of the devil,' there was wisdom in leaving the enemy of God and man at liberty to shew his power, malice, and the tendency of his efforts to injure and destroy mankind; that Christ might have opportunity to shew his superior authority, give evidence of the existence of these spirits, in opposition to the infidelity of the Sadducees, and evince the beneficence of the Gospel. 'Some suppose, that these persons were only afflicted by strange diseases; but the Scriptures make a distinction between curing diseases and casting out devils. (4: 24.) This will be more evident from circumstances relating to the devils

'being cast out. (Mark 1: 34. Luke 4: 41. & 27, 33.) Now to make this says the effects of disease, or to conceive that Christ spoke 'this to a disease, is evidence of being diseased. Christ purposed to show these demons; asks their names, and the demons were so strong, that chains and fetters could not bind them. Diseased persons could not fear being tormented, sent out of the country, or into the abyss, by 'Christ.' Whithy. Some argue as if the evangelists, and even the Savior, acted with some regard to Jewish prejudices. But this subverts the authority of inspired writers, and reflects on the conduct of Christ. Where Jewish opinions were the effect of prejudice, He never failed to oppose them. (Notes, 16: 3-6. Acts 16: 16-18.) The fierceness of the demons was such, that they could not be confined, but wandered in tombs, or solitary places, and were the terror of the country, so that 'no man could pass by that way.' yet they knew and dreaded Christ; and, using the men's organs of speech, they cried aloud, 'What have we to do with thee, Jesus, thou Son of God?' They expected no benefit, they declined all contest, and desired to have nothing to do with Him. 'O Jesus, Son of the ever-living God, it is our misery, that we are fallen into thy hands. What wilt Thou now do with us? We do not mean to torment us before the day of judgment?' Bp. Hall. Thus they own their doom fixed, but desire liberty for further mischief. Scott.

The evangelists, Mark (5: 1.) and Luke, (8: 26 Gr.) say that our Savior, having passed over the sea of Tiberias, came into the district of the Gadarenes. Matthew here, v. 28, calls it Gergesenes; for ancient Girgathites, mentioned Gen. 10: 16, 15: 21. Dent. 7: 1, and Josh. 3: 10. Doddridge, but as the lands belonging to one of these cities were contained within the limits of the other, [Gadara the capital, according to Josephus, of Perea, or the region beyond Jordan, with its villages, lying in the country of the Gergesenes, Whithy,] one evangelist might say 'the country of the Gergesenes,' another 'the evidence of Satan's enmity to the whole race. He makes one man a bear, a wolf, a devil to another. Where Satan rules in a man by the lusts that war in: the members, pride, malice, revenge, these make him as unfit for society, as unworthy of it, and as much an enemy to the comfort of it, as were these poor possessed creatures.

It is an instance of God's power over the devils, that, notwithstanding the mischief they did by and to these poor men, yet they could not keep them from meeting Jesus Christ. It was his overpowering hand that dragged these unclean spirits into his presence, which they dreaded more than any thing else. His chains could hold them, when the chains men made for them could not. Being brought before Him, they protested against his jurisdiction, and broke out in rage, What have we to do with Thee, Jesus, Thou Son of God? One word the devil spoke like a saint: he addressed Jesus as the Son of God. A good word, and at this time, a great word, and what flesh and blood did not reveal to Peter, ch. 16:16. Even the devils confess Christ to be the Son of God, and yet are devils still; which makes their enmity to Christ so much the more wicked, and indeed, a perfect torment to themselves; for how can it be otherwise, to oppose one they know to be the Son of God? Note, It is not knowledge, but love, that distinguishes saints from devils. He is the first-born of hell that knows Christ, and hates Him, and will not be subject to Him. Not long since the devil doubted if Christ were the Son of God or not, and would have persuaded Him to question it; (ch. 4:3), but now he readily owns it. Note, Though God's children may be greatly disquieted by Satan's questioning their relation to God as a Father, yet the spirit of adoption shall at length so clear it up to them, as to set it above the devil's contradiction.

Two words he said like a devil. What have we to do with Thee? It is true that the devils have nothing to do with Christ, as a Savior; for He took not on Him the nature of the angels who fell, nor laid hold on them, Heb. 2:16. They are in no relation to Him, nor have no hope or any benefit by Him. Oh, the depth of this mystery, that fallen man has so much to do with Christ, when fallen angels have nothing to do with Him! Surely here was torment before the time, to be forced to own the excellency there was in Christ, and yet, that he has no interest in Him. It is possible for men to call Jesus the Son of God, and yet have nothing to do with Him. It is true that the devils hate Christ, reject Him as Ruler, and are in open rebellion against his crown. See whose language those speak, who will have nothing to do with the Gospel of Christ, who break his hands in sunder, and say to the almighty Jesus, depart from us! They are of their father the devil. They do his lusts, and speak his language. It is not true that the devils have nothing to do with Christ, as a Judge. These devils could not deny, that the Son of God is to be their Judge. To his judgment they are bound over, in chains of darkness.

'Art Thou come hither to torment us, and restrain us from doing the hurt we would do?' Note, To be tied up from doing mischief, is a torment to the devil, all whose comfort is in man's misery. Should we not then count it our heaven to be doing well, and reckon that our torment which hinders us? There is a time when devils will be more tormented than they are, and they know it. The great assize at the last day, is the time fixed for their complete torture, in that Tophet which is ordained of old, for the king, for the prince of the devils, and his angels; Isa. 30:33, Matth. 25:41. For the judgment of that day, they are reserved, 2 Pet. 2:4. They are now prisoners at large, Job 1:7. They will then be made close prisoners; they now have some ease, they will then be in torment. Despair of relief is the misery of their case. They have apprehension of that fiery indignation, on every approach of Christ. Thus the devils believe and tremble, Jam. 2:19. The most desperate sinners, whose damnation is sealed, yet cannot quite harden their hearts, when they see the day approaching.

2. The evil spirits went into a herd of swine, which was a good way off. These Gergesenes, though living on the other side Jordan, were Jews. What had they to do with swine, which by the law, were not to be eaten or touched? Probably, lying on the outskirts of the land, there were many Gentiles among them, to whom the herd belonged; or they kept them to be bartered or sold to the Romans, who were admirers of swine's flesh. Though the swine were good way off, yet the devils had an eye upon them to do them mischief; for they go up and down, seeking whom they may devour.

If Thou cast us out, suffer us to go away into the herd of swine. See their inclination to mischief. They resemble those whose sleep departeth from them, except they cause some to fall, Prov. 4:16. Let us go any where to do mischief. They would hurt men in their goods and hurt their souls, by making Christ a burden to them. They own that, without Christ's permission, they could not so much as hurt swine. This is comfortable to all God's people, that, although Satan's power is great, it is limited. What would become of us, were it not? His power is under the control of our Lord Jesus our most faithful friend and Savior.

Christ said unto them, Go, as God did to Satan, when he desired leave to afflict Job. Note, God often, for wise reasons, permits the efforts of Satan's power. The devils are not only Christ's captives, but his vassals. Their wrath shall praise Him, and the remainder of it He will restrain. Christ permitted this, for the conviction of the Sadducees, who denied the existence of spirits. He brought as near as might be, to ocular demonstration, the number, country of the Gadarenes, each being as correct as the other.' CALMET. Out of the tombs. 'The tombs, not only among the Jews, but Gentiles also, were often spacious subterranean caves excavated from the living rock. Hence they not unfrequently served as places of abode to such as were expelled from human habitations, or desolate of them. And indeed at the present day they are often used for that purpose in the East.' BLOOMFIELD. 'Along the borders of this lake, [of Gennesareth, or Tiberias,] may still be seen the remains of those ancient tombs, hewn by the earliest inhabitants of Galilee, [see, however, Judg. 6:2.] in the rocks which face the water.'—These are alluded to in the account of the cure wrought by our Savior in the country of the Gadarenes, and their existence to this day offers strong internal evidence of the accuracy of the evangelist.'

By the law of Moses swine were unclean, and the touch of them, when dead, defiled a man; (Note, Lev. 11:31-33, v. 31) yet the Gadarenes fed them, to sell to their Gentile neighbors. The evil spirits formed a subtle plan of prejudicing the inhabitants against Jesus, and inducing them to reject his instructions. Aware of the gain arising from the sale of swine, they desired permission to possess these animals. And He, probably to punish the avarice of the Gadarenes, gave proof of the reality of possessions, and shew the destructive power as well as the limits assigned to evil spirits, permitted them. Immediately they impelled the swine to such fury, that the herd rushed from a precipice into the sea, and were 'drowned.'—It is surprising, that this permission should be regarded as a ground of objection to our Lord's conduct, or as needing a labored vindication. Had not He restrained the evil spirit they would have also destroyed the demoniacs, and the owners and feeders of the swine; so that his mercy protected the Gadarenes, and permitted the destruction only of that property, which tempted them almost constantly to violate the law, and contract ceremonial uncleanness. But the objection reminds us, that the enemies of Christianity always blame religion for the mischief, which Satan and evil men take occasion from it to perpetrate; forgetting that they would have done vastly more mischief had his restraints been removed. If permitting be not distinguished from causing, it will be impossible not to impute to God the sins of all his rebellious creatures, which is detestable blasphemy. (Marg. Ref.) SCOTT. 'Christ, who sometimes, and in some things, denieth our petitions, here granteth that of the devils; to teach us to submit our wills wholly to his, who sometimes granteth justice, [for punishment,] and sometimes denieth in mercy.' ASSEMA LXX. 'We are commonly punished in the thing wherein we offend; and need not more than our ordinary wishes and prayers to rid us.' FOOT. 'As pretended dispossession is very suspicious, because there is so much room for collusion, our Lord permitted the evil spirits here to "enter into the swine;" it being self-evident that the swine could not be confederates in any fraud. Thus, partly to punish those who dealt in a commodity so infamous, and to display the malice of those evil spirits, the death of these swine was made instructive and convincing, and thus rendered a blessing to mankind: and I doubt not but this extraordinary occurrence was permitted, chiefly to prove the reality of diabolical possessions.'

The keepers, undoubtedly, were afflicted as well as astonished at this event, and having told it in Gadara, the inhabitants came to Jesus.

The people wonder, but the Pharisees ascribe it to the prince of the devils, 33-34. lost. The curiosity of the people brought them out to see Jesus. The whole city came out to meet Him, that they might be able to say, they had seen a Man who did such wonderful works. Thus many go out in profession to meet Christ, that have no real affection for Him. Their covetousness made them willing to be rid of Him. Instead of inviting Him into their city, or bringing their sick to Him to be healed, they desired Him to depart out of their coasts, as if they had borrowed the words of the devils, power, and malice of evil spirits. If the Sadducees were not hereby convinced, they would be left inexcusable. We see not the wind, but it would be absurd to deny its existence.

Christ permitted the loss of the swine for the punishment of the Gadarenes, who, perhaps, though Jews, indulged in eating swine's flesh; and Christ would also show what a bellicious crew they were delivered from, which, if He had permitted it, would soon have choked them, as they did their swine. The devils, in obedience to Christ's command, came out of the men, and went into the herd of swine. See what an industrious enemy Satan is, and how expeditious!

They were not hid to save their lives, and they were therefore made to run violently down a steep place into the sea, and were drowned, in number about two thousand, Mark 5:13. Note. The possession which the devil gets is for destruction. He hurries people to sin, to that which they have resolved against, and which they know will be a shame and grief to them. With what a force does the evil spirit work in the children of disobedience, when, by so many foolish and hurtful lusts, they are brought to act in direct contradiction, not only to religion, but to right reason, and their interest in this world! Thus, likewise, he hurries them to ruin, for he is Apollyon and Abaddon, the great destroyer. By his lusts, which men do, they are drowned in destruction and perdition. This is Satan's plan, to swallow up and to drown. Miserable, then, is the condition of those that are led captively by him at his will. They are hurried into a worse lake than this, a lake that burns with fire and brimstone.

The report of it was soon brought to the owners by these winherders, who seemed more concerned for the loss of the swine than any thing else; for they went not to tell what was befallen to the possessed of the devils, till the swine were brought them out to see Jesus. The whole city came out to meet Him, that they might be able to say, they had seen a Man who did such wonderful works. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 23-34. Apostate spirits might justly terrify us, were it not for the power and grace of Christ. We bar our doors against ruffians; but rarely consider that legions of devils have access to us, against whom we have no defence, and whilstable, if permitted, to distract our minds, injure our bodies, or ruin our possessions, they delight only in misery and destruction. In what an awful situation, then, are they, who, listening to their temptations, provoke God to give them up to their power and malice! What cause have we to be grateful for preservation during the unconverted portion of our lives! But the believer, doing his duty, need not fear these roaring lions. His Shepherd is watchful and almighty: They cannot break the hedge, which protects his people, nor enter even swine without permission. (Note, Job 1:9-16.) They can tempt sinners to destroy themselves, but cannot destroy them. Spiritual possession by these 'unclean spirits' is, however, most to be dreaded. Their influence leads men to be mischievous, miserable, a burden of their families, a nuisance, or terror of society.

Under their delusions, the sinner supposes, that religion can only make him uneasy. And if he have the truth, and regard 'Jesus as the Son of God,' if he even dread future torment, he will yet have nothing to do with the Savior, nor with the Gospel, lest he be 'tormented before the time.' But Jesus gives deliverance to such slaves, and makes them his willing servants, whenever He sees good, in defiance of evil spirits. (Note, Ps. 110:3.)—Even 'devils believe and tremble;' nay, they supplicate Christ to be exempted from torments, or suffered to do mischief. Let none, then, trust in notions, dead faith, selfish prayers, but in 'faith that worketh by love.'—There is nothing, which men will not do for money; (Note, 1 Tim. 6:6-10. vv. 8-10.) and nothing prejudices the mind more against the Gospel, than its interference with the unrighteous pursuit of riches. The covetous shew themselves to be enemies to Christ, and possessed by Satan, equally with plunderers and debauchees. Avarice is, perhaps, more rarely extirpated, than any other distemper of the mind. SCOTT.

but not to receive instruction, or ask assistance. Probably their consciences inside them dread his power, and the loss of the swine disconcerted them. Not daring to attack his person, they requested Him to depart, which was to say, 'What have we to do with Thee, Jesus, Thou Son of God?' This shewed the power of Satan over them, as really as over the demonsiacs, but in a more criminal sense. 'Where men live,' says Beza, 'like swine, there doth not Christ tarry, but devils.' SCOTT. They that kept them fled. 'Partly from fear, being terrified with the sight; partly to tell the news in the city, and possibly to excuse themselves to their masters, lest they should think the negligence of their servants the cause of their loss.' Yet God's providence so wrought, that Satan, who would have destroyed or hinder the propagation of the truth of Christ, was foiled by his own endeavor, and the power and goodness of Christ made more public by this miracle. NOTES.

CHAP. IX. v. 1. This verse should have been at the end of the last chapter, being the conclusion of the narrative there begun. (Note, Mark 2:1, 2. Capernaum was now Christ's 'own city.' (Note, 4:12-17. 'Bethlehem brought Him forth, Nazareth brought Him up, and Capernaum was his abode.' Theophilact.—The next miracle was wrought at Capernaum, but seems from other evangelists to have been done before our Lord's voyage to Galilee. SCOTT. Lenny supposes that our Lord chose Capernaum for his ordinary residence, because of the city it afforded for visiting the neighboring cities and regions by wa-

What have we to do with Thee, Jesus, Thou Son of God? And now the devils had what they aimed at, in drowning the swine. They did it and then made the people believe that Christ had done it, and so prejudiced them against Him. The devil seduced our first parents, by possessing them with bad thoughts of God, and kept the Gadarenes from Christ, by suggesting that He came into their country to destroy their cattle, and that He would do more hurt than good; for though He had cured two men, yet He had drowned two thousand swine. Thus the devil sows tares in God's field, lays the blame on Christianity, and incenses men against that. They besought Him that He would depart, lest, like Moses in Egypt, He should proceed to some other plague. Note. A great many prefer their swine before their Savior, and so come short of salvation. They desire Christ to depart out of their hearts, and will not suffer his Word to have a place in them, because He and his Word will be the destruction of their brutish lusts. Justly will Christ say to them hereafter, who are thus weary of Him here, Depart, ye cursed.

CHAP. IX. v. 1-8. We have, in this chapter, remarkable instances of the power and pity of the Lord Jesus, sufficient to convince us that He is able to save to the uttermost all that come to God by Him, and as willing as able, proving Himself to be the skilful, faithful Physician of soul and body, who has sufficient remedies for all the maladies of both. We must therefore apply to Him, and glorify Him both with our bodies, and with our spirits, which are his.

The first verse looks back to the close of the preceding chapter, where the Gadarenes, resenting the loss of their swine, besought Christ to depart out of their coasts. Here it follows, He entered into a ship, and passed over. Observe, his justice—that He left them. Christ will not tarry long where He is not welcome. In righteous judgment, He forsakes those who are weary of Him. If the unbeliever will depart from Christ, let him depart, it is at his peril, 1 Cor. 7:15. See his patience—that He did not punish them as they deserved, for their contempt and contumacy. The provocation, indeed, was very great; but He passed it by;

Verses 2-8.

(Notes, Mark 2:3-12. Luke 5:17-26.) This miracle is more fully recorded by other evangelists, and the particular consideration of it is therefore postponed. Mark records several miracles more circumstantially than Matthew, and hence did not extract his Gospel from Matthew, as some suppose. (Preface to Mark.) Matthew seems here to record in continuation miracles wrought at various times; as he relates several without mentioning the miracles which Christ wrought at the same time.

SON-1 'Son is a title of tenderness, by which superiors address their inferiors.' Dodd. (Marg. Ref. e.) 'Thou art come in desire and confidence of cure. I will give thee more than thou askest; restoration to a good state of soul; thy palsy is healed, thy sins (the cause) are forgiven.' Bp. Hall. Some think, that Christ remitted only the temporal punishment of his sins; and their main argument is, that the apostles cured diseases, so that this is no proof of authority to forgive sin, as to eternal punishment: but the apostles healed diseases in the name of Christ, and forgave sins by his authority. (16:19. John 20:23.) He did both in his own name. If palsy was the temporal punishment of this man's sin, the healing of it was the remission of the punishment, and the language which offended the Pharisees was not

He came not to destroy men's lives, but to save them; not to kill, but to cure. Spiritual judgments agree more with the constitution of Gospel-times; yet some observe, that in those wars which the Romans made on the Jews, not many years after this, they first besieged the town of Gadara, where these Gadarenes dwelt. Those that drive Christ from them, draw on themselves all miseries. Woe unto us, if God depart from us.

He came into Capernaum, the principal place of his residence at present, (Mark 2:1.) and therefore called his own city. There, all the circumstances recorded in this chapter happened, and are, therefore, put together here, though, in the harmony of the evangelists, other events intervened. When the Gadarenes desired Christ to depart, they of Capernaum received Him. If Christ be affronted by some, there are others in whom He will be glorious.

The first occurrence after Christ's return to Capernaum, as here recorded, was the cure of the man sick of the palsy. In which we observe,

I. The faith of his friends in bringing him to Christ. His distemper was such that he could not come himself; but even the halt and the lame may be brought, and if we do as well as we can, He will accept us. Christ had an eye to their faith. Little children cannot go to Christ themselves, but He will have an eye to the faith of those that bring them, and it shall not be in vain. Jesus saw their faith, the faith of the paralytic himself, as well as of them that brought him. Now their faith was strong; they firmly believed that Jesus Christ both could and would heal him. It was humble; they would not ask Christ to make him a visit, but brought him to attend on Christ. It was active; in the belief of Christ's power and goodness, they brought the sick man to Him. Note, A strong faith regards no obstacles in pressing after Christ.

II. The favor of Christ, in what He said to him, v. 2. This was a sovereign cordial, enough to make all his bed in his sickness. We read not of any thing said to Christ; probably the sick man could not speak for himself, and they that brought him thought it enough to set him before Christ. It is not in vain to present ourselves and friends to Christ, as objects of pity; mercy is no less quick of hearing than justice. Herein what Christ said is, 1. A kind compellation; Son: afflictions are fatherly discipline, Heb. 12: 5. 2. A gracious encouragement;

'Be of good cheer. Have a good heart on it. Probably the poor man, when let down among them all in his bed, was afraid of a rebuke for being brought in so rudely; but Christ bids him be of good cheer, and then cures him. He would have those, to whom He deals his gifts, be cheerful in seeking and trusting Him; to be of good courage. 3. A good reason for that encouragement; Thy sins are forgiven thee. This may be considered an introduction to the cure. 'Thy sins are pardoned, therefore thou shalt be healed.' Note, Though sin is the cause of sickness, sin may be pardoned, and yet the sickness not removed; or the sickness may be removed, and yet the sin not pardoned; but if we have the comfort of our reconciliation to God, with the comfort of our recovery from sickness, this makes it a mercy indeed, as Hezekiah, Isa. 38: 17. Or it may be a reason of the command, whether he were cured of his disease or not; 'Though I should not heal thee, thou hast not sought in vain, if I assure thee that thy sins are pardoned.' Note, those who, through grace, have evidence of the forgiveness of their sins, have reason to be of good cheer, whatever troubles or afflictions they are under; see Isa. 33: 24.

III. The cavil of the scribes at what Christ said; (v. 3.) See how the greatest instance of Heaven's power and grace is branded with the blackest note of hell's enmity; Christ's pardoning sin is termed blasphemy. They, therefore are guilty of blasphemy, that have no commission for it, and yet pretend to pardon sin.

IV. The conviction Christ gave them of the unreasonableness of this cavil.

He charged them with it. Though they did but say it within themselves, He knew their thoughts. Thoughts are secret and sudden, yet naked and open before Christ; (Heb. 4: 12, 13.) He understands them afar off, Ps. 139: 2. He could say (what no mere man could), Wherefore think ye evil in your hearts? Note, Sinful thoughts are very offensive to the Lord Jesus. He being the sovereign of the heart, they invade his right, therefore He takes notice of them, and is much displeased with them. In them lies the root of bitterness, Gen. 6: 5. The sins that begin and end in the heart, are as dangerous as any other.

He argued them out of it, v. 5, 6. He asserts his authority in the kingdom of grace. He shows that the Son of man, the Mediator, has power on earth to forgive sins, because He is the Son of man, (John 5: 22, 27.) If He has power

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

CHAP. IX. v. 1-8. Christ will not continue his presence or ordinances with those who are weary of them; for He has abundant opportunities for showing mercy.—They who feel themselves to be miserable through sin, and believe that He only can deliver them, will submit to any inconvenience in applying to Him: and, as they are glad of assistance from stronger brethren, these should help them according to their ability and opportunity. Christ can see faith in the heart; yet He loves to point it out in the effects by which it is manifested to us; and when the most sinful and afflicted press through difficulties to seek his salvation, they should be 'of good cheer'; for He addresses them as his children, and forgives their sins.—It would be better to have a pardon, and be left to languish under disease till death, than to be cured of sickness, and left under the power of sin, 'to treasure up wrath against the day of wrath.' Yet, if the sin be forgiven, we shall at length be delivered from pain, and in the mean time enjoy consolation.—Jesus could not so do good, that proud scribes would not censure Him, and accuse Him of blasphemy; let us, then, never expect to escape calumny, or be deterred by the fear of it.—The Lord often hears men say such things within themselves of Him, his Gospel, and service, as they would be ashamed to avow, but He will as certainly call them to an account for evil surmises, as for wicked words and works.—When, at Christ's command, the paralytic arose and carried home the bed on which he was brought, the authority of Christ to pardon, and the man's forgiveness, were both demonstrated: and when sinners, at his word, are enabled to renounce iniquities, and to delight in obeying God, they too may know, that their crimes are blotted out. Thus men burdened by sin come to Christ; but when He enables them to walk in newness of life, all who see and love the change are led to adore his grace, and to glorify God on their account.—But as Jesus, in his humiliation, had power to forgive sins on earth, so now that He reigns in glory, his mediatorial commission reaches no further [than while men remain on earth,] and they who die unpardoned must sink into condemnation forever.

Joseph. But if his sin in every sense was forgiven, his cure sealed the pardon, and gave him the comfort of it. It also proved the point in contest, namely, that Christ was the Son of God; and that as the Son of man in his humiliation, all judgment was committed to Him; and He was authorized immediately to pardon any sinner, even as He pardoned the dyablic thief. 'By remitting the sin,' says Irenaeus, 'He showed who He was; for if none can remit but God, and yet Christ did remit them, He was both the Word of God, and the Son of man, receiving power to remit sins from his Father as God and Man.' 'The Jews say,' observes Whitby, 'it was proper for God to forgive sins; and this Christ denies; not; but proves that the Son had this power also, leaving them to make the inference.' SCOTT. Bed. A couch, or sofa, (like the modern Turkish divan, or mattress, Calmet.) such as they reclined on at meals.' Dr. A. CLARKE. 'Thy sins be forgiven.' not have objected to them. When the common version was made be was often used for are.' CAMPELLE. 'Moral evil has been the cause of all the natural evil in the world. Our Lord goes to the source of the malady, which is sin; and to that, as the procuring cause, we should refer in all our afflictions.' Among the Jews it was a maxim, that 'no diseased person can be healed till all his sins are blotted out. Christ here first forgives the sins, and then heals the body of the paralytic. See Ps. 103: 3. [25: 18.] 4: 3, 4. Dr. A. CLARKE. This man blasphemeth. 'See, in this instance, how the best are sometimes accused of saying and doing the worst things. To do well and suffer ill, was the portion of Christ Himself, and may be the portion of the holiest of those who belong to Christ. Even Jesus was charged with blasphemy and sorcery; and innocence itself can protect no man from slander and false accusation.'

They glorified God for what He had done for this poor man. Note, Others' mercies should be our praises, for we are members one of another. Though few of this multitude were so convinced, as to be brought to believe in Christ, as God, or the Son of God, yet they admired Him as a man to whom God had given such power. Note, God must be glorified in all the power that is given to men to do good. For all power is originally in Him, as the fountain, in men as cisterns.

V. 9-13. I. The call of Matthew, the penman of this Gospel. Mark and Luke call him Levi; it was common for the same person to have two names: perhaps Matthew was the name he was most known by as a publican. Some think Christ gave him the name of Matthew when He called him to be an apostle; as Simon, He surnamed Peter. Matthew signifies, the gift of God. Ministers are God's gifts to the church; their ministry, and their ability.

Observe, The posture Christ's call found Matthew in. He was sitting at the receipt of custom, as a publican, (Luke 5:27,) or a custom-house officer

Verse 9.

(Marg. Ref. Note, Mark 2:13-17.) The Jews deemed it criminal for their countrymen to be publicans, (or collectors of taxes,) so that the love of gain only could induce them to engage in it. The publicans from among the Jews were generally immoral, and increased the odium against the order by exacting more than their due, and enforcing the collection by military violence, having aid, when necessary, from the Roman soldiery. The office rendered men infamous, though all were not so iniquitous as this opinion of them implies. Thus occupied, Matthew was sitting in his office, when Jesus spoke to him; his hands full of business, his head, perhaps, of calculations, and his heart of covetousness: for it is not certain, that he had paid any previous regard to the teaching of Christ. But, when commanded to follow Jesus, such a power attended the word, as led him to renounce his employment, immediately to become an attendant on the Savior, that he might be a preacher of the Gospel. So he arose, left his business to his assistants, went after Jesus, and never returned to his occupation. SCOTT. The original word here used signifies not principal, but inferior collectors. These were odious, especially among the Jews, as has been mentioned, and are chiefly the persons called publicans in the Gospels. They were, in fact, servants of those who farmed the revenue; and, being often guilty of extortion, were usually coupled with such as the Jews termed sinners, meaning, peculiarly, as is thought, heathens. The Jews, therefore, abstained from their society, as if they were such. Some assert: that they were not allowed to enter the temple, or a synagogue, to partake in the public prayers, or offices of judicature. ¶ I give testimony in a court of justice,' CALMET. BLOOMFIELD. 'In Persia,' says Mr. Morier, 'the collections of the toll are farmed; consequently extortion ensues. As most of the rahdars receive no emolument but what they exact over to give eternal life, as He certainly has, (John 17:2.) He must have power to forgive sin; for guilt is a bar that must be removed, or we can never get to heaven. What an encouragement to poor sinners to repent, that the power of pardoning sin is in the hands of the Son of man, who is Bone of our bone! And if He had this power on earth, how much more has He it now that He is exalted to the Father's right hand, to give repentance and remission of sins, and so to be both a Prince and a Savior, Acts 5:31.

He proves it, by his power in the kingdom of nature; his power to cure diseases. He that can cure the disease, whether declaratively as a Prophet, or authoritatively as a God, can, in like manner, forgive the sin. Now this is a general argument to prove that Christ had a divine mission. The God of truth would not set his seal to a lie. It had a particular cogency in this case. The palsy was but a symptom of the disease of sin; now He made it appear that He could effectually cure the original disease, by the immediate removal of that symptom. He that had power to remove the punishment, no doubt had power to remit sin. The scribes placed their confidence in legal righteousness, and made no great matter of the forgiveness of sins; but Christ hereby designed to honor that doctrine, and to show that his great errand to the world was, to save his people from their sins.

V. The immediate cure of the sick man. The most necessary arguments must not divert us from doing good. He saith to the sick of the palsy, Arise, take up thy bed, and go to thine house; and a healing, quickening, strengthening; but Christ bid him take up his bed, to show that he was perfectly cured. He sent him to his house, to be a blessing to his family, where he had been so long a burden.

As most of the rahdars receive no emolument but what they exact over at the port of Capernaum, an exciseman, or collector of the land-tax. He was in his calling, as the rest of them whom Christ called, ch. 4: 18. But it was a calling of ill fame among serious people; because it was attended with so much corruption and temptation, and there were few in that business that were honest men. Matthew himself owns what he was, before his conversion, as does Paul, (1 Tim. 1: 13,) that the grace of Christ in calling him might be the more magnified, and to show that God has his remnant among all sorts of people. None can justify themselves in their unbelief, by their calling in the world; for there is no sinful calling, but some have been saved out of it, and no lawful calling, but some have been saved in it.

See the power of this call. We find that Matthew had any inclination to follow Christ, though some of his kindred were already his disciples, but Christ 'prevented him with the blessings of his goodness.' He is found of those that seek Him not. We have not chosen Him, but He hath chosen us. He said, follow Me; and the same power accompanied this word to convert Matthew, which attended that word, (p. 6.) to cure the man sick of the palsy. Note, A saving change is wrought in the soul by Christ as the Author, and his Word as the means. His Gospel is the power of God unto salvation, Rom. 1: 16. The call was effectual, for he came at the call. The power of divine grace soon answers and overcomes all objections. Neither his commission, nor his gains could detain him, when Christ called. He conferred not with flesh and blood, Gal. 1: 15, 16. He quitted his post, and his hopes of preferment in that way; and we never find him at the receipt of custom again.

II. Christ's converse with publicans and sinners on this occasion; Christ called Matthew, to introduce Himself into an acquaintance with the people of that profession, p. 10. The other evangelists tell us, that Matthew made a great feast. But when he comes to speak of it him self, he neither tells us that it was his own house, nor that it was a feast, but only that he sat at meat in the house; preserving the remembrance of Christ's favor to the publicans, rather than of the respect he had paid to Christ. Note It well becomes us to speak sparingly of our own good deeds.

Now observe, when Matthew invited Christ, he invited his disciples with Him. Note, They that welcome Christ, must welcome all that are his, for his sake. He invited many publicans and sinners to meet Him. This was the chief thing Matthew aimed at, to bring his old associates acquainted with Christ. Note, and above prescribed dues, their insolence is accounted for, as well as the detestation in which they are held. He arose and followed.] 'How blessed it is, to be obedient to the first call of Christ! How much of both happiness and glory is lost by delay, though conversion at last should have taken place.' Dr. A. CLARKE. 'Immediately, consigning his affairs to some careful hand, he left all the care and profits of his employment to follow Christ. And let us view with humble wonder and pleasure the Redeemer's condescending grace, in the call of Matthew—condescension, in calling to an attendance so near, and a friendship so intimate, one who was a publican, disreputable as was that employment—grace, which could immediately inspire him with firm resolution to quit all its advantages, and reduce himself to circumstances of life as precarious as those of his Divine Master. Many, no doubt, censured him as a rash enthusiast, or a lunatic, rather than a sober convert; but he now reaps the abundant reward: his loss is gain, and his contempt glory.' DOUGLASS. 'Lord, speak thy word with power into the depth of our souls, and we shall follow Thee. Farewell all such love of the world, as would keep us from Christ.'

Verse 10.

Sat at meat.] 'I do not find where Jesus was bidden to any table, and refused. If a Pharisee, if a publican invited Him, he went. Matthew, probably, made an entertainment, after a final settlement of his concerns, inviting Jesus, and his disciples, with many publicans, and others, his former friends. See Luke 5: 29. This he seems to have done, hoping they too might derive benefit from our Lord's discourse, and accordingly, Christ, without hesitation, sat down with the company. SCOTT.] If he sat with sinners, He converted them; if with converts, He confirmed and instructed them; if with the poor, He fed them; if with the rich, He made them richer in grace. At whose board did He ever sit, and left not his host a gainer?' Bp. HALL. 'Publicans and sinners sat with Him.' He is still the same condescending Jesus, and sinners as we are, always ready to admit us into his presence. If men do not think themselves too good to come to Him, He thinks none too bad.'

12 But when Jesus heard that, he said unto them, 'They that be whole need not a physician, but they that are sick.'

13 But 'go ye and learn what that meaneth, I will have mercy and not sacrifice: for I am not come to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance.'

They who are effectually brought to Christ themselves, cannot but be desirous that others also may be brought to Him. True grace will invite others. When, by the conversion of Matthew, the fraternity was broken, presently his house was filled with publicans, and surely some of them will follow him, as he followed Christ. Thus did Andrew and Philip, John 1: 41, 4: 39. See Judges 14: 9.

III. The displeasure of the Pharisees. V. 11. They cavilled at it. Here observe, Christ was quarrelled with; He endured the contradiction of sinners against Himself; for though He never spoke or did any thing amiss, every thing He said and did was found fault with. Thus He taught us to expect and prepare for reproach, and so bear it patiently. They that quarrelled with Him were the Pharisees; a proud generation of men, conceited and censorious; of the same temper with those in the prophet's time, who said, Stand by thyself; I am holier than thou: very strict in avoiding sinners, but not in avoiding sin; none greater zealots than they, for the form of godliness, nor greater enemies to the power of it; keeping up the traditions of the elders to a nicety, and so propagating the same spirit they were themselves governed by. They brought their cavil, not to Christ Himself; they had not courage to face Him with it, but to his disciples. Note, It concerns Christians to be able to vindicate and justify Christ and his doctrines and laws, and to be ready always to give an answer to those that ask them a reason of the hope that is in them, 1 Pet. 3: 15. While He is an advocate for us in heaven, let us be advocates for Him on earth. The complaint was, his eating with publicans and sinners: to be intimate with wicked people, is against the law of God; (Ps. 119: 115. 1: 1.) and perhaps by accusing Christ of this to his disciples, they hoped to tempt them from Him, and bring them over to be their disciples; for they compassed sea and land to make proselytes. To be intimate with publicans, was against the tradition of the elders, and, therefore, they looked on it as a heinous thing. They were angry with Christ for this, because they wished ill to Him, and sought occasion to misrepresent Him. Note, It is an easy and very common thing to put the worst constructions on the best words and actions. Because they wished no good to publicans and sinners, but envied Christ's favor to them, they were grieved to see them brought to repentance. Note, It may justly be suspected, that those have not the grace of God themselves, who grudge others a share in that grace.

IV. The defence Christ made in justification of converse with publicans and sinners. Two things He urges in his defence. 1. The exigence of the case of the publicans. It was the extreme necessity of poor, lost sinners, that brought Christ from the pure regions above, to these impure ones; and the same was it, that brought Him into this company which was thought impure. Now He proves the necessity of the case of the publicans, z. 12. The publicans are sick, and need one to help and heal them, which the Pharisees think they do not. Note, Sin is the sickness of the soul. It is deforming, weakening, disquieting, wasting, killing, but, blessed be God, not incurable. Jesus Christ is the great Physician of souls. He is a skilful, faithful, compassionate Physician. Wise and good men should be as physicians to all about them; Christ was so. Sin-sick souls have need of this Physician; nature will not help itself; no man can help us; such need have we of Christ, that we are eternally undone without Him. Awakened sinners see their need, and apply themselves to Him accordingly. There are multitudes who fancy themselves sound, and think they have no need of Christ, as Laodiceans, Rev. 3: 17. Thus the Pharisees desired not the knowledge of Christ's word and ways, because they thought they had no need of Him. See John 9: 40, 41.

He proves that their necessity did sufficiently justify his conduct; for that necessity made it an act of charity, which ought always to be preferred before the formalities of a religious profession. The duties which are of moral and natural obligation, are to take place even of those divine laws, which are positive and ritual; much more of those impositions of men, and traditions of the elders, which make God's law stricter than He has made it. This He proves, (v. 3.) by a passage quoted out of Hos. 6: 6. I will have mercy and not sacrifice. Christ's conversing with sinners is here called mercy. Observe how Christ quotes this, Go ye and learn what that meaneth. Note It is not enough to be acquainted with the letter of Scripture; we must understand the meaning of it. And they have best learned the meaning of the Scriptures that have learned how to apply them as a reproof to their own faults, and a rule for their own practice. This Scripture which Christ quoted, served not only to vindicate Him, but to show wherein the religion consists; not in external observances and shows of sanctity; not in little particular opinions and doubtful disputations, but in doing all the good we can to the bodies and souls of others. It condemned the Pharisaical hypocrisy of those who played religion in rituals, more than in morals, ch. 23: 23. They espouse those forms of godliness which may be made consistent with, and perhaps subservient to, their pride, covetousness, ambition and malice; while they hate that power of it which is mortifying to those lusts.

2. He urges the nature and end of his own commission, (v. 13.) and that, therefore, He must converse with publicans. Observe, His errand; it was to call to repentance. This was his first text, (ch. 4: 17.) and the tendency of all his sermons. Note, The Gospel-call is a call to repentance. See with whom his errand lay; not with the righteous, but with sinners. That is, if men had not been sinners, there had been no occasion for Christ's coming among them. He is the Savior, not of man as man, but of man as fallen. Had the first Adam continued in his original righteousness, we had not needed a second Adam. Therefore his greatest business lies with the greatest sinners. Christ came into the world to save sinners, but especially the chief, (1 Tim. 1: 15.) The more sensible any sinners are of their sinfulness, the more welcome will Christ and his Gospel be to them. Christ came not with an expectation of succeeding among those who think themselves righteous, who will sooner be sick of their Savior, than sick of their sins; but among convinced, humble sinners; to them Christ will come, for to them He will be welcome.

V. 14-17. The objections made against Christ and his disciples, gave occasion to some of his most profitable discourses. His discourse of his power to forgive sin, and readiness to receive sinners, was occasioned by the cavils of scribes and Pharisees; so here, from a reflection on the conduct of his family, arose a discourse concerning a tenderness for it. Observe,

I. The objection John's disciples made against Christ's disciples for not fasting so often as they did, in which, as appears by the other evangelists, (Mark 2: 18. and Luke 5: 33.) the disciples of the Pharisees joined with them, and we have reason to suspect instigated them, making use of John's disciples as their spokesmen, because they, being more in favor with Christ and his disciples, could do it more plausibly. Note, It is no new thing for bad men to set good men at variance; if the people of God differ in their sentiments, designing men will take that occasion to sow discord, incense them one against another, alienate them one from another, and so make an easy prey of them. It is pity the duties of religion, which ought to be the confirmations of holy love, should be made the occasion of strife and contention; but they often are so, as here; where we may observe,

1. How they boasted of their own fasting, z. 14. Fasting has in all ages been consecrated, on special occasions, to the service of religion; many of the Pharisees kept two fast-days in a week, and yet the generality of them were hypocrites. Note, False and formal professors world, to call the righteous to the privileges of his kingdom: if any were truly righteous of themselves, they would not want his salvation; and they, who proudly thought themselves to be so, would not accept it. But He came to call sinners to participate its blessings: not by encouraging them in sin; but by exhorting, encouraging, and inducing them to repent, and forsake it. SCOTT. 'Compassionate Redeemer! Thou didst, as the great Physician of souls, willingly converse with objects that must have been hateful to thy pure and holy nature! May each of us have a due sense of the malignity of sin, that fatal disease of the soul, that we may with a becoming temper apply to Thee for cure. May we also, like Thee, condescend to the meanest and vieni if it may win them to true religion and happiness.—even preferring mercy to sacrifice, and choosing rather to be governed by the dictates of a benevolent heart, than the maxims of proud and censorious men.' 15 And Jesus said unto them, 'Can the children of the bride-chamber mourn, as long as the bridegroom is with them? But the days will come, when the bridegroom shall be taken from them; and then shall they fast.'

fence, Christ himself will be Jesus, are these thy Christians? Therefore, as we tender the honor of Christ, we are concerned to conduct ourselves well. Observe, The quarrel with Christ was brought to the disciples, (v. 14.) the quarrel with the disciples to Christ; (v. 14.) this is the way of sowing discord and killing love, to set people against ministers, ministers against people, and one friend against another.

11. The apology Christ made for his disciples. He might have upbraided John's disciples with the former part of their question, Why do ye fast often? But He only vindicates his disciples. Note, As it is Wisdom's honor to be justified of all her children, so it is her children's happiness to be all justified of Wisdom. In what we do according to the precept and pattern of Christ, He will be sure to bear us out, and we may with confidence leave it to Him to clear up our integrity.

Two things Christ mentions in defence of their not fasting.

1. It was not a season proper for that duty: (v. 15.) Observe, Christ's answer is so framed that it might sufficiently justify the practice of his own disciples, and yet not condemn the institution of John, or the practice of his disciples. When the Pharisees fomented this dispute, they hoped Christ would cast blame, either on his own disciples, or on John's; but He did neither. Note, When we are unjustly censured, our care must be only to clear ourselves, not to recriminate; such a variety may there be of circumstances, as may justify us in our practice, without condemning those that practise otherwise. His argument is taken from the common usage of joy and rejoicing during the continuance of marriage solemnities, as at Samson's wedding, Judges 14: 17. Now the disciples of Christ were (Marg. R.) John was at this time in prison; and his affliction, as well as the nature of his introductory dispensation, led such as were attached to him, and unwilling to become Christ's disciples, frequently and strictly to fast as the Pharisees professed to do: and when they saw Jesus and his followers go to feasts, (though in general living in a very frugal manner) they concluded that his disciples never fasted; and they asked Jesus why his disciples neglected this part of religion. But He, referring them to John's testimony of Him as 'the Bridegroom' of the church, told them that it would be unsuitable to their present state. (Note, John 3: 27-36, v. 29.) It would be unreasonable for the companions of a bridegroom to fast during the festival of his nuptials. But if any calamity tore him from them, their fasting would be turned into fasting. So, it would be improper for his disciples to fast in his presence; but He should soon be taken away by crucifixion, and at length by ascension; and then they would be subjected to such trials, as to render fasting seasonsable, and cause them to join it with other religious exercises. Scott

The question from the disciples of the Baptist was not so much 'of inquiry, as of reproof; and their sense is, that Christ's disciples ought to fast, as well as themselves and the Pharisees, with whom they agreed on that subject; and not fast, as they had just done, for instance, at Matthew's house. The fastings here referred to are not the public fasts enjoined by the law of Moses, or otherwise in the Old Testament, but private, enjoined by John on his disciples, and by the Pharisees on their; and which were exceedingly frequent. Luke represents the Pharisees as asking this question, here put by the disciples of John. Doubtless as they both agreed, John's disciples were obligated to it by the Pharisees, who sought to sow discord, and to bring Christ and his disciples into contempt with them. To both the parties our Lord gives a full answer. John has already acknowledged Him as the Bridegroom, (John 3: 29) and so John's disciples should. Now, the young men who attended a marriage as 'friends of the

the children of the bride-chamber; the disciples of the Pharisees were not so, but children of the bond-woman, Gal. 4: 25, 31. Note The faithful followers of Christ, who have the spirit of adoption, have a continual feast, while they who have the spirit of bondage are barren of joy. The disciples of Christ had the Bridegroom with them, which the disciples of John had not; their master was now in prison, in continual danger of his life; therefore, it was seasonable for them to fast often. Such a day would come on the disciples of Christ, when the Bridegroom should be taken from them, and then should they fast. The thoughts of parting grieved them when He was going, John 16: 6. Tribulation and affliction befall them when He was gone, and gave them occasion of mourning and praying, that is, of religious fasting. Note, Jesus Christ is the Bridegroom of his Church, and his disciples the children of the bride-chamber. Christ speaks of Himself to John's disciples under this similitude, because John had used it, when he called himself a friend of the bridegroom, John 3: 29. The condition of those who are the children of the bride-chamber is liable to many changes and alterations in this world; they sing of mercy and judgment. It is merry or melancholy with the children of the bride-chamber, according as they have more or less of the bridegroom's presence. The presence and nearness of the sun makes day and summer, his absence and distance, night and winter. Christ is all in all to the church's joy. Every duty is to be done in its proper season, Eccles. 7: 14. Jan. 5: 13. There is a time to mourn and a time to laugh; to each of which we should accommodate ourselves, and bring forth fruit in due season. In fasts, regard is to be had to the methods of God's grace towards us; also to the dispensations of his providence concerning us; or to any special work before us, ch. 17: 21. Acts 13: 2.

2. They had not strength sufficient for that duty. This is set forth in two similitudes, (v. 16, 17.) Christ's disciples were not able to hear these severe exercises so well as those of John and of the Pharisees, for which Whithy gives this reason: There were among the Jews not only sects of the Pharisees and Essenes, who led an austere life, but also schools of the prophets, who frequently lived in mountains and deserts, and were many of them Nazarites; also private academies to train men up in a strict discipline; and possibly from these many of John's disciples might come, and many of the Pharisees; whereas Christ's disciples, being taken immediately from their callings, had not been used to such religious austerities. Note Some duties of religion are harder, and more difficult than others, (like new cloth, and new wine), which require most intenseness of mind and are most displeasing to flesh and blood.

bridegroom," and were called "children of the bride-chamber," were fed, according to the Jewish canons, from many things as they were otherwise obliged to—specially fasting and mourning. The time of Christ's being with his disciples, between his entrance on his public ministry and his death, is here referred to; and his disciples had then very little care and trouble; it was a season of rejoicing, and that justly. Indeed, the Jew themselves say that "all fasts shall cease in the days of the Messiah," as in Zech. 8: 19.

Christ here referred to some rules of prudence. It was not usual to take a piece of woollen cloth, which had not been scoured and prepared, and join it to an old garment. Nor was it usual to put new wine into leathern bottles going to decay; for the fermenting wine would burst the bottles, and so both be wasted; whereas, by putting new wine into new or strong bottles, both would be preserved. Thus, in duties not essential to religion, but which are helps to excellent things, discretion should be used; and the self-denial required of a man should be proportionate to his knowledge, experience and stability. Else they may tend to discouragement and fatal mistakes. Hopeful persons might be hindered by premature burthens, or rest in them, and make a self-righteousness of them, and that be fatally deluded. So that prudence and tenderness were necessary in dealing with young converts about matters, which, though useful, are not indispensable: that habits and sentiments might not be too violently crossed; and they not receive forbidding ideas of the service their Lord; but opportunities should be waited for, and duties of this kind inculcated, as they were able to bear them. Scott. New cloth. A patch of undressed cloth, rough from the weaver, and which has not passed through the hands of the fuller, or cleaner, shrinks on rubbing wet, and thereby draws up with it something of the old material; and even if not wet, at the two substances never wear well together, one being rigid, and the other supple. BLOOMFIELD. Bottles. Goat-skins, as is well known, are full and 17 Neither do men put new wine into old bottles: else the bottles break, and the wine runneth out, and the bottles perish: but they put new wine into new bottles, and both are preserved.

V. 9-17. Many eminent servants of God have been called not only from low occupations, but from gross iniquity.—Christ appears as powerful in overcoming avarice, as in rebuking tempests, or casting out devils.—Those who have experienced his grace, will pity their former companions in sin, and devise means, and incur expense, to bring them to instruction. We must not associate with ungodly men, from love to their rain conversation; but we may, from good-will to their souls. We should remember that our Physician had the power of healing, and was not liable to infection; not so with us: and we should consider our constitution, and not needlessly go into unwholesome air, lest in doing good to others we receive injury. Let us rather inquire whether we have discovered our sickness, valued our Physician, and followed his directions. For there are yet Pharisees, whole in their own estimation, more disposed to carp at his words and works, than to wait on Him for the healing of their souls. But, if we be humble, and desire salvation, let such are renegous fastings, and the duties that attend it. The best of Christ's disciples pass through a state of infancy; all the trees in his garden are not of a growth; some are babes in Christ, others grown men. In enjoining religious exercises, the weakness and infirmity of young Christians ought to be considered, (1 Cor. 3: 2. Heb. 5: 12.) Christ would not speak to his disciples that which they could not then bear, John 16: 12. Young be sinners in religion must not be put to the hardest duties at first, lest they be discouraged. Such was God's care of his Israel, when He brought them out of Egypt, not to lead them by the way of the Philistines, (Exod. 13: 17, 18.) and such as was Jacob's care of his children and cattle, not to overdrive them; (Gen. 33: 13.) such is Christ's care of the little ones of his family, and the lambs of his flock; He gently leads them. For want of this care, many times, the bottles break, and the wine is spilled; the profession of many comes to nothing, through indiscretion at first. Note, There may be over-doing even in well-doing, such as may prove ruinous, through the subtlety of Satan.

V. 18-26. We have here the raising of Jairus' daughter to life, and the curing of the woman that had the bloody issue, as our Lord was going to Jairus' house. He was called to do these good works in answer to the cavils of the Pharisees, v. 18, and we may suppose it a pleasing interruption given to that unpleasant work of disputation, which, though sometimes needful, a good man will gladly leave, to go about a work of devotion or charity. Here is,

I. The ruler's address to Christ, v. 18.; a ruler of the synagogue. Have any of the rulers believed on Him? Yes, here was one. This ruler had a little daughter, of twelve years old, just dead, and this breach made on his family comforts was the occasion of his coming to Christ. Note, In trouble, we should visit God: the death of our relations should drive us to Christ, who is our life; it is well if any thing will do it. When affliction is in our families, we must not sit down astonished, but, as Job, fall down and worship. Now, observe his humility. He himself came with his errand to Christ, and did not send a servant. Note, It is no disparagement to the greatest rulers personally to attend on the Lord Jesus. He bowed the knee to Him, and gave Him all imaginable respect. Note, They that would receive mercy from Christ must give honor to Christ. See his faith; 'My daughter is even now dead, and though any other physician would now come too late, (nothing more absurd than medicine after death,) yet Christ comes not too late. He is a Physician after death, for He is the resurrection and the life; O come then, and lay thy hand on her, and she shall live.' This was quite above the power of nature, yet within the power of Christ, who has life in Himself; and quickeneth whom He will. Christ now works in an ordinary way, by nature and not against it, and, therefore, we cannot in faith bring Him such a request as this; while there is life there is hope, and room for prayer; but when our friends are dead, the case is determined; we shall go to them, but they shall not return to us. But while Christ was here on earth, such confidence as this was not only allowable, but very commendable.

II. The readiness of Christ to comply with his address, v. 19. He was not only willing to grant him what he desired, in raising his daughter to life, but to gratify him so far as to come to his house. Surely, He never said to the seed of Jacob, seek ye Me in vain. He denied to go along with the nobleman, who said, Sir, come down ere my child die, (John 4: 48, 49, 50) yet went with the ruler of the synagogue, who said, Sir, come down, and my child shall live. The variety of methods Christ took in his miracles, is perhaps to be attributed to the different frame and temper of mind, which they were in who applied to Him, which He who searcheth the heart, perfectly knew. He knows what is in man, and what course to take with him. And observe, when Jesus followed him, so did his disciples, not for state, or that He might come with observation, but He took them with Him, that they might be witnesses of his miracles, who were hereafter to be the preachers of his doctrine.

III. The healing of the poor woman's bloody issue. It was a double aggravation of the misery of her condition, that she had impoverished herself for the recovery of her health, and yet us remember, that He delights in mercy, and came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance; and let us copy his mercy, and use means to bring the vilest of sinners to repentance and faith.—How prone is man to self-preference and censoriousness! Let us beware of this leaven, which corrupts things otherwise good, and turns devotion into abomination. While we judge, as before God, at what seasons the presence of the heavenly Bridegroom calls us to joy and praise, and when his absence requires us to fast and confess our sins, let us not prescribe to others, or prefer ourselves to them on such accounts. There are matters in religion so indispensable, that sinners must be urged to them without delay; and there are others which in due time and manner may be inculcated, but are not needful, and might now prove injurious. Much mischief has been done, in regard to doctrines, observances and austerities, by 'putting new wine into old bottles'; but wisdom is profitable to direct, and should be sought from God. SCOTT.

Notes, Mark 5: 21-43. Luke 8: 40-56. Ruler. (18.) The superintendent of the synagogue and director of the worship. In some synagogues there were several rulers, but one was chief. Some think, that these rulers were magistrates, and presided in the courts of their cities, which were subordinate to the sanhedrim, or great council at Jerusalem. SCOTT. "In the Jewish synagogues, there were no regular teachers, officially qualified to pronounce discourses before the people; at least, none are mentioned in the New Testament. A synagogue preacher has been introduced since. In the time of our Lord, the person who read the section for the Sabbath, or any other who was respectable for learning, and who had a readiness of speech, addressed the people. Anciently, the Jews called those who, from their superior erudition, were capable of teaching in the synagogue, shepherds or pastors. But among those who, in addition to the reader of the Scriptures, were employed in the services and government of the synagogues, was the ruler, who presided over the assembly, and invited readers and speakers, unless some who were acceptable voluntarily offered themselves." Such a fulness of grace is there in Christ, that from it we may all receive, John 1: 16.

2. Christ's great favor to this woman. He did not suspend his healing influences, and now she was well content to be gone; but He will magnify not only his power in her cure, but his grace in her comfort and commendation: the triumphs of her faith must be to her praise and honor. He turned about, (v. 22.) and soon discovered her. Note, It is great encouragement to humble Christians, that they who hide themselves from men, are known to Christ. Now here.

He puts gladness in her heart. She feared being chidden for coming clandestinely, but she is encouraged. He calls her daughter, and speaks with the tenderness of a father, as He did to the man sick of the palsy, (v. 2.) whom He called son. Note, Christ has comforts for daughters of Zion, that are of a sorrowful spirit, as Hannah was, 1 Sam. 1: 15. Believing women are Christ's daughters, and He will own them as such. He bids her be of good comfort: she has reason to be so, if Christ own her for a daughter; the saints' consolation is founded in their adoption. His bidding her be comforted, brought comfort with it, as his saying Be ye whole, brought health with it. It is his will that his people should be comforted, and his prerogative to command comfort to troubled spirits. He creates the fruit of the lips, peace, Isa. 57: 19.

Christ honors her faith, v. 22. That grace most honors Christ, and therefore He most honors that. And as, of all graces, Christ puts the greatest honor on faith, so, of all believers, He puts the greatest honor on those that are most humble. This woman has reason to be of good comfort, not only because she was made whole, but because her faith had made her whole. That cure was wrought in her which is the proper fruit and effect of faith, the pardon of sin and the work of grace. Note, We may then be comforted in our temporal mercies, when they are accompanied with those spiritual blessings that resemble them: in our food and raiment, when by faith we are fed with the bread of life, and clothed with the righteousness of Jesus Christ: in our rest and sleep, when, by faith, we repose in God, and dwell at ease in Him: in our health and prosperity, when, by faith, our souls prosper and are in health. See Isa. 38: 16, 17. Her bodily cure was the fruit of her faith, and that made it a happy, comfortable cure indeed. Those out of whom the devils were cast, were helped by Christ's sovereign power; some by the faith of others; (as v. 2.) but it is thy faith that has made thee whole. Note, Temporal mercies are comforts indeed when received by faith. If, when in pursuit of mercy, we prayed for it in faith, with an eye to the promise, and in dependence on that, if we desired it for the sake of God's glory, and with a resignation to God's will, and had our hearts enlarged by it in faith, love, and obedience, we may say, it was received by faith.

IV. The posture in which he found the ruler's house, v. 23. The house was in a hurry; such work does death make, and, perhaps, the necessary cares that arise when our dead is to be buried out of our sight, give some useful diversion to that grief which is apt to prevail. The people in the neighborhood came together to comfort the parents, and attend the funeral, which the Jews were not wont to defer long. Among them were the musicians, according to the custom of the Gentiles, with ^atheir doleful, melancholy tunes, to increase the grief, and stir up lamentation. Heathenism aggravates that grief which Christianity studies to assuage. Or perhaps these musicians endeavored, on the other hand, to divert the grief and exhilarate the family; but as vinegar upon nitre, so is that singeth songs to a heavy heart. Observe, The parents, who were immediately touched with the affliction, were silent, while the people and minstrels, whose lamentations were forced, made such a noise. The loudest grief is not always the greatest; rivers are most noisy where they run shallow. That grief is most sincere which shuns observation. But notice is taken of this, to show that the girl was really dead, in the undoubted apprehension of all about her.

V. The rebuke Christ gave to this hurry and noise, v. 24. They that harden themselves in sorrow, and, like Rachel, refuse to be comforted, should think they hear Christ saying to their disquieting thoughts, Give place: 'Make room for Him who is the consolation of Israel.' He gives a good reason why they should not thus disquiet themselves; The maid is not dead, but sleeth. 1. This was eminently true of this maid; she was really dead, but not so to Christ, who knew within Himself what He would do, and had determined to make her death but as a sleep. There is little difference between sleep and death, but in continuance. This death must be but of short continuance, and therefore is but a sleep, like one night's rest. He that quickens the dead, may well call the things which be not as though they were. Rom. 4: 17. 2. It is in a sense true of all that die, chiefly of them that die in the Lord. Note, Death is a sleep. All nations and languages have agreed to call it so. It is said, even of the wicked kings, that they sleep with their fathers; and of those that shall arise to everlasting contempt, that they sleep in the dust, Dan. 12: 2. It is not the sleep of the soul, but of the body. Sleep is a short death, and death a long sleep: the death of the righteous is in a special manner to be looked upon as a sleep, Isa. 57: 2. They sleep in Jesus; (1 Thess. 4: 14.) they not only rest from toil and labor, but rest in hope of a joyful resurrection, when they shall wake to a new life, to sleep no more. The consideration of this should moderate our grief at the death of our dear relations: 'say not, they are lost; they are but gone before: say not, they are slain; they are but fallen asleep; and the apostle speaks of it as an absurd thing to imagine that they that are fallen asleep in Christ are perished; (1 Cor. 15: 18.) give place, therefore, to those comforts which the covenant of grace ministers, fetched from the future state, and the glory to be revealed.'

Now, could it be thought that such a comfortable word as this, from the mouth of our Lord Jesus, should be ridiculed as it was? v. 24. These people lived in Capernaum, knew Christ's character, that He never spake a rash or foolish word; they knew what mighty works He had

If I may but touch, v. 21.—'Observe, for it is of great moment to our peace, comfort, and restoration, what faith is; it is a sense of want, earnest desire of help, and application to Jesus for it, with a firm trust in his grace and power. As the ruler and this woman believed in Him, and came to Him for relief in their distress, so must we for our souls. And when we do thus come to Him, we have no more reason to doubt of our faith and all its saving effects, than we have of our wants.'

'Thy faith hath made thee whole' (22) or, 'Thy faith hath saved thee' and the woman was saved, &c. (Luke 7: 50. Acts 4: 12. 16: 30, 31).—The word signifies deliverance from temporal or eternal suffering or danger, to health, peace, or life, according to the context. The power of Christ was the cause of her recovery but faith, by inducing her to apply to Him, secured the benefit, from which unbelievers excluded others. SCOTT. Be of good comfort. done; so that if they did not understand what He meant by this, they might at least have been silent in expectation of the issue. Note, The words and works of Christ which cannot be understood, are not therefore to be despised. We must adore the mystery of divine sayings, even when they seem to contradict what we think ourselves most confident of. Yet even this tended to the confirmation of the miracle: for it seems she was so apparently dead, that it was thought ridiculous to say otherwise.

VI. The raising of the damsel to life by the power of Christ, v. 25. Note, Scorners are not proper witnesses of the wonderful works of Christ. The widow's son, at Nain, and Lazarus, were raised from the dead openly, but this damsel privately; for Capernaum, that had slighted the less miracles of restoring health, was unworthy to see the greater, of restoring life.

Christ went in, as it were, to awake her, prosecuting his own metaphor of her being asleep. The high priest, that typified Christ, was not to come near the dead; (Lev. 21:10, 11.) The Levitical priesthood leaves the dead in their uncleanness, because it cannot remedy them; but Christ, having power to raise the dead, is above infection, and therefore not shy of touching them. He took her by the hand, and the maid arose. The miracle was wrought, not by prayer, as Elijah's (1 Kings 17:21.) and Elisha's, (2 Kings 4:33.) but by a touch. They did it as servants. He as a Son, as God, to whom belong the issues from death. Note, Jesus Christ is the Lord of souls, and commands them as He pleases. Dead souls are not raised to spiritual life, unless Christ take them by the hand: it is done in the day of his power. He helps us up, or we lie still.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 18-26. Superior persons are sometimes brought to Christ by afflictions, which admit no remedy from their distinctions and possessions. When the greatest feel their need of Him, and know his power, they will abase themselves, as much as the meanest, before Him.—Even dutiful children are often a great care to their parents, and the best remedy both for their lives and souls is to apply to Christ; as life and health, spiritual, temporal and eternal, are at his disposal.—How various are the distresses and diseases to which sin has subjected our race! and in how many ways does faith operate amidst the infirmities of those, who are partakers of it! Yet if we, as it were, touch the hem of Christ's garment by faith, our maladies will be healed; but there is no other remedy. We need not fear his knowing those things, concerning us, which are our burden, and which we do not wish to disclose to any friend. We must not, however, desire to conceal our obligations to Him. Our comfort and his glory are concerned in their being known, and when He sees the believer ready to sink with shame and terror, He will, by some token, show us special love. But He often delays to bring intended relief, till affairs come to an extremity; thus proving us, and rendering his mercy more welcome, and our gratitude more abundant.—They, who treat his words with contempt, and expect nothing from Him, are not meet to see his glory.—Even death, to those whom He loves, is only a sleep. They will shortly awake, and share with us in a joyful resurrection. We should not, then, 'sorrow as without hope,' though we expect not their return to us here. And if this instance of Christ's raising one newly dead so increased his fame, what will be his glory, when 'all that are in their graves shall hear his voice, and come forth; they that have done good to the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil to the resurrection of damnation!'

SCOTT

'Minstrels. (23) 'The use of instruments at funerals,' says Hammond, 'was heathen, and came late among the Jews. Their custom was not to begin the lamentation with instruments, but only voices of old women, who in sad modulation strove to extort lamentation from those, who were present.' (Marg. Ref. d.) [Jer. 48:26. Amos 5:16.]

Scott. 'These minstrels were the flute players,' as was usual on such occasions; for musical instruments were employed by the Jews, as well as heathens, in their lamentations for the dead; to soothe the melancholy of surviving friends by soft and solemn notes. There were persons who made it their business to perform this office, and to sing to their music. Many have observed, that, on the death of children, flutes were used, but larger and louder instruments on the death of an adult.' Dodd.

'At the funeral of a wife, "even the poorest among the Israelites," as their writers declare, "will afford not less than two pipes and one woman to make lamentation." LIGHTFOOT. Not dead, &c. (24) 'The words of Christ were spoken to those who were present, first, for her interment, and performing the funeral rites; and only intimate, that she was not so dead as to need their assistance, since He had come, as though to awake her out of sleep.' Whitby. (Marg. Ref. e-g.) 'They laughed Him to scorn,' or derided Him. Scott. 'Not understanding the meaning of our Lord, the people derided Him, as if his assertion had been altogether absurd; but He, not deigning to enter into a clamorous debate, desired them to withdraw, or put them all out; and then, approaching the bed, took her by the hand, and the maid arose.' Dodd.

'The Fountain of life thus communicating vital energy to the dead body. The dead has at last, really occurred, no power but that of God can restore to life. So the evil that is dead in trespasses and sins, that is, sentenced to death because of transgression, and thus dead in law, can be restored to spiritual life by the power of the Lord Jesus only; because He has made the atonement, and He alone can pardon transgression. If the spiritually dead be unconcerned for his soul, let a converted relative either bring him to Christ, by leading him to hear the unadulterated Gospel; or bring Christ to him, by fervent, faithful, persevering prayer.' Dr. A. CLARKE. 'Our Savior, in this passage, seems to allude to the triumph of Christianity over the grave, by calling death, sleep. He used similar language in the case of Lazarus.' His disciples, after Him, adopted the idea, as, they who sleep in Jesus,—first fruits of them that slept, &c. The ancient Christians, still improving on this idea, called a church-yard, a sleeping-place; which we retain in the word, cemetery.' GULPIN. 'The fame thereof went abroad.' (26.) 'It was so great, because her death was publicly known, the minstrels were assembled, every preparation was made for the funeral, the assertion of our Lord was treated with scorn, and the people were convinced of her actual decease.'

The power of Christ was displayed in various ways of beneficence, but not of vengeance; for the destruction of the swine merely by permission was doubtless conducive to good. His miracles were emblematic of the salutary influence of his truth and grace on the souls of men, and nothing is more descriptive of our natural state than blindness. The mind, involved in error by Satan and corrupt passions, continues impotent. But if the understanding be enlightened to see things as they are, the sinner returns to God, and accepts salvation.—Prophets foretold that the Messiah should open the eyes of the blind. (Marg. Ref. a.) and by fulfilling these predictions, Christ first proved Himself to be the Messiah.—It appears, that these blind men met Him immediately after He came out of the ruler's house, and by addressing Him as the 'Son of David,' they acknowledged Him to be the Savior: thus shewing that they understood the Scriptures. Probably they rested their hope of regaining their sight on this prophecy, as well as on the report of his extraordinary miracles. He did not, however, publicly attend to their cries, having already much excited the astonishment of the multitude. But they followed Him into the house, (probably that of Andrew and Peter,) and there He drew from them a confession, of faith in his power to perform the miracle, and then answered their believing expectations. No one but Jesus ever performed a miracle of this kind. (Marg. Ref.)

SCOTT. Son of David. (27.) 'This is the first time we read of this title being given to Jesus, except by the angel Gabriel before his birth, Luke 1:32. By this title He was acknowledged to be the Messiah, or Christ, who, as all Jews agreed, was to be the Son of David; (ch. 23:42. and John 7:42.) and by being the Son of David, Jesus had a right to the title of Messiah, 2 Sam. 7:13, 16.'

we would have Him do for us, we must be fully assured He is able to do. The great question is, Do ye believe? Nature may work fervency, but only grace can work faith. They had intimated their faith in his mercy; but Christ demands it likewise in his power. Believe ye that I am able to give sight to the blind? Note, It is good to be particular in the exercise of faith, and to apply general assurances of God's power and good-will to our special exigencies. All shall work for good, and if all, then this. Believe ye that I am able, not only to prevail with God for it, as a prophet, but to do it by my own power? This will amount to their belief of his being, not only the Son of David, but the Son of God; for it is God's prerogative to open the eyes of the blind; (Ps. 146:8.) He makes the seeing eye, Exod. 4:11. Job was eyes to the blind; (Job 29:15.) that is, instead of eyes; but he could not give eyes to them. Still it is put to us, Believe ye that Christ is able, by his merit and intercession in heaven, his spirit and grace in the heart, and his providence and dominion in the world? To believe the power of Christ, is not only to assure ourselves of it, but to commit ourselves to it, and encourage ourselves in it.

To this question they answer without hesitation: Yea, Lord. He had kept them in suspense awhile, but they honestly imputed that to his wisdom, not weakness, and were still confident of his ability. Note, The treasures of mercy laid up in the power of Christ, are laid out and wrought for those that trust in Him, Ps. 31:19.

The cure, that Christ wrought on them, (v. 29.) He did to encourage their faith, and to show that He gives sight to blind souls by the operations of his grace accompanying the Word, anointing the eyes with eye-salve: and He put the cure on their faith, According to your faith be it unto you; He inquired into their faith, (v. 28.) not into their wealth, whether they were able to pay Him for a cure; nor into their reputation, should He get credit by curing them; but into their faith; and now they had professed their faith, He referred the matter to that. This speaks, 1. His knowledge of the sincerity of their faith, and his acceptance and approbation of it. Note, It is a great comfort to true believers, that Jesus Christ knows their faith, and is well pleased with it. 2. His insisting on their faith as necessary; 'If you believe, take what you come for.' Note, They who apply themselves to Jesus Christ, shall be dealt with, not according to their fancies, or professions, but according to their faith; that is, unbelievers cannot expect to find any favor with God, but true believers may find all favor; and our comforts ebb or flow, according as our faith is stronger or weaker; we are not straitened in Christ, let us not then be straitened in ourselves.

Verse 30.

Our Lord gave this strict charge, not only to avoid the appearance of temptation, but also not needlessly to excite the opposition of enemies, or furnish plausible accusations against Himself; and that the people might not make commotions, as owning Him to be the Messiah and desirous to make Him a king. Straitly charged. Mark 1: 43, 14: 5, John 1: 33, 38. A vehement commotion of mind is implied in this expression, which is often anger; but frequently pity, or earnest persuasion. 'The original word,' observes Hammond, 'is rendered by Pharisaeus, to charge, command, appoint with authority. By Hebraeans, to command, charge with a threat.' It is not passionate, but rational earnestness and vehemence. Note, Mark 1: 40-44.' Scott. The reason has been given, why our Lord would have his miracles not public, but the case is altered now. What we know of Christ must not be lost, as it is.

great things of God, which are hid from the wise and prudent.

Notice their petition, Have mercy on us. They did not each say for himself, Have mercy on me, but both for one another, Have mercy on us. Note, It becomes those that are under the same affliction, to concur in the same prayers for relief. Fellow-sufferers should be joint petitioners. In Christ there is enough for all.

It was foretold that the Son of David should be merciful, (Ps. 72: 12, 13,) and in Him shines the tender mercy of our God, Luke 1: 78. Note, Whatever our necessities and burdens are, we need no more for supply and support, than a share in the mercy of our Lord Jesus. Whether He heal us or no, if He have mercy on us, we have enough; as to the particular instances and methods of mercy, we may safely and wisely refer ourselves to the wisdom of Christ.

See their importunity in this request; they followed Him, crying. It seems He took no notice of them at first, to try their faith, quicken their prayers, and make his cures the more valued when they did come; and He would hereby teach us always to pray, and not to faint; and, though the answer do not come presently, yet to wait for it, and to follow providence, even in those steps and outgoings of it, which seem to neglect or contradict our prayers. Christ would not heal them publicly in the streets, for this was a cure He would have kept private, (v. 30.) but when He came into the house, they followed thither, and came to Him. Note, Christ's doors are always open to believing and importunate petitioners.

When they came to Him He asked them, Believe ye that I am able to do this? Note, Faith is the great condition of Christ's favors. What

He gave them charge to keep it private, (v. 30.) and this, 1. To set us an example of humility and lowliness of mind. Note, In the good we do, we must not seek our own praise, but only the glory of God: It must be more our care and endeavor to be useful, than to be known and observed to be so, Prov. 20: 6, 25: 27. Thus Christ seconded the rule He had given, Let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth. 2. Some think that Christ, in keeping it private, showed his displeasure against the people of Capernaum, who had seen so many miracles, and yet believed not. Note, The silencing of those who should proclaim the works of Christ, is a judgment to any place or people: and it is just with Christ, to deny the means of conviction to those who are obstinate in their infidelity. 3. He did it in discretion for his own preservation; because the more He was proclaimed, the more jealous would the rulers of the Jews be of his growing interest among the people. 4. Whithy gives another reason, which is very considerable, why Christ sometimes concealed his miracles, and afterwards forbid the publishing of his transfiguration; because He would not indulge that pernicious conceit which obtained among the Jews, that their Messiah should be a temporal prince, and so give occasion to the people to attempt the setting up of his kingdom, by tumults and seditions, as they offered to do, John 6: 15. But when, after his resurrection, (the full proof of his mission,) his spiritual kingdom was set up, then that danger was over, and they must be published to all nations. And he observes, that the miracles which Christ wrought among the Gentiles and the Gadarenes, were ordered to be published, because with them there was not that danger.

But honor is like the shadow, which, as it flows from those that follow it, follows those that flee from it; They spread abroad his fame. This was more an act of zeal, than prudence; and though it may be excused, as honestly meant for the honor of Christ, yet it cannot be justified, being done against a particular charge. Whenever we profess to direct our attention to the glory of God, we must see to it that the action be according to the will of God.

II. The healing of a dumb man, possessed with a devil. And here observe,

1. His case, which was very sad, v. 22. How various the afflictions of the afflicted! We have no sooner dismissed two blind men; but we meet a dumb man. How thankful should we be to God for our sight and speech! This man's dumbness was the effect of his being possessed with a devil. When the devil gets possession of a soul, it is made silent as to any thing good. This poor creature they brought to Christ; for though the just shall live eternally by his faith, yet temporal mercies may be bestowed on us through their faith, who are intercessors on our behalf. They brought him in just as the blind men went out. See how unwearied Christ was in doing good; how closely one good work followed another! Treasures of mercy are hid in Him, which may be continually communicated, but can never be exhausted.

2. His cure, which was very sudden, (v. 33.) Note, Christ's cures remove the effect by taking away the cause; they open the lips by breaking Satan's power in the soul. In sanctification He heals the waters, by casting salt into the spring. When Paul was converted, behold he prays; then the dumb spake.

3. The consequences of this cure.

Verse 31.

Their joy, gratitude and amazement rendered them incapable of silence, and regardless of the injunction respecting it. Their motives were doubtless good, but their conduct unjustifiable. Scott. They should have held their peace: for to obey is better than sacrifice; (1 Sam. 15: 22.) but man would be wiser than God. However, it may be profitable to remark, 1. That 'one pursues those who do not do it.' 2. He who is thoroughly sensible of God's mercies cannot long withhold his acknowledgments. 3. God in general requires that what a man has received, for his own salvation, shall be made subservient to the salvation of others; ch. 5: 16. God choosing to help man by man, that all may be knit together in brotherly love. Dr. A. CLARKE.

stances, as the point to be proved, that Christ preached and healed. Some think this was a second perambulation in Galilee, like the former. Though the Pharisees cavilled and opposed, He went on with his work; He preached the Gospel of the kingdom. He told them of a kingdom of grace and glory, now to be set up under the government of a Mediator: this was Gospel indeed, good news, glad tidings of great joy.

Observe how Christ in his preaching had respect to private towns. He visited the poor, obscure villages. The souls of those that are meanest in the world are as precious to Christ, and should be to us, as the souls of those that make the greatest figure. Rich and poor meet together in Him: his righteous acts towards the inhabitants of his villages must be rehearsed, Judg. 5: 11.

Christ regarded also the public worship. He taught in their synagogues; that He might bear a testimony to solemn assemblies, even then when there were corruptions in them; and that He might have an opportunity of preaching where people were gathered together, with an expectation to hear. Thus, even where the Gospel church was founded, and Christian meet-

The multitudes marvelled: though few believed, many wondered. The admiration of the common people is sooner raised than any other affection. It was foretold, that the New Testament song should be sung for marvellous works, Ps. 93: 1. Rev. 15: 3. They said, It was never so seen in Israel. There had been those in Israel that were famous for working miracles, but Christ excelled them all. Moses' miracles had reference to Israel as a people, but Christ's were brought home to particular persons.

The Pharisees blasphemed. When they could not gainsay the evidence of these miracles, they fathered them on the devil, as if they had been wrought by compact and collusion: v. 34. a suggestion horrid beyond expression; we shall hear more of it afterwards, and Christ's answer to it; (ch. 12: 25.) only observe here, how evil men and seducers were worse and worse, (2 Tim. 3: 13.) and it is both their sin and their punishment. Their quarrels with Christ for taking on Him to forgive sin, (v. 3.) for conversing with publicans and sinners, (v. 11.) for not fasting, (v. 14.) though spiteful enough, yet had some color of piety, purity, and devotion in them; but this breathes nothing but malice and falsehood, and hellish enmity; it is diabolism all over, and therefore justly pronounced unpardonable. Because the people marvelled, they must say something to diminish the miracle.

V. 35-38. Here is,

I. A conclusion of the foregoing account of Christ's preaching and miracles; (v. 35.) as in ch. 4: 23. There it ushers in the more particular record of Christ's preaching, (ch. 5, 6, and 7.) and of his cures, (ch. 8 and 9.) and here it is elegantly repeated in the close of these instances, as the point to be proved, that Christ preached and healed. Some think this was a second perambulation in Galilee, like the former. Though the Pharisees cavilled and opposed, He went on with his work; He preached the Gospel of the kingdom. He told them of a kingdom of grace and glory, now to be set up under the government of a Mediator: this was Gospel indeed, good news, glad tidings of great joy.

The spectators of these stupendous miracles said, "It was never so seen in Israel," even where prophets had wrought great miracles.—"This relation was just; for no prophet appears to have wrought so many beneficent miracles in his life, as our Lord in one afternoon." This may admit doubt, but is worthy of attention. It is not recorded, that either prophet or apostle ever enabled the dumb to speak. It was predicted that the Messiah would do this, and it was performed by Jesus only; as showing Him exclusively to be the Messiah. (Note, Is. 35: 6-7.) Scott. "From the circumstance of this demoniac's being dumb, Erasmus conjectured that he was also deprived of the use of reason." As if, so being insensible of his own misery, he had as little inclination as ability to apply for a cure: and needed to be brought to the Savior by others. But, when cured, he spoke both rationally and fluently, to the astonishment of all who heard him; so that they extolled the Author of the miracle above all the prophets who had ever appeared.

The Pharisees, unable to deny the reality of the miracle, and fearing, lest the people should conclude, that Jesus was the Messiah, declared, that it was wrought by the power of the prince of the devils: for Jesus, being in league with the master and leader of fallen spirits, availed Himself of this authority to cast out evil spirits, that He might give a sanction to his false doctrine. What answer Christ now made to this charge, is unknown, but on another occasion He confuted and exposed it fully. (Notes, 12: 22-37.) Scott. "Those who beheld our Savior's miracles admitted, it appears, that they were performed; though on such evidence they would not embrace the Gospel, conceiving it contrary to the Mosaic law, whose obligation their carnal views led them to believe was eternal. They therefore ascribed these miracles to magical and diabolical agency. Their hostility, indeed, gives confirmation to the truth. Had the Jews been universally or even generally converted by the Gospel miracles, the skeptic might argue, with some plausibility, that the facts had been invented or exaggerated to gratify the rational propensity, and had been credited without examination or proof. On the contrary, we are now certain the Gospel miracles were wrought in the presence of enemies, and thus subjected to the severest scrutiny; and that they carried with them conviction to multitudes, notwithstanding the fierce opposition of national prejudice, ignorant vice, and the strictest research of the most vigilant hostility."

ings erected, the apostles often preached in the synagogues of the Jews. It is the wisdom of the prudent to make the best of that which is.

II. A preface, or introduction, to the account in the following chapter, of sending forth his apostles. He took notice of the multitudes, (v. 36.) not only of the crowds that followed him, but what abundance of people there were in every synagogue, and what places of concourse the openings of the gates were: so very populous was that nation now grown; and it was the effect of God's blessing on Abraham. Seeing this,

1. He pitied them, and was concerned for them; (v. 36.) not as He pitied the blind, and lame, and sick; but to see them ignorant and careless, and ready to perish for lack of vision. Note, Jesus Christ is a very compassionate Friend to precious souls. It was pity to souls that brought Him from heaven to earth, and to the cross. Misery is the object of mercy; and the miseries of sinful, self-destroying souls, are the greatest miseries: Christ pities those most that pity themselves least; so should we. The most Christian compassion is compassion to souls; it is most Christ-like. See what moved this pity. They fainted; they were destitute, vexed, wearied. They strayed; so some; were loosed one from another; The staff of bands was broken, Zech. 11: 14. They wanted help for their souls. The scribes and Pharisees filled them with vain notions, burdened them with the traditions of the elders, deluded them into many mistakes, but they were not instructed in their duty, nor acquainted with the extent and spiritual nature of the divine law; therefore they fainted. Precious souls faint when duty is to be done, temptations to be resisted, afflictions to be borne, being not nourished up with the word of truth. They were scattered abroad, as sheep having no shepherd. That expression is borrowed from 1 Kings 22: 17. and it sets forth the sad condition of those that are destitute of faithful guides to go before them in the things of God. No creature is more apt to go astray than a sheep, and when gone astray, none more helpless, and exposed, or more unapt to find the way home: sinful souls are as lost sheep; they need the care of shepherds. The teachers the Jews then had, pretended to be shepherds, yet Christ says they had no shepherds, for these were worse than none; idol-shepherds, that led them away, instead of leading them back,

Verse 35.

Synagogues. The temple was the centre of life worship appointed for Israel by the law, and no sacrifices might be offered elsewhere: but in times it was found necessary to have other places for public prayer and instruction. Hence synagogues were built, and, after the captivity, became general in the cities and villages. They were very numerous, in proportion, than churches and chapels with us. Learned men think, the forms of worship were used on certain days in the week, as well as on the Sabbath, and portions of Scripture read in them; so that they were useful in keeping the people from idolatry. The Levites and scribes might commonly officiate, but the service was not restricted to them: they had rulers, but no regular pastors, or teachers so that competent persons exhorted, if disposed, or desired to do it; and so each other, when the Jews resided. Christ taught in these synagogues, and none hindered Him.—It was common for divines to expound the lesson which was read. This belonged ordinarily to sons of the prophets, brought up in learning the law: at thirty years old they might be made doctors, and continue under that name, or that of scribes, till they obtained the spirit of prophecy; in proportion to which was the difference in the Christian church betwixt the evangelist and the doctor or teacher; the first, planting the Gospel, and telling them good news; the other, watering, or instructing them further in it. Hammond.—But it is plain that others than scribes or doctors were allowed to expound the Scriptures, and give exhortations in the synagogues, [see the benefit of many and the glory of God.] He goes about, not doing for himself, but to diffuse his benefactions. For He is not by and not by inferior ministers. The word synagogue, was first used by the LXX for the congregation, or company assembled; (Ex. 12: 6, 19, 47.) but was at length appropriated to the place of meeting. Thus church, a word of similar import, first meant the assembly, but gradually was used for the building in which there was an assembly. look discouraging, we should pray more, and then we should complain and fear less. And such an understanding we ought to have of the times, as to know, not only what Israel ought to do, but what Israel ought to pray for. Note, God is the Lord of the harvest; my Father is the husbandman, John 15: --. It is the vineyard of the Lord of hosts, Isa. 5: 7. It is for Him and to Him, and to his service and honor, that the harvest is gathered in. Ye are God's husband and feed the flock instead of feeding it: such shepherds as were described, Jer. 23: 1, &c. Ezek. 34: 2, &c. Note, The case of those people is very pitiable, who either have no ministers at all, or those that are as bad as none; that seek their own things, not the things of Christ and souls.

2. He excited his disciples to pray for them. It appears, (Luke 6: 12, 13.) that on this occasion, before He sent them out, He Himself spent a great deal of time in prayer. Note, Those we pity we should pray for. Having spoken to God for them, He turns to his disciples, and tells them how the case stood; (v. 37.) There was a great deal of work to be done, but hands were wanting to do it. It was an encouragement, that the harvest was so plentiful. It was not strange that there were multitudes needing instruction, but that they who needed it, desired it, and were forward to receive it. Note, It is a blessed thing, to see people in love with good preaching. The valleys are then covered with corn, and there are hopes it may be well gathered in. That is a gale of opportunity, that calls for double care and diligence: a harvest day should be a busy day. It was pity that the laborers should be so few, that the corn should shed and spoil, and rot on the ground for want of reapers: loiterers many, but laborers very few. Note, It is ill with the church, when good work stands still, or goes slowly on, for want of good workmen.

He tells them their duty in this case, (v. 38.) Note, The melancholy aspect of the times, and the deplorable state of precious souls, should much excite and quicken prayer. When things bandry; (1 Cor. 3: 9.) has threshing, and the corn of his floor, Isa. 21: 10. He orders every thing concerning the harvest: as He pleases, when and where the laborers shall work, and how long; and it comforts those who wish well to the harvest work, that God Himself presides in it, who will be sure to order all for the best. Ministers are, and should be, laborers in God's harvest; the ministry is a work, and must be attended to accordingly; a work that requires every thing to be done in its season, and diligence to do it thoroughly; but it is pleasant work; they reap in joy, and the joy of the preachers of the Gospel is likened to the joy of harvest; (Isa. 9: 2, 3.) and he that reapeth, receiveth wages; the hire of the laborers that reap under God's field, shall not be kept back, as theirs was, Jam. 5: 4. It is God's work to send forth laborers; Christ makes ministers; (Eph. 4: 11.) the office is of his appointing; the qualifications, of his working; the call, of his giving. They will not be owned nor paid as laborers, that run without errand, unqualified, uncalled. How shall they preach except they be sent? All that love Christ and souls, should show it by earnest prayers to God, especially when the harvest is plentiful, that He would send forth more skilful, faithful, wise, and industrious laborers into his harvest; would raise up such as He will own in the conversion of sinners and edification of saints; would give them a spirit for the work, call them to it, and succeed them in it; that He would give them wisdom to win souls; that He would thrust forth laborers, so some; intimating unwillingness in them to go forth, because of their own weakness and the people's badness, and opposition from men who endeavor to thrust them out of the harvest; but we should pray that all contradiction from within and from without may be conquered. Christ puts his friends on praying this, just before He sends apostles forth to

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 27-39. Still we are astonished with the Redeemer's power and love. Let sinners, then, copy the example of these blind men; let them stand before Christ; let them beseech Him to have mercy on them, and open their eyes to behold his glory; let them persist in their entreaties, and in due time He will help them. In every respect, we need to cry unto Him daily to 'increase our faith'; that we may believe Him to be able and willing to do for us whatever pertains to our salvation. If faith be in us, love and power will be in Him.' He will say, 'according to your faith be it unto you,' and, instead of being deprived of so great pleasure, we shall be sent to proclaim 'his praises, who called us from darkness to light.' While sinners are under the power of Satan, they cannot speak to any good purpose; but, when Christ delivers them, their 'mouths are opened to shew forth his praise.' We ought, then, to bring to Him those, who are unwilling to come, and entreat Him for those, whom Satan so possesses that they will not pray.—Nothing can convince the proud and malicious, that the humbling doctrines of Scripture are the truth of God. They will believe any absurdity rather than his divinely authenticated Word: and the injurious reflections, which they cast on those who diligently do good to men, shew their enmity against a holy God. We should, then, go on in our work without regarding them. And, since multitudes now are as 'sheep without a shepherd,' we should pity and help them. The harvest yet to be reaped (and soon, according to prophecy,) is plentiful. The laborers are very few. We should earnestly pray the Lord to send forth many, who will gather souls to Christ. When God shall stir up Christians to attend to this neglected duty, we may expect the dawning of those days, in which the Gospel shall be known and believed all over the earth. SCOTT.

his steps," and not suffer any outward circumstances to make us forget our Christian profession." Bp. HORNE.

Multitudes came from distant places to hear Christ's instructions, and appeared not only languishing in soul, for want of better teaching, but also ready to faint with hunger and fatigue. In both senses they were as 'sheep having no shepherd.' There were priests, Levites, and scribes all over the land, but they were idol shepherds. (Note, Zech. 11: 15-17.) and Christ pitied the people, as 'perishing for lack of knowledge.' In the prospect of the vast multitude, which would be gathered from Jews and Gentiles into the church, He declared, that a plentiful harvest was growing, which it would require many laborers to reap; but that few deserved this character. It was, therefore, the duty of the disciples, to pray the Lord of the harvest to send forth laborers, that is, able, faithful, diligent, and effective ministers.—Christ Himself is the 'Lord of the harvest,' and in the next chapter we read that He sent forth laborers; but the disciples apparently did not understand Him to speak of Himself.—The expression translated 'send forth,' signifies, 'thrust forth,' and implies the impulse of God necessary to overcome the diffidence and reluctance of humble and able men, to enter on that important work, especially when it would expose them to peril and hardship.—Cast them out; for men are very slow in a work so holy. Herz. 'From this discourse, we learn things to be regarded by the pastors of Christ's flock. (1.) He who does not feed his flock with "the sincere milk of the Word," and teach them the things that belong to their eternal peace, from a heart of love to God, and to the souls of his charge, deserves not the name of a true shepherd: for the want of these in the scribes and Pharisees, made Christ say that the Jews were "as sheep without a shepherd." (2.) When the harvest is great, and many ready to receive instruction, we should be more diligent to afford it them. (3.) When either we are not called to the work or placed in another station, we should pray fervently that God would raise up men fit to instruct them, zealous for his glory, and "of the good of souls." Whitby. This last remark is applicable to the

SCOTT. *It is deeply interesting to those who in our day contemplate the still ripening field of the world, and especially to American Christians, to find the venerable Dr. Scott, in his sermon alluded to above, making the following remarks:—"It is my decided opinion, that nothing could more effectually promote the cause, not only of missions, but of Christianity in all respects, than a general concern among all Christians, when they pray, to remember the case of unconverted sinners, the heathen, and the poor Jews, with that of missions and missionaries, and the sending forth of laborers; and also the raising up of missionaries and ministers among the natives of the countries we attempt to evangelize. This would excite a missionary spirit, but is especially urged from a full conviction, that it will be the introduction, when God is about to "fill the earth with his glory, as the waters cover the sea." An early acquaintance with the writings of President Edwards, Brainerd, and the New England divines, gave my mind," he adds, "a peculiar turn to this subject. The nations unacquainted with Christ have ever since lain near my heart; and I never thought a prayer complete in which they were wholly forgotten. This was several years before the new societies in England for missions were established: but I could do no more than offer my feeble prayers. New and animating scenes have since opened to our view, and I live to recommend again the missionary cause, and that with most unreserved cordiality. It ought to be dearer a concern to us than our lives. Oh, may we pour out for its success our "silly, fervent prayers, and beseech the Lord of the harvest Himself to send forth laborers into his harvest."

committed to them, before they were commissioned to be Gospel ministers. To give men authority to teach, who have not ability, is but a mockery to God and the church: it is sending a message by the hand of a fool, Prov. 26: 6. Christ taught his disciples before He sent them forth; (ch. 5: 2.) and afterwards, enlarging their commission, gave them more ample instructions, Acts 1: 3.

NOTES

CHAP. X. v. 1-4. It is generally supposed that the apostles had been called to a constant attendance on Christ some time before, as candidates for important service. (Notes, Mark 3: 13-19. 6: 7-12.) At length they were solemnly appointed, and endowed by their Lord with power to cast out unclean spirits and heal diseases in his name, to confirm their doctrine; and sent forth, two and two, into the land, to prepare the people to receive Him.—Our Lord's 'giving power' to his apostles to work miracles, and the Holy Ghost communicating the same powers to those or whom they laid their hands, was justly considered by the fathers as a proof of his Deity, and as absolutely unparalleled in the order or course of history. God put of his Spirit on those, whom Moses ^{was} appointed, but Moses did not give them power. The spirit of Elijah, in answer to his own prayer, rested on Elisha; Elijah did not give him power. (Notes, Num. 11: 16. 17: 25. 2 Kings 2: 9-11.) Scott. In this first call to the Christian ministry, the end proposed appears by the commission given. To call persons to the ministry, belongs only to Him, who can give them power to cast out unclean spirits. He whose ministry is not accompanied with healing to diseased souls, was never called of God. But though the requisite spiritual gifts for the ministry must be supplied by God Himself, this does not preclude the importance of human learning. The influence of the Spirit no more renders human learning needless, than human learning supercedes the necessity of divine inspiration.

Dr. A. CLARKE.

labor in the harvest. Note, It is a sign God is about to bestow some special mercy on a people, when He stirs up those that have an interest at the throne of grace, to pray for it, Ps. 10: 17. Further observe, Christ said this to his disciples, who were to be employed as laborers. They must pray, first, That God would send them forth. Here am I, send me, Isa. 6: 8. Note, Commissions, given in answer to prayer, are most likely to be successful; Paul is a chosen vessel, for behold he prays, Acts 9: 11, 15. Secondly, That He would send others forth. Note, Not the people only, but those who are themselves ministers, should pray for the increase of ministers. Though self-interest makes those who seek their own things desirous to be placed alone, (the fewer ministers the more preferences,) yet those who seek the things of Christ, desire more workmen, that more work may be done, though they be eclipsed.

CHAP. X. v. 1-4. Observe,

I. The persons Christ ordained as his apostles or ambassadors. He had called them, some time before, to be disciples, his followers and constant attendants; and now fulfils his promise, that they should become fishers of men. Note, Christ commonly confers honors and graces by degrees; the light of both, like that of the morning, shines more and more. Hitherto He had kept them, in a state of probation, though He knew them from the first, (John 6: 70.) to give an example to his church. Note, The ministry being a great trust, it is fit men should, before they are intrusted with it, first be proved, 1 Tim. 3: 10. Hands must not be laid suddenly on any man; but let him first be observed as a candidate and probationer, a propositant, (so the French churches,) because some men's sins go before, others follow, 1 Tim. 5: 22, 24. He had also kept them in a state of preparation for this great work. Note, Those whom Christ intends for, and calls to, any work, He first prepares and qualifies for it. He prepared them, by taking them to be with Him. Note, The best preparation for the work of the ministry, is acquaintance and communion with Christ. Those who would serve Christ, must first be with Him, (John 12: 26.) Paul had Christ revealed, not only to Him, but in Him, before he went to preach Him among the Gentiles, Gal. 1: 16. By lively acts of faith, and frequent prayer and meditation, that fellowship with Christ must be maintained. He also prepared by his teaching. They were with Him as pupils; besides the benefit derived from his public preaching. He taught them privately; He opened the Scriptures to them and opened their minds to understand the Scriptures: to them it was given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, and to them they were made plain. Note, They that design to be teachers, must first be learners; they must receive, that they may give; they must be able to teach others, 2 Tim. 2: 2. Gospel truths must be

II. Their commission. Our Lord called them to Him, v. 1. He now admits them to greater familiarity. They that humble themselves shall be exalted. The priests under the law were said to draw near unto God, nearer than the people. The same may be said of Gospel ministers. They are called to draw near to Christ and should remember that He will be sanctified in those that come nigh unto Him. When the disciples were to be instructed, they came unto Him of their own accord, ch. 5: 1. Now they are to be ordained, Christ calls them. Note, It becomes the disciples of Christ to be more forward to learn, than to teach. In the sense of our own ignorance, we must seek opportunities to be taught; and must wait for a call, ere we take it upon us to teach others. He gave them authority, in his name, to command men to obedience; and, for confirming that authority, to command devils also into subjection. Note, All rightful authority is derived from Jesus Christ. All power is given to Him; and subordinate powers are ordained of Him. Some of his honor He put on his ministers, as Moses did on Joshua. Note, It is an undeniable proof of the fulness of Christ's power as Mediator, that He could enable those He employed to work, in his name, the same miracles that He wrought. He gave them power over unclean spirits, and all manner of sickness. Note, The design of the Gospel was to conquer the devil, and to cure the world. These preachers were sent out destitute of external advantages; having no wealth, learning, or titles of honor: it was therefore requisite that they should have some extraordinary power, to advance them above the scribes.

He gave them power against unclean spirits, to cast them out. Note, The power committed to Christ's ministers, is directed against the devil and his kingdom. This unclean spirit is working both in doctrinal errors, (Rev. 16: 13.) and practical debauchery; (2 Pet. 2: 10.) in both which ministers have a charge against him. Christ gave them power to cast him out of the bodies of the people; but it signified the destruction of his spiritual kingdom, and all his works; for which purpose the Son of God was manifested.

He gave them power to heal all manner of sickness; authorizing them to work miracles, to prove that their doctrine was of God; and useful miracles, to prove it not only faithful but worthy of all acceptance; and that the design of the Gospel is to heal and save. Many of Moses' miracles were for destruction; the pretended miracles of Mahomet, for ostentation; but those of Christ and his apostles were all for edification, and evince Him to be, not only the great Teacher and Ruler, but Redeemer of the world. Observe the emphasis laid on the extent of their power, to all manner of sickness and all manner of disease, without exception. Note, There is balm for every wound, in the grace of the Gospel. No spiritual disease is so malignant, none so inveterate, but Christ can cure it. Let none therefore say, there is no hope.

III. Their number and names. They are made apostles, that is, messengers, or those that are sent on an errand, ambassadors. [2 Cor. 5:

(2.) Peter was named first, as being one of the earliest followers of Christ, and first called to a stated attendance on Him, and whose remarkable zeal and piety rendered him a kind of leader among them. This text, however, does not prove the authority of Peter over his brethren, which we never find declared by Christ, or claimed by Peter, or owned by any of the rest of the apostles; but rather find many Scriptures which appear to look a contrary way. See Matt. 23: 8-12. Acts 15: 13, &c. 2 Cor. 12: 11. and Gal. 2: 11. Doddridge. 'It is worthy of notice, that those who were Christ's apostles were first his disciples; to intimate that men must be taught of God before they are sent of God.'

ones of the earth are buried in the dust. Observe, Of some of the twelve we know from Scripture no more than the names, as Bartholomew and Simon the Canaanite; yet were they faithful servants to Christ and his church. Note, All good ministers of Christ are not alike famous, nor their actions alike celebrated.

They are named by couples; for at first they were sent out two and two, because two are better than one; they would be serviceable to each other, and the more so to Christ and souls; what one forgot, the other would remember, and out of the mouth of two witnesses every word would be established. Three couples of them were brethren; Peter and Andrew, James and John, and the other James and Lebbeus. Note, Friendship and fellowship should be preserved among relations, and made serviceable to religion. It is happy when brethren by nature are brethren by grace, and those two bonds strengthen each other.

Peter is named first, either as first called; or as the most forward man among them, who on all occasions made himself the mouth of the rest; and who was to be the apostle of the circumcision; but that gave him no power over the other apostles; nor is there the least mark of any supremacy given to him, or claimed by him.

Matthew, the penman of this Gospel, is here joined with Thomas, (v. 3.) but in two things his account differs from that of Mark, and (1 Luke, Mark 3: 18. Luke 6: 15. There, Matthew is first; in that order it appears he was ordained; but here, in his own catalogue, Thomas is put first. Note, It becomes Christ's disciples in honor to prefer one another. There, he is only called Matthew; here Matthew, the publican, toll-gatherer, or collector of the customs, who was called from that infamous employment to be an apostle. Note, It is good for such as are advanced to honor with Christ, often to look unto the rock whence they were hewn, and remember what they were before Christ called them; that thereby they may be kept humble, and divine grace be glorified.

Simon is called the Canaanite; or rather Cananite, from Cana of Galilee, where probably he was born; or Simon the Zealot, which some think to be meant.

Judas Iscariot is always named last, and with that black brand, who also betrayed Him: intimating that, from the first, Christ knew what a wretch he was, that he had a devil, and would prove a traitor; yet our Lord took him among the apostles, that it might not surprise and discourage his church, if, at any time, the vilest scandals should break out in the best societies. Such spots there have been in our feasts of charity, tares among the wheat, wolves among the sheep: but a day of discovery and separation is coming, when hypocrites shall be unmasked and discarded. Neither the apostleship, nor the rest of the apostles, were the worse for Judas' being one of the twelve, while his wickedness had not broken out.

V. 5-15. Christ instructed his disciples,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-6. The Lord does not encourage us to pray for any thing, which He is not ready to bestow. 'From his fulness' ministers receive their qualifications, even as the apostles received their miraculous powers. He is our Head of authority, the Fountain of honor, wisdom and holiness, and all true ministers receive their commission and instructions from Him, in whatever way they obtain their outward designation to that office. Though they cannot cure men's bodies, yet, by the power of Christ, they are healers of souls, and deliverers from the possession of the devil.—Whatever the world may think, the names of the apostles are far more justly honorable, than those of monarchs, conquerors, philosophers and legislators, who are renowned in human records; and from this nothing should be deducted, because one of them had been a publican, and others fishermen. They all were sinners saved by grace; and they spake and acted as if conscious of it: and having been deeply humbled for their sins, and joyful in God's salvation, they were full of love to their Savior, and longed to recommend Him to sinners on every side. This is the peculiarity of the minister, who is 'moved by the Holy Ghost to take this office'; but many have the outward appointment, who are strangers to this inward desire.—There was a traitor, of indelible infamy, among the apostles; and this will be proportionately so with all in this office, who seek their own, not the things of Christ.—Providence must direct us where to minister, as we are now authorized to preach the Gospel to every creature. There are 'lost sheep' in every land, and we must seek them wherever scattered, that they may be brought home to 'the Shepherd and Bishop of our souls.'

'The same as Zelotes,' observes Rosenmüller, the Hebrew word translated Canaanite, or rather Canite, signifying zealous; and, as Doddridge remarks, 'given possibly on account of personal zeal for the law; for, as he notices, the sect of Zelotes did not arise until afterward, 'a little before the destruction of Jerusalem.' WHITBY.

Verses 5, 6.

When Christ sent forth the apostles. He gave them special warnings and instructions, many of which regarded their whole future ministry. He forbade them, at that time, to go to the Gentiles, or into any city of the Samaritans. He had once indeed preached with success in a city of Samaria; (John 4: 23-42.) yet his ministry and that of his apostles before his ascension were chiefly confined to the Jews, that they might not be prejudiced, or have a pretence for rejecting the Gospel: for the change was to be gradual, and the unbelief of the Jews to make way for calling the Gentiles. The apostles therefore were commanded, to 'go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel.' The term 'lost sheep,' intimated that the Israelites, though by profession the flock of Christ, had in general wandered from Him, were destitute of faithful shepherds, and in danger of perishing; even as the Samaritans and Gentiles. (Marg. Ref.—Note 9: 33-35.) SCOTT. 'Properly speaking, the inhabitants of the city of Samaria should be termed Samaritans; but this epithet belongs chiefly to the people sent into that part of the promised land by Salmanaizer, king of Assyria. A. M. 3283, when he carried the Israelites who dwell there captives beyond the Euphrates, and sent a mixed people, principally Chaldees, to dwell in their place. These were altogether heathens at first; but afterwards incorporated the worship of the true God with that of their idols. See the whole account, 2 Kings 17: 5. &c. From this time they 'feared Jehovah and served other gods,' till after the Babylonish captivity. From Alexander the Great, Sanballat, their governor, obtained permission to build a temple upon mount Gerizim, which the Jews conceiving to be in opposition to their temple at Jerusalem, hated them with a perfect hatred, and would have no fellowship with them. The Samaritans acknowledge the divine authority of the law of Moses, and carefully preserve it in their own characters, probably genuine, ancient Hebrew character now called Hebrew being that of the Chaldeans. The Samaritan Pentateuch is printed in the London Polyglot, and is an undeniable record. A poor remnant of this people is found still at Naplouse, the ancient Shechem; but they exist in a state of very great poverty, and probably will soon become extinct.' Dr. A. CLARKE. 'By an usual historical anticipation, Matthew connects the mission of the twelve apostles with their selection and appointment, as if it followed immediately. There was probably, however, an interval of half a year or more from their appointment, before they were sent forth, and accordingly Mark and Luke separate these two events, and interpose several occurrences between them.' Dr. HALS. 'Lost sheep, &c. The Jewish church was the ancient fold of God; but the sheep had strayed from their Shepherd, and were lost. Our blessed Lord sends these under-shepherd, to seek, find, and bring them back to the Shepherd and Overseer of their souls.'

He sent them not without an errand; no: As ye go, preach, v. 7. They were to be itinerant preachers: wherever they go, they must proclaim the beginning of the Gospel, saying, the kingdom of heaven is at hand. Not that they must say nothing else, but this must be their text, on which they must enlarge; letting the people know that the Messiah, the Lord from heaven, was now to set up his kingdom, according to the Scriptures; and that therefore they must repent and forsake their sins, to be admitted to its privileges. It is said, (Mark 6:12.) they went out and preached that men should repent; which was the proper use and application of the doctrine concerning the approach of the kingdom of heaven. They must expect therefore to hear more of this long-looked-for Messiah shortly, and be ready to receive Him, and submit to his authority. The preaching of this was like the morning light, to give notice of the approach of the rising sun. How unlike to the preaching of Jonah, which proclaimed ruin at hand! Jonah 3:4. This proclaims salvation, as nigh them that fear God; mercy and truth meet together; (Ps. 85:9,10.) that is the kingdom of heaven at hand: not so much the personal presence of the King; which must not be doated on; but a spiritual kingdom to be set up,

Verses 7, 8.

(Note 3:2.) The apostles were ordered in every place to proclaim, as heralds, privately and publicly, the grand doctrine which John and Christ himself had preached: for their ministry was introductory to the open establishment of the Messiah's kingdom. To confirm their mission, they were to work miracles, and even raise the dead. This latter clause is not in some manuscripts, but is in the earliest. Yet it is not recorded that they raised any dead before the descent of the Holy Spirit; but this clause is referred to the subsequent as well as the introductory part of their ministry. They were prohibited to make any personal advantage of miraculous powers, as selling the gift of God for money; (Note, Acts 8:13-24.) but must confer the benefit freely as they received it. They who urge this text against preachers receiving a maintenance for their labor, pervert it, and set it against plain declarations of the New Testament. It is however desirable, that a decided superiority to 'the love of filthy lucre' be observable in ministers.—Doubtless, Judas preached and wrought miracles, as the other apostles; and probably, for credit's sake, neglected to make any gain of his miraculous gifts; at least he was not suspected by the other apostles. (Note 7:21-25.)

The power He gave them to heal, He has super-abundantly in Himself for our healing; and He is our Jesus only so far as we own Him for that end.

Verses 9, 10.

The command 'freely to give,' and the prohibition 'to provide' should be compared together. The apostles (and all ministers) were required to be eminently disinterested; yet they must trust God for support even where they were strangers. They were not to carry money or provisions in a scrip, or bag; or clothes, or shoes; or any extraneous staff: for the Lord engaged to provide for them, by disposing those when He gave them their commission; whether in a continued discourse or otherwise, is not material. Here He commanded them. Jacob's blessing his sons, is called his commanding them, and with these commands, Christ commanded a blessing. Observe,

1. To what people He sent them. They must not go into the way of the Gentiles. The Gospel must not be given to them, till the Jews have first refused it. Nor to the Samaritans, who were the posterity of that mongrel people which the king of Assyria planted about Samaria. Their country lay between Judea and Galilee; so that they could not avoid going into the way of the Samaritans, but they must not enter into any of their cities. Christ had declined manifesting Himself to the Gentiles or Samaritans, and therefore the apostles must not preach to them. If the Gospel be hid from any place, Christ thereby hides Himself from it. The restraint was on them only in their first mission; after that, they were appointed to go into all the world, and teach all nations.

But Christ now sent them to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. To them He appropriated his own ministry, (ch. 15:24.) for He was a minister of the circumcision; (Rom. 15:8.) to them therefore his attendants must be confined. The first offer of salvation must be made to the Jews, Acts 3:26. Note, Christ had a particular and very tender concern for the house of Israel; they were beloved, for the fathers' sakes, Rom. 11:28. He looked with compassion on them, as lost sheep, whom He, as Shepherd, was to gather from their wanderings, or they would wander endlessly; Jer. 1:6. The Gentiles also had been as lost sheep.

1 Pet. 2:25. Christ gives this description of those to whom they were sent, to quicken their diligence in the work.

11. The work He appointed them. He sent them not without an errand; no: As ye go, preach, v. 7. They were to be itinerant preachers: wherever they go, they must proclaim the beginning of the Gospel, saying, the kingdom of heaven is at hand. Not that they must say nothing else, but this must be their text, on which they must enlarge; letting the people know that the Messiah, the Lord from heaven, was now to set up his kingdom, according to the Scriptures; and that therefore they must repent and forsake their sins, to be admitted to its privileges. It is said, (Mark 6:12.) they went out and preached that men should repent; which was the proper use and application of the doctrine concerning the approach of the kingdom of heaven. They must expect therefore to hear more of this long-looked-for Messiah shortly, and be ready to receive Him, and submit to his authority. The preaching of this was like the morning light, to give notice of the approach of the rising sun. How unlike to the preaching of Jonah, which proclaimed ruin at hand! Jonah 3:4. This proclaims salvation, as nigh them that fear God; mercy and truth meet together; (Ps. 85:9,10.) that is the kingdom of heaven at hand: not so much the personal presence of the King; which must not be doated on; but a spiritual kingdom to be set up, when his bodily presence is removed, in the hearts of men. This was the same that John the Baptist and Christ had preached before. Note, People need to have good truths pressed again and again upon them: and if they be preached and heard with new affections, they are as if they were fresh. Christ in the Gospel is the same yesterday, to-day and forever Heb. 13:8. When the Spirit was poured out, and the Christian church formed, this kingdom of heaven came: but it must still be the subject of preaching: now it is come, we must tell the people it is come to them, and lay before them its precepts and privileges; and speak of the kingdom of glory yet to come, as at hand, and quicken people to diligence, from the consideration of that.

III. Their power to work miracles, v. 8. Sending them to preach the same doctrine He had preached, our Lord empowered them to confirm it by the same divine seals, which would never be set to a lie. But miracles are not necessary, since the kingdom has come. To call for them now, is to lay again the foundation when the building is reared, and would be to tempt God.

The apostles are directed to use their power in doing good, not, 'Go, and remove mountains,' or 'fetch fire from heaven,' but heal the sick, cleanse the lepers. They are sent abroad as public blessings, to intimate that love and goodness are the spirit and genius of that Gospel which they came to preach, and of that kingdom they were employed to set up. By this it would appear, that they were the servants of that God who is good and doeth good, and whose mercy is over all his works; and that the design of the Gospel is to heal sick souls, and raise those that are dead in sin. This is the reason, perhaps, why raising the dead is spoken of; for we read not of their raising any to life before the resurrection of Christ, though they were instrumental in raising many to spiritual life.

Christ directs them to do good, freely: freely ye have received, freely give. Having power to heal all diseases, they might enrich themselves. Therefore they are cautioned not to make use of their power to that end: they must cure gratis, further to exemplify the nature of the Gospel of free grace. (Rom. 3:24.) Freely by his grace. Let medicines be bought without money and without price, (Isa. 55:1.) because, freely, ye have received. Their power to heal the sick cost them nothing, and therefore they must not make any secular advantage to themselves of to supply them among whom they went. This supply they might conscientiously take, as the laborer is worthy of maintenance.—The word rendered 'purses' signifies girdles; travellers carried money for use in a pocket or fold of their girdles.—Ministers must cast away all cares that hinder them.—'Provide neither gold,' &c. that is, for this journey, that they might trust God's providence; for at their return the Lord asked them whether they lacked any thing. Luke 22:35. Beza. "He is worthy of his food," not, says Theophylact, 'of delicias; for 'it becomes not a teacher to fare deliciously.' (Note, 1 Tim. 5:17,18.) Scott. Nor scrip.] 'To carry provisions. It was a leathern pouch hung about the neck, in which they put their victuals. This was, properly, the shepherd's bag.' The workman is worthy, &c.) The apostles were, then, to take no forththought or be solicitous, even in providing necessaries.

taken under special protection, and entitled to special provisions. Christ's hired servants shall have bread enough and to spare: while we are careful to maintain fidelity to God and our duty, we may cast all our other care on God: the Lord will provide for us and ours, as He thinks fit. They might expect necessary provision from those to whom they were sent, v. 10. The workman is worthy of his meat. They must not look to be fed, as Elijah was, but might depend on God to incline the hearts of those among whom they went to provide for them. Those who serve at the altar may not expect to grow rich, but to live comfortably, 1 Cor. 9: 13, 14. It is fit they should have their maintenance for their work. Ministers are and must be workmen, laborers; and such are worthy of their meat, so as not to be forced to any other labor to earn it. Christ would have his disciples distrust neither God nor their fellow-men. If you preach to them, and endeavor to do them good, surely they will provide enough for your necessities; and if they do, never desire dainties. God will pay you wages hereafter.

V. Their directions in dealing with any place, v. 11-15. Our Lord taught them how to conduct themselves toward strangers. When you come to a town, inquire who in it is worthy. It is supposed there would be some in every place better disposed than others, to receive them and their message, though it was a time of general corruption and apostasy. Note, In the worst times and places, we may charitably hope there are some who oppose vice and error. There were saints in Nero's household. Inquire who is worthy, who fear God, and have improved their light and knowledge. The best are far from meriting the Gospel offer; but some would be more likely than others to give it a favorable reception. Note, Previous dispositions to that which is good may both direct and encourage ministers in dealing with people. There is most hope where the world is most acceptable. Such persons they must inquire out, not the best inns; public houses were no proper places for them that neither took money with them, (p. 9.) nor expected to receive any; (p. 8.) but they must look for accommodations in private houses, with those that would entertain them well, and expect no other recompense but a prophet and an apostle's reward, their praying and preaching. Note, They that would entertain the Gospel, must neither grudge the expense of it, nor promise themselves gain by it in this world. Christ's disciples, wherever they come, should ask for, not the rich and genteel, but the good people of the place, and be acquainted with them. When we took God for our God, we took his people for our people; and like will rejoice in its like. Paul in all his travels found out the brethren, if there were any. Acts 28: 14. It is implied, that if they inquired who was worthy, they might find. The character of the good man, like the ointment of the right hand, betrays itself. Every body knew where the seer's house was, 1 Sam. 9: 18. In the house of such as they found worthy, they must continue till they left town; which intimates that they were to make so short a stay, that no change would be necessary. Those

The apostles were to inquire, on arriving at any place, what persons of repute for integrity and piety resided there, and address them with the first proposal of the Gospel; and, if received, to abide with them till they left the place; so as not to appear capricious, dissatisfied with accommodations, or desirous of entertainments. On entering a house, they must salute its inhabitants in the customary way, wishing the blessing of God to be communicated to them, and proposing the Gospel of peace and salvation; and if they were disposed to welcome it, the blessing would rest on them, and the messengers of Christ would instruct and pray for them. But if not, the labors of the apostles would return in blessings on themselves.—It is said, that the imperative is here used for the future tense; and it seems to direct ministers how to act in such cases. When the proposal was obstinately rejected, they must, in leaving the place, 'shake off the dust of their feet.' (Marg. Ref. k.) It recorded, that the Jews, in coming from heathen lands, thus shook off the dust that clung to them as afraid of polluting the holy land, and renouncing connection with idolaters; so that the apostles would be understood as decidedly protesting against the conduct of these persons, and declaring, that they regarded them equally criminal with the Gentiles themselves.—To this injunction, our Lord solemnly added, 'it shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom and Gomorrah, in the day of judgment,' than for those of such a city. Their obstinate unbelief, and such opportunities of conviction, would evince greater enmity against God, than all the abominations of Sodom, and though they might are justly suspected, as having no good design, that are often changing their quarters. Note, It becomes the disciples of Christ to make the best of that which is, to abide by it, and not stand on every dislike or inconvenience.

Where they found the house of one they thought worthy, they were to salute it. In common civilities, be beforehand with people, in token of your humility. Think it not a disparagement, to invite yourselves into a house, nor stand on the punctilio of being invited. Salute the family, to draw on further discourse, and introduce your message, and to try whether you are welcome or not. Take notice if the salutation be received with shyness and coldness, or with a ready return. He that will not receive your salutation kindly, will not receive kindly your message; for he that is unfaithful in little, will also be in much, Luke 16: 10. To obtain their good opinion, salute the family, and let them see, that, though you are serious, you are not morose. Note, Religion teaches us to be courteous and obliging to all with whom we have to do. Though the apostles went out under the authority of the Son of God himself, yet, when they came into a house, they were not to command it, but to salute it; for love's sake rather to beseech, is the evangelical way, Phil. 4: 9. Souls are first drawn to Christ with the cords of a man, then kept to Him by the bands of love. Hos. 11: 4. When Peter made the first offer of the Gospel to Cornelius, a Gentile, Peter was first saluted; Acts 10: 25. For Gentiles courted that to which Jews were courted.

After saluting the family in a godly manner, they must, by the return, judge concerning it, and proceed accordingly. Note, God notices what entertainment we give good people and good ministers. If the house be worthy, let your peace come and rest upon it; if not, let it return to you, v. 13. Though the most worthy were inquired for, they might light on the most unworthy. Note, It is wisdom to hearken to, but folly to rely on, common report: we are to practise discretion, and see for ourselves. The wisdom of the prudent is, himself to understand his own way. This rule is intended,

First, For satisfaction to the apostles. The common salutation was, Peace be unto you; which, as they used it, was turned into Gospel, the peace of God, or of the kingdom of heaven. Now, lest they should scruple to pronounce it on all promiscuously, many being utterly unworthy, this is to clear them of that scruple. Christ tells them that this Gospel-prayer should be put up for all, as the Gospel-proffer was made to all, indefinitely; and that they should leave it to God, who knows the heart, to determine the issue. If the house be worthy, it will reap the benefit; if not, no harm is done; the benefit shall return to you, as David's prayers for his enemies did, Ps. 35: 13. Note, It becomes us to judge charitably of all, to pray heartily for all, and to conduct courteously to all, and leave it for God to determine the effect.

Secondly, For direction to them. If, on your salutation, they appear indeed worthy, let escape punishment here, yet in the day of judgment their doom would be more intolerable. (Marg. Ref.) Scott. 'In the commencement of Christianity,' observes Dr. A. Clarke, 'Christ and his ministers were all itinerant,' and he takes occasion from our Lord's direction, 'There abide,' &c. to paraphrase thus: 'Stay in your lodging as much as possible, that you may have time for prayer and study. He who knows the value of time, and will redeem it from useless conversation and trifling visits, will find enough for all the purposes of his own salvation, the cultivation of his mind, and the work of the ministry. As to whom it is not precious, and who live not by rule, never finds time sufficient for any thing; is always embarrassed—always in a hurry, and never capable of bringing one good purpose to effect.' This, if not specially contemplated in our Lord's direction, of which the comment of Dr. Scott above appears to give the true scope, is yet excellent advice, and worthy the serious regard of ministers and missionaries; still, the friend of the Redeemer must be ever 'zealous of good works'; and, like the philosopher of whom La Bruyere writes, 'ready to lay aside his pen, and interrupt a sentence, whenever a benefit may be conferred on such as need it.'

(12.) Peace be, &c. 'The custom of saluting friends after this manner is still retained among the Turks, and other eastern nations.' Doorn. 'Hence that saying of the rabbins, "Great is peace" for all other blessings are comprehended in it.' Dr. A. Clarke

(13.) Your peace shall come. Or, 'Let it come—the imperative for the future, as 1 Cor. 16: 22. At 1 perhaps many seem to use it

14 And 'whosoever shall not receive you, nor hear your words; when ye depart out of that house or city, shake off the dust of your feet.

15 'Verily I say unto you, 'It shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom and Gomorrah, in the day of judgment, than for that city.

[Practical Observations.]

o Luke 10:9. Acts 20:29.

In this case, our Lord directs that they must depart out of that house or city. Note, The Gospel will not tarry long with those that put it away from them. At their departure, they must shake off the dust of their feet, in detestation of their wickedness; which even polluted the ground they went on. They must have no fellowship or communion with them; nor carry away so much as the dust of their city with them. The work of them that turn aside shall not cleave to me, Ps. 101: 3. The prophet was not to eat or drink in Bethel, 1 Kings 13: 9. This would be as a denunciation of wrath against them. It was to signify that they were base and vile as dust, and that God would shake them off. The dust of the apostles' feet would witness against them, Mark 6: 11. Compare James 5: 3. See this practised, Acts 13: 51.

18: 6. Note, Those who despise God and his Gospel shall be lightly esteemed. Christ passes a doom on such wretched recusants, v. 15. It shall be more tolerable, in the day of judgment, for the land of Sodom, wicked as it was. Note, A day of judgment is coming, when all who refuse the Gospel will be called to account, however they may now make it a jest. They that would not hear the doctrine that would save, shall hear the sentence that will ruin them. Their judgment is respited till that day. There are different degrees of punishment. All pains of hell will be intolerable, but some more so than others. Some sinners sink deeper into hell than others, and are beaten with more stripes. The condemnation of those that reject the Gospel will in that day be them have more of your company, and so let your peace come upon them; preach the Gospel to them, peace by Jesus Christ: but if otherwise, and they be rude, and shut their doors against you, let your peace, as much as in you lies, return to you. Retract what you have said, and turn your backs upon them; by slighting this, they have made themselves unworthy of the rest of your favors.' Note, Great blessings are often lost by a seemingly small neglect. Thus Esau lost his birthright, (Gen. 25: 34.) and Saul his kingdom, 1 Sam. 13: 13, 14. The case is put, (v. 14.) of those that would not receive them, nor hear their words. The apostles might think that now they had such doctrine to preach, and power to work miracles, no doubt they should be universally made welcome: they are therefore told before, that there would be those who would slight them, and condemn their message. Note, The best preachers of the Gospel must expect that some will neither hear nor respect them. Many turn a deaf ear, even to the joyful sound, and will not hearken to the voice of charmers, charming never so wisely. Observe, 'they will not receive you, and will not hear your words.' Note, Contempt of the Gospel, and contempt of Gospel-ministers, commonly go together, and will either of them be construed into a contempt of Christ, and reckoned for accordingly.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 7-15. It is needful to introduce the Gospel by 'preaching repentance towards God,' as well as 'faith in our Lord Jesus Christ;' for his kingdom cannot be set up in an impenitent heart. Nothing is more important to usefulness than to avoid the appearance of being mercenary. Many, who profess great things, with some ambiguous reference to the power of Christ, and faith in Him, stand detected, in the view of antient inquirers, by this mark: 'They make their pretensions a lucrative trade, and turn their apparent gifts into money.' Of employments by which men grow rich, or aggrandize their families, none is more infamous, than that of a hireling minister; and it is honorable for such as have the means of subsistence, to preach the Gospel to the poor as freely, as they received it; yet those who have not, may receive a maintenance, 'for the laborer is worthy of his meat.' And if they have but little prospect of support, they should labor with diligence, casting all their care on the Lord. He will provide what is needful: and they will see his hand, and taste his love in their temporal provision, more than those who have abundance: nor need they scruple to receive what is thus conferred; as it will not deduct from the true dignity of the ministerial character.—The preacher is an ambassador of peace, and his commission reaches the vilest sinners; yet he should associate tion in the Old Testament may most easily be accounted for, by such an explanation—as prophetic predictions of what should happen to the enemies of God and his people. Domus. Return to you. 1. La. Henniker, in his Travels into Egypt, says, that if a Mussulman salutes a Christian, by mistake, with the usual phrase, 'peace be unto you,' on discovering his mistake, he insists on the other's revoking or returning his peace.

Verses 14, 15.

'We should be grateful, that ambassadors of Christ have proclaimed the Gospel, with an enlarged commission, extending to the end of the world, Ps. 19: 4. May they, who have, as ministers, succeeded to the honor, speak and act as messengers of peace, and friends of mankind, who cordially wish well to all.' Let them show true greatness of mind, in superiority to mere temporal interests, and present gratifications; forgetting themselves to remember their Master, and the souls He commits to their care. Let them faithfully warn men of their eternal condemnation, and of the unutterable danger of receiving the grace of God in earlier than that of Sodom and Gomorrah. Sodom is said to suffer the vengeance of eternal fire, Jude 7. But that vengeance will come with aggravation on despisers of the salvation of the Gospel. Sodom and Gomorrah were exceedingly wicked, (Gen. 13: 13, and what filled up the measure of their iniquity was that, they received not the angels sent to them, but abused them, (Gen. 19: 4, 5.) and hardened not to their words, v. 14. And yet it will be more tolerable for them than for such as reject Christ's ministers, and hearer not to their words. God's wrath against them will be more flaming, and their own reflections more cutting. Son, remember, will sound most dreadfully in the ears of those, who had fallen from the measure of eternal life, and chose death. The iniquity of Israel, when God sent them his servants the prophets, is represented as, on that account, more heinous than the iniquity of Sodom; (Ezek. 16: 48, 49.) much more now He sent them his Son, the great Prophet.

V. 16-42. Christ's ministers are here taught, not only to expect and prepare for sufferings, but how to bear them, and go on with their work in the midst of them. This looks beyond their present mission; for we find not that they met any great hardships or persecutions, while Christ was with them; but they are here forewarned of the troubles they should meet, when, after Christ's resurrection, their commission should be enlarged and the kingdom of heaven, now at hand, be actually set up; when, though they dreamed of pomp and power they must expect greater sufferings than they yet had felt; and should there be prisoners where they hoped to be princes. It is good to be told what troubles we may meet, that we may provide accordingly, and not boast as if we had put off the harness, when we are yet but girding it on.

We have here,

1. Predictions of trouble. Christ foretold the sufferings of his disciples, as well as his own, and yet He would have them go on as He went on: He foretold them also, not only that troubles might not surprise and shock them, but that, as accomplishing a prediction, they might confirm their faith.

He tells them what they shall suffer, and from whom. Behold, I send you forth as sheep in the midst of wolves, v. 16. And what may with the pious; for though self-righteousness indisposes men to receive the Gospel, yet the fear of God is a preparation for it.—Ministers should be manifestly consistent in their conduct, and indifferent to outward accommodations. Their demeanor should be expressive of benevolence; their friendly language, fervent prayers, and pious discourse, should be substituted for the compliments and flatteries by which many hide their selfishness.—Labor in the cause of Christ is never in vain, and the prayers of his servants will bring blessings on themselves. Their good-will must not turn into timidity: the whole counsel of God must be declared: and they who do not attend to the message, must be shewn decidedly, by words and deeds, that their conduct is abhorred and their state dangerous. This will be done with better effect by declining to associate with them, and having no fellowship in their pursuits.—The Gospel is so authenticated by external and internal evidence, and so manifests its authority to every man's conscience, that all who reject it 'hate the light, because their deeds are evil.' So that, even when enemies of the truth are free from enormities in their conduct, their doom will be more dreadful in a future state, than that of the people of Sodom. This should be laid to heart by those who hear the Gospel, lest their privileges increase their future condemnation.

vain. And may all such have this token, that God will take care of their interests; even the consciousness of being engaged to promote his glory and the welfare of souls. (2 Cor. 12: 15.) Domus. Day of judgment. If men are thus treated for not seeing the preachers of the Gospel, what will it be to despise the Gospel itself—to deny it—to preach the contrary—to hinder the preaching of it—to abuse those who do preach it in purity—or to render it fruitless by calumnies and lies? Dr. A. CLARKE.

It was needful for the apostles to count their cost, and 'prepare for affliction; for they would be apprehended, delivered up, as criminals, to the councils of the nation, and condemned to be scourged in the synagogues, where consociations in ecclesiastical affairs were held; nay, they would be brought before the Roman governors for their attachment to Christ, and thus have an opportunity of declaring his Gospel to them, which, if neglected, would be a testimony against them.

malefactors. They will deliver you up to the councils, (v. 17, 18.) that take care of the public peace. Note, Much mischief is often done to good men, under color of law and justice. In the place of judgment there is wickedness, persecuting wickedness, Eccl. 3:16. They must look for trouble, not only from inferior, but superior magistrates, from governors and kings. To be brought before them, under such black representations as were commonly made of Christ's disciples, was dreadful and dangerous: for the wrath of a king is as the roaring of a lion. We find this often fulfilled in the Acts of the Apostles.

They must expect to be put death; (v. 21.) They shall deliver them to death; death, in its most dreadful forms. It is the blood of the saints that their enemies thirst after; whose faith and patience stand firm to expect it: Neither count I my life dear to myself: the wisdom of Christ permits it, knowing how to make the blood of the martyrs the seed of the church. By this noble army's not loving their lives to the death, Satan has been vanquished, and the kingdom of Christ and its interests greatly advanced. Rev. 11:11. They were put to death as criminals; so the enemies meant it, but really as sacrifices, (Phil. 2:17. 2 Tim. 4:6.) as burnt-offerings, sacrifices of acknowledgment to the honor of God, and in his truth and cause. In their sufferings, they would be branded with most odious and ignominious names and characters. Persecutors would be ashamed in this world, did they not first represent as monsters those they worry, in order to justify their cruelties. The blackest of all the ill characters they give them is here stated, Beelzebub, the name of the prince of the devils, v. 25. They represent them as ringleaders under him; and since every one thinks he hates the devil, they thus endeavor to make them odious to mankind. See, and be amazed to see, how this world is imposed on. Satan's sworn enemies are represented as his friends; the apostles who pulled down the devil's kingdom, were called devils. Thus men laid to their charge, not only things which they knew not, but things which they abhorred. Satan's sworn servants would be thought his enemies; and never more effectually do his work, a flock of poor, helpless, unguarded sheep expect, in the midst of a herd of ravenous wolves, but to be worried and torn? Note, Wicked men are like wolves, whose nature it is to devour and destroy. God's people, and specially his ministers, are like sheep, of a contrary nature, exposed, and commonly an easy prey. It looked unkind in Christ to expose to so much danger those who had left all to follow Him; but He knew that the glory reserved for his sheep at his right hand, would be a recompense sufficient for sufferings as well as services. They are as sheep among wolves; a frightful thing! but it is comforting, that Christ sends them forth: for He that sends will protect them, and bear them out. Yet, that they might know the worst, He tells them particularly what they must expect. Ye shall be hated for my name's sake: that is the bitter root of all the rest. Note, Those whom Christ loves, the world hates: as whom the court blesses, the country will curse. If the world hated Christ without cause, (John 15:25.) no marvel if it hate those who bear his image, and serve his interests. We hate what is nauseous; and they are counted as the scourging of all things, 1 Cor. 4:13. We hate what is noxious; and they are counted troublers of the land, (1 Kings 18:17.) and tormentors of their neighbors, Rev. 11:10. It is grievous to be hated; but it is for thy name's sake; which, as it speaks the true reason of the hatred, whatever is pretended, speaks also comfort to the sufferers. It is for a good cause; and they have a good Friend who shares it, and takes it to Himself.

They would be apprehended and arraigned as malefactors. They will deliver you up to the councils, (v. 17, 18.) that take care of the public peace. Note, Much mischief is often done to good men, under color of law and justice. In the place of judgment there is wickedness, persecuting wickedness, Eccl. 3:16. They must look for trouble, not only from inferior, but superior magistrates, from governors and kings. To be brought before them, under such black representations as were commonly made of Christ's disciples, was dreadful and dangerous: for the wrath of a king is as the roaring of a lion. We find this often fulfilled in the Acts of the Apostles.

is denoted in the words, "I send you as sheep," and the condition of an unbelieving world by these, "in the midst of wolves." Though the faith was to be propagated only by the mild measures of persuasion, yet even this would provoke the wolfish dispositions of the powers of darkness, to employ all the iniquitous contrivances of fraud and violence for its suppression.

So frankly did our Lord warn his apostles of the hardships and dangers that would surround them. Nothing could be more fair, nothing more generous. Peculiar dangers and trials awaited them. But all that will tell us godly in Christ Jesus must expect some degree of persecution; (2 Tim. 3:12.) let us therefore arm ourselves with the same mind.—"Be prudent as serpents," said our Lord, "in avoiding unnecessary dangers; though far from imitating their malignity and revenge, and by no inadvertency give your opponents advantage against you; but maintain at all times a holy simplicity of soul, and be harmless and offensive as doves." Serpents were, by the ancients, considered remarkable for sagacity. There is peculiar vivacity in their eyes; so that to be sharp-sighted as a serpent, was a proverb among the Greeks and Romans.

The wisdom of the serpent might seem to include guile, the simplicity of the dove to intimate a defect of wariness. Our Savior requires such a temper of both, that from the union might result a perfect wisdom, free from all subtlety, and a well-guarded innocence, without any indiscretion.

Innocence without prudence, will not do for this world; but prudence without innocence will not do for the next; nor always even for than when they pretend to be fighting against him. Many times they who are nearest akin to the devil are most apt to father others upon him; and those that paint him on others' clothes have him reigning in their own hearts. It is well, there is a day coming, when (as in 26.) that which is hid shall be brought to light.

These sufferings are represented by a sword and division, v. 34, 35. Think not I am come to send peace: they thought Christ came to give his followers wealth and power in the world; 'no,' says our Lord, 'I did not come to give them peace; peace in heaven they may be sure of, but not peace on earth.' Christ gives peace with God, peace in our consciences, peace with our brethren, but, in the world ye shall have tribulation. Note, Those mistake the design of the Gospel, who think their profession of it will secure them from trouble; it will certainly expose them to it in this world. If the world would receive Christ, universal peace would follow; but while so many reject Him, the children of God, who are called out of the world, must expect its enemy.

Look not for peace, but a sword. Christ gives the sword of the Word, with which his disciples fight against the world; and conquering work it has made: (Rev. 9:4. 19:21.) by sending the Gospel, He has given occasion also for drawing the sword of persecution, with which the world fights against his disciples, being cut to the heart, (Acts 7:54.) and tormented by the testimony of his witnesses; (Rev. 11:10.) and cruel work this sword has made. Christ orders his church into a suffering state, for the trial and praise of his people's graces, and the filling up of the measure of their enemies' sins.

Look not for peace but division. (v. 35.) I am come to set men at variance. This effect is not the fault of the Gospel, but of those who will not receive it. When some believe the things that are spoken, and others believe not, the faith of those that believe condemns the unbelievers, and they hate the believing. Note, The most violent and implacable of feuds have arisen from difference in religion: no enmity like that of the persecutors, no resolution like that of the persecuted. Thus Christ tells his disciples what they should suffer, and these were hard sayings; if they could bear these, they could bear any thing. Note, Christ has dealt fairly and faithfully with us, in telling us the worst we can meet in his service; and He would have us deal so with ourselves, in counting the cost.

They are here told from whom, and by whom, they should suffer these hard things. Surely hell itself must be let loose, and devils, those desperate and despairing spirits, that have no part nor lot in the great salvation, must become incarnate, ere such spiteful enemies could be found to a doctrine, the substance of which was good will towards men, and the reconciling of the world to God: no; would you think it? all this mischief arises to the preachers of the Gospel, from those to whom they came to preach salvation. Thus the blood-thirsty hate the upright, but just seek his soul; (Prov. 29:10.)

From professing men, who have a form of godliness, and make a show of religion. They will scourge you in their synagogues, or places of meeting to worship God, and exercise church-discipline: so that they looked on the scourging of Christ's ministers as part of their religion. Paul was five times scourged in their synagogues, 2 Cor. 11: 24. The Jews, under color of real for Moses, were the most bitter persecutors of Christ and Christianity, and reckoned it to the score of their religion. As far as the apostasy from God goes, so far goes the enmity against the saints; more appears at one time than at others, but there is something of it ever lurking in the hearts of all the children of disobedience. The world hates you, for it wonders after the beast, (Rev. 13: 3.) Every man is a liar, therefore a hater of the truth.

Verses 19, 20.

The apostles were brought up in obscurity, unlearned, and not used to speak before assemblies, or potentates; and so might fear lest they should dishonor the cause, by impropriety of language. But they had no need to be solicitous for as they had not to plead their own cause, but that of Christ. He would suggest what they should speak; and thus their answers would not be so much their own, as those of the Holy Spirit speaking by them. (Marg. Ref. c.)—The case was extraordinary; neither the direction, nor the promise is applicable to common cases; yet every minister and Christian is authorized to expect adequate assistance. Take no thought. (19.) Note, 6: 25.

SCOTT.
‘This assurance and assistance was needful to the first preachers of the Gospel, who would otherwise have been dismayed, when brought before governors and kings. In Acts 4: 18. is an example of the accomplishment of both the prophecy and promise. Christians now, when placed in trying circumstances, ought certainly to prepare themselves, and provide beforehand what they should speak. Yet in this, as in other things, they should not be anxious, but “cast their care upon God,” and rely on the aid of his Holy Spirit, that with all “boldness” they shall be enabled to “speak the word;” that utterance shall be given them, and the grace of Him whom they serve prove “sufficient for the occasion.” This reliance will do more for them than much solicitude.’

Verses 21, 22.

The apostles might suppose that harmless conduct, beneficent miracles, and the glad tidings of the Messiah's coming, would conciliate favor. But Christ told them, that they would experience rancorous enmity from near relations: for the Gospel being contrary to the preju-and therefore heavier is so much opposed on earth, because earth is, so much under the power of hell, Eph. 2: 2.

These hard things Christ's disciples must suffer.

1. From men, (v. 17.) ‘Beware of men. You must stand on your guard, even against those who are of the same nature with you—such is the depravity and degeneracy of that nature—man is a wolf to man,’ crafty and politic as men, but cruel and barbarous as beasts, and wholly divested of humanity. Note, Persecuting rage and enmity turn men into brutes, into devils: Paul at Ephesus fought with beasts in the shape of men, 1 Cor. 15: 32. Sad is it for the world, when the best friends it has had need beware of men. It aggravates the Christian's sufferings that they arise from those who are bone of his bone, made of the same blood. Even savage bears agree among themselves. It is very grievous to have men rise up against us, (Ps. 124.) from whom we might expect protection and sympathy; men, and no more: mere men, not saints; natural men, (1 Cor. 12: 14.) men of this world, Ps. 17: 14. Saints are more than men, redeemed from among men, and therefore hated by them. The nature of man, if it be not sanctified, is the worst nature in the world, next to that of devils. They are men, and therefore subordinate, dependent, dying creatures; they are men, yet they are but men, (Ps. 9: 20.) and who art thou that thou shouldst be afraid of a man that shall die? Isa. 51: 12. Beware of the men, so Dr. Hammond; the men of the Jewish Sanhedrim, which disallowed Christ, 1 Pet. 2: 4.

3. From great men, men in authority. The Jews not only scourged them, which was all their remaining power extended to; but, when they could go no further, delivered them up to the Romans, as they did Christ, John 18: 30. Ye shall be brought before governors and kings, (v. 18.) who, having more power, can do more mischief. Governors and kings receive their power from Christ; (Prov. 8: 15.) but, instead of serving Him, and protecting his church, often use their power against Him, and oppress his church. The kings of the earth set themselves against his kingdom, Ps. 2: 1, 2. Acts 4: 25, 26. Note, It has often been the lot of good men, to have great men for their enemies. [1 Kings 22: 8.]

4. From all men, (v. 22.) Ye shall be hated of all men, all wicked men; and these are the generality of men, for the whole world lieth in wickedness. So few favor the cause of Christ, that we may say, the friends of it are hated of all men; they are all gone astray, and, therefore, eat up my people as bread, Ps. 14: 3. 5. From their own kindred. The brother shall deliver up the brother to death, v. 21. A man shall be, on this account, at variance with his own father; nay, those of the weaker and tenderer sex shall become persecutors and persecuted, and that where natural affection, one would think, should prevent or soon extinguish the quarrel; and no marvel, if the daughter-in-law be against the mother-in-law, where too often the coldness of love seeks occasion, if contention, v. 35. In general, (v. 36.) a man's foes shall be they of his own household. Those who should be his friends will be incensed against him for embracing Christianity, and join his persecutors. Note, Enmity against Christ and his doctrine has often broken the strongest bonds of relative love and duty. Such has been the prejudice against true religion and zeal for false, that all other regards have been sacrificed to these Molochs. They who rage against the Lord and his anointed ones, break even their bands asunder, and cast away even these cords from them. Ps. 2: 2, 3. Christ's spouse suffers hard things from the anger of her own mother's children, Cant. 1: 6. Sufferings from such are more grievous; nothing cuts in it as this, It was thou, a man, mine equal: (Ps. 55: 12, 13.) and the enmity of such is commonly most implacable: a brother offended is harder to be won than a strong city, Prov. 18: 19. The martyrologies, ancient and modern, abound with instances of this. On the whole, it appears, that all that will live godly in Christ Jesus, must suffer persecution; and through many tribulations we must expect to enter into the kingdom of God.

II. With these predictions of trouble, we have counsels and comforts prescribed. Our Lord sends them out exposed, indeed, but well armed. He counsels and directs them,

1. Be wise as serpents, v. 16. ‘You may be so,’ as some take it; ‘be wary as you please, provided you be harmless as doves.’ But it is rather to be taken as a precept, recommending that wisdom of the prudent, which is to understand his way, and useful at all times, but especially in suffering times. Therefore, because you are exposed as sheep among wolves be ye wise as serpents; not as foxes, whose cunning is to deceive others, but as serpents; whose policy is to defend themselves, and shift for their own safety.’ The disciples of Christ are hated and persecuted as serpents, therefore they need the serpent's wisdom. Note, Christ's will is, that his people and ministers, exposed as they usually are, should not needlessly expose themselves, but use all proper means for their preservation. Christ gave us an example of this, ch. 21: 24, 25. 22: 17, 18, 19. John 8: 6, 7, besides the many escapes He made from his enemies, till his hour was come. See an instance of Paul's wisdom, Acts 23: 6, 7. In the cause of Christ, we must sit loose to life and its comforts, but not be prodigal of them. It is the wisdom of the serpent, to secure his head, dices and lusts of men, interfering with their projects, and opposed by the evil spirit which ‘work in the children of disobedience,’ would cause convulsions in cities and nations, and excite the jealousy of rulers: it would throw men into parties, and produce controversies and furious persecutions. Then the enemies of the truth would forget the ties of consanguinity and alliance; brethren would accuse one another, and procure each other's death: parents would prosecute their children to death, and even children would rise against their parents to procure their execution: nay, Christians would be hated for the sake of Christ by all, except such as embraced the Gospel. This would expose them, to sufferings that might tempt them to apostatize. But they who would cleave to the Lord should be preserved, and recompensed with eternal felicity; while apostates would be finally lost. (Marg. Ref.)

Cause to be put to death. (21.) Rom. 8: 13.—‘Kill them.’ For the iniquitous persecutor is the real murderer. He that endureth (22.) Note, Heb. 12: 2, 3, v. 3.—Note, Jam. 1: 12. The word implies not only suffering, but being tried, and standing the trial. This hypotheses cannot endure—Judas did not endure unto the end. ‘He that endureth to the end of the persecution from the Jews shall be saved from the destruction coming on them.’ Whitty. This may be implied: but surely, endurance to the end of life, and final salvation, are mainly intended.

that it may not be broken; to stop his ear to the voice of the charmer, (Ps. 58: 4, 5.) and take shelter in the clefts of the rocks; and herein we may be wise as serpents. We must be wise, not to pull trouble on our heads; wise to keep silence in an evil time, and not to give offence, if we can avoid it.

2. Be ye harmless as doves. 'Be mild, meek, dispassionate; not only do no one hurt, but bear no one ill-will; be without gall, as doves.' They are sent forth among wolves, therefore must be wise as serpents; but sent forth as sheep, therefore must be harmless as doves. We must be wise, not to wrong ourselves, but rather so than wrong another; must bear twenty injuries rather than offer or return one. Note, It must be the continual care of all Christ's disciples, to be innocent and inoffensive in word and deed, especially considering the enemies who surround them. We have need of a dove-like spirit, when beset with birds of prey, that we neither provoke them, nor be provoked by them. David coveted the wings of a dove, on which to fly away and be at rest, rather than those of a hawk. The Spirit descended on Christ as a dove; and all believers partake of the Spirit of Christ, a dove-like spirit, made for love, not war.

3. Beware of men, v. 17. Be always on your guard, avoid dangerous company, and presume not too far on any man's fidelity; be jealous of the most plausible pretensions: trust not in a friend, nor, not in the wife of thy bosom, Micah 7: 5. Note, It becomes those who are gracious to be cautious, for we are to cease from man. We live in such a world that we know not whom to trust. Ever since our Master was betrayed with a kiss, by one of his disciples, we have need to beware of men, of false brethren.

4. Take no thought how or what ye shall speak, v. 19. 'When brought before magistrates, be prudent and respectful, but not anxious, perplexed or disquieted. As in relation to support, so here, cast all your care on God. Do not study by fine speeches to ingratiate yourselves; elegant expressions, flourishes of wit and labored periods only gild a bad cause; the gold of a good one needs them not. To be solicitous, argues distrust, as if your cause did not speak for itself. You know on what grounds you go, and suitable expressions will readily occur.' Never any spoke better before governors and kings, than those three champions who took no thought before, what they should speak: O Nebuchadnezzar, we are not careful to answer thee in this matter, Dan. 3: 16. See Ps. 119: 46. The disciples of Christ must be more thoughtful how to do well, than how to speak well; how to keep their integrity, than how to vindicate it. Our lives, not boasting words, form the best apology.

5. When they persecute you in this city, flee ye to another, v. 23. 'Thus reject those who reject you and your doctrine, and try others. Thus shift for your own safety.' Note, In imminent peril, when God opens a door of escape, Christ's disciples may and must secure themselves by flight. He that flies may hereafter fight. It is no inglorious thing for Christ's soldiers to quit their ground, provided they quit not their colors. They may go out of the way of danger, though not out of the way of duty. Observe Christ's care of his disciples, in providing for their safety; ordering it so, that persecution rages not in all places at the same time; but when one city is made too hot for them, a cooler is in reserve; yet always with this proviso, that no sinful, unlawful means be used to make an escape, for then it is not a door of God's opening. We have many examples in the history both of Christ and his apostles; in the application of which to particular cases, wisdom and integrity are profitable to direct.

6. Fear them not, (v. 26.) for they can but kill the body, v. 23. Note, It is the duty and interest of Christ's disciples not to fear the greatest of their adversaries. They who truly fear God, need not fear man: and they who are afraid of the least sin, need not be afraid of the greatest trouble. The fear of man bringeth a snare; it must therefore be carefully watched and striven and prayed against. Be the times never so difficult, enemies never so outrageous,

The apostles are informed beforehand, that they were to experience persecution and hatred, and be exposed to evils and dangers. Can we then conceive it possible that any men in their senses should, without some very powerful and extraordinary motive, voluntarily undertake a commission like this, in which the only recompense was to be affliction, misery, pain and death; in which all the natural affections of the human heart were to be extinguished or inverted, and their nearest relations, their parents, children, or brethren, become their persecutors and executioners? And this too, when, instead of employing any art, or making any attempt to deceive his followers, our Savior plainly tells them they are to expect nothing but what is most dreadful to human nature? Yet the apostles actually and cheerfully did expose themselves to all this evil, at the command of their Lord. Is there any instance upon record before this, in the annals of the world, where twelve men, without any reason, and without being led by any artifice or delusion, voluntarily exposed themselves, at the desire of another person, to persecution, torment and destruction? There must have been some forcible reason for such conduct as this; and that reason could be nothing less than a full conviction, arising from the miracles which they saw with their own eyes, and which they themselves were enabled to perform, that Christ was what He professed to be, the Son of God; that all power was given Him in heaven and earth; and that He was able to fulfil the promises He had made them of a recompense in a future life, infinitely surpassing, in magnitude and duration, all the sufferings they could experience in the present.

Hated of all.' They who believed the testimony of the apostles, as multitudes did, could not but love them as fathers in Christ: (See Gal. 4: 15.) This, therefore, is plainly one of those many Scriptures, in which the universal term all is to be taken with great restrictions. See John 12: 32. Phil. 2: 21. and Rom. 5: 15.

The openness with which Christ warned his apostles of coming persecutions, evinced a consciousness of influence over their hearts, and of power to support and reward them.—They must not conceal, or palliate their message, to avoid persecution; yet they ought not to rush into danger, but when persecuted in one city to flee to another, and preach the Gospel. This would drive them from scenes of apparent usefulness, yet it would not injure the cause; for they would not have gone through the cities of Israel, till the Son of man should come.—This phrase signifies either his coming with the Romans to destroy the Jews; or 'his rise to the judgment: and seeing the apostles were not to live till the judgment, it is necessary to understand this of his coming to avenge himself on the Jews.' Whittby. The apostles were not persecuted till after the day of Pentecost; so that, the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans seems especially pointed out.—Persecution prevented the apostles from preaching through the land as fully, as they might otherwise have done. The conversion of the Gentiles, after a time, furnished many of them with employment; and, when judgments came on the Jews, several cities of Israel had not been instructed by the preachers of the Gospel.

Persecute you.] 'It is prudence and humility, when charity or righteousness oblige us not to the contrary, to avoid persecution. To deprive those who are disposed to do evil, of the opportunities of doing it; to convey the grace which they despise, to others; to accomplish God's designs of justice on the former, and of mercy on the latter, are consequences of the flight of a persecuted preacher. This flight is a proper one to those who are highly necessary to the church of Christ, and advice to those who might imprudently draw upon themselves persecution, and of indulgence for those who are weak. But this flight is highly criminal in those mercenary preachers, who through love to their flesh and their property, abandon the flock of Christ to the wolf.'

Until the Son of man shall come.] 'I do not find that the apostles were persecuted in this first progress, from which they soon returned to Christ, and told Him all they had done; (See Mark 6: 30. and Luke 9: 10.) and therefore, as well as for many other reasons, I cannot understand the coming of the Son of man to signify his overtaking them in this journey, before they came to the end of it: nor does it appear natural, with Dr. Sykes, to refer it to Christ's coming to judgment. It is rather, as Mr. Whiston observes, to be explained of their being driven out of Judea by persecutions, so that they had not time to visit all the parts of it before the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, which is often called the coming of the Son of man. See Matt. 24: 27, 37, 39, 44, and Luke 18: 8.'

'Others understand this coming of Christ of the effusion of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost, grounding the opinion on John 14: 17, 18. In the general, our Savior means, till the time accomplished, when, leaving the Jews, you shall preach to the Gentiles: a dispensation which may be called a coming of Christ, for ought I know; being an eminent act of God's Providence, in which Christ was shewed to the world.'

POOLS.

These are some of the many interpretations of our Lord's words; but that of Doddridge and Scott above is most generally followed, referring them to the demolition of the city and economy of the Jews, about thirty years after; as in Matt. 24: 30. Mark 13:26. Luke 21: 27, 32. Ed. Verse 24-26.

The disciple is not generally regarded as of greater excellence than his teacher, nor the servant than his master; nor ought he to expect greater deference and honor. Never were servants so inferior to their Lord as Christ's were. If then they met with injurious usage in their ministry, they should remember, that the Master of the family, though wise, holy, excellent, and beneficent, had been called Beelzebub, 'the prince of devils'; and it ought to satisfy his domestics, to be treated as their Lord, considering their inferiority and unworthiness; and they were exhorted not to fear those who might falsely accuse them, or and events never so threatening, yet need we not fear, even though the earth be removed, while we have a God so good, and a cause and hope through grace so good, besides.

Yes, this is soon said; but when it comes to trial, racks and tortures, dungeons and galleys, axes, and gibbets, fire and faggot, are terrible enough to make the stoutest tremble, and start back, especially when they may be avoided by a few declining steps; therefore, to fortify us against temptation, we have

A good reason against this fear, taken from the limited power of the enemies: they kill the body, but this is all: they are not able to kill the soul. Hence the soul does not (as some dream) fall asleep at death, for then the killing of the body would be the killing of the soul too. The soul is killed when separated from God and his love, (which is his life), and made a vessel of wrath: but this is out of the reach of their power. Tribulation, distress, and persecution may separate us from all the world, but not from God; they cannot cause us either not to love Him, or not to be beloved by Him, Rom. 8: 35, 37. If, therefore, we were more concerned about our souls as our jewels, we should be less afraid of men, who cannot rob us of them. They can but crush the cabinet; as a heathen intimated, in saying to the tyrant, 'You may abuse the case of Ananias, but cannot injure Ananias himself.' The pearl of price is untouched. Seneca undertakes to prove, that you cannot hurt a wise and good man, because even death is no real evil to him.

Our Lord prescribes a good remedy against the fear of man, and that is, Fear Him, who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell. Note, First, Hell is the destruction of both soul and body; not of the being of either, but of the well being of both, the ruin of the whole man, soul and body. They sinned together; the body was the soul's tempter and tool in sin, and they must eternally suffer together. Secondly, This destruction is from God: He is able to destroy; it is a destruction from his glorious power; (2 Thess. 1: 9.) in it He will make his power known; his authority to sentence, and his ability to execute the sentence, Rom. 9: 22. Thirdly, God is therefore to be feared, even by the saints in this world. Knowing the terror of the Lord, we persuade men to stand in awe of Him. If, according to his fear, so is his wrath, then according to his wrath so should his fear be, especially because none knoweth the power of his anger, Ps. 90: 11. If Adam, in innocence, must be awed by threatening, let no disciples of Christ think they need not the restraint of holy fear. Happy is the man that feareth always. The God of Abraham, then dead, is called the fear of Isaac, who was yet alive, Gen. 31: 42, 53. Fourthly, The fear of God and of his power, reigning in the soul, will be a sovereign antidote against the fear of man. It is better to fall under the frowns of all the world, than under God's frowns; therefore, as it is most right in itself, so is it most safe for us, to obey God rather than man, Acts 4: 19. They who are afraid of a man that shall die, forget the Lord their Maker, Isa. 51: 12, 13. Neh. 4: 14.

7. What I tell you in darkness, that speak ye in light (v. 27.) 'whatever hazards ye run, go on with your work, proclaiming the everlasting Gospel; that is your special business. The design of the enemies is, not merely to destroy you, but to suppress that; therefore, whatever be the consequence, publish that.' What tell you, speak ye. Note, What the apostles have delivered to us, they received from Jesus Christ. Heb. 2: 3. They spake what He told them—all that, and nothing but that. They received their instructions in private, in darkness, in the ear, in corners, in parables. Many things Christ spake openly, and nothing in secret varying from what He preached in public, John 18: 20. But the particular instructions He gave his disciples after his resurrection, concerning the things pertaining to the kingdom of God, were 'whispered in the ear,' (Acts 1: 3.) for then He never shrouded Himself openly. But they must deliver their embassy publicly, in the light, and on the house-tops, as being of universal concernment; (Prov. 1: 20, 21. 8: 2, 3.) therefore he that hath ears to hear, let him hear. The first indication of the reception of Gentiles into the church, was upon the house-top, Acts 16: 9. Note, No part of Christ's Gospel needs concealment; the whole counsel of God must be revealed, Acts 20: 27. In a multitude never so mixed, let it be plainly and fully delivered.

To comfort and encourage them, much is said, and all little enough, considering the hardships before them, and their present weakness. Christ therefore shows them why they should be of good cheer. One word is peculiar to their present mission, v. 23. Ye shall not have gone over the cities of Israel, till the Son of man be come. They were to preach that his kingdom was at hand, and pray, thy kingdom come; now they should not have thus gone over all Israel, before that kingdom should come, in the exaltation of Christ, and the pouring out of the Spirit. It was a comfort, that what they said should be made good; for Christ will confirm the word of his messengers, Isa. 44: 26. and that it charge them with base designs, for all secrets would soon be disclosed, and then their characters, principles, and intentions, would be fully justified, and the wickedness of their accusations put to shame. * These words (26.) are capable, says Whitby, of two good senses. Let not the dread of persecutors hinder us from preaching the gospel, in despite of success; for if now it be hidden from the world, and is to be obscured awhile, by the calumnies of Jews and others; I will cause it to shine over the world, and break through all obstacles, and make it mighty to cast down every high thought, &c. (2 Cor. 10: 5.) 'Or thus: fear not their calumnies, for I will make the excellence of your doctrine clear as the light; and your integrity in dispensing it, and patience in suffering for it, to be your praise in all ages, and at the revelation of the Lord from heaven.'

Master, (24.) Luke 2: 46. 6: 40. John 3: 2. 1 Cor. 12: 23. Eph. 4: 11. 2 Tim. 1: 11. It signifies a teacher, rather than a commander. As used by Christ, it means the Teacher.—Them of his household.

(25.) Domestic servants, as distinguished from servants abroad.

(24.) 'This saying, of itself, requires no comment, being self-evident; but we must regard its spirit and design. Jesus is the great Teacher; we profess to be his scholars. He who keeps the saying in his heart, will not complain of suffering. How many irregular thoughts and affections is this maxim capable of restraining! A man is not a scholar of Christ unless he learn his doctrine; and does not learn it as he ought, unless he put it in practice.'

(25.) Beelzebub. 'Among all the devils, many of whom are named in the Talmud, the Jews esteemed this the worst and foulest, as it were, the prince of the rest, who ruled over the idols of the heathens. This demon they called Beelzebub, i. e. lord of idolatry: the worst devil and worst thing. Matthew doubtless wrote Beelzebub, and the Pharisees so pronounced it: which idol is supposed to be the same as Beelzebub, the god-fly, worshipped at Ekron, 2 Kings 1: 2. &c. as among the ignominious names bestowed upon idols, the general and common one was zebul, ordure or a dunghill (also idolatry); thus Beelzebub, the god of ordure, was used by the Jews as a term of the utmost contempt.' But see at ch. 12: 24. LIGHTFOOT. Dr. A. CLARKE.

(26.) Nothing hid which shall not be known. 'A proverbial expression, like "time brings all things to light." Since therefore you have my example before you, and suffer in my cause, fear them not, but sustain the utmost efforts of their rage; and assure yourselves that I will support you, till you have finished your testimony; for there is nothing now hid which shall not be revealed; nor does any thing passed in secret between us, which shall not be universally made known.'

DODD.

Verse 27, 28.

The apostles could not be cut off till they had finished their testimony: they ought, therefore to be zealous in publicly declaring the truths which Christ had privately taught them, and even to proclaim from the tops of the houses, according to the usage of the Jews, respecting houses which they desired to make known to a neighborhood. This would expose them to enmity, and the loss of life; but were persecutors to proceed as far as possible, they could kill only the body, a little before it would otherwise die; for they could not destroy the soul either by terminating its existence, or preventing its felicity. The tortures thus endured would be dreadful, yet far short of the misery which God can inflict on body and soul in hell. The servants of Christ ought not then to fear the malice of man, but the omnipotent, eternal, and righteous displeasure of God; which they would incur, if for fear of persecution, they apostatized, or failed to fulfil their ministry.—These words contain proof that the soul dies not with the body. What men can do to the body, they cannot do to the soul. They who, by killing the body, render the soul insensate, do also kill the soul; for it is not easy to see how a thinking and perceiving being can be more killed, than by depriving it of sensation, thought and perception; the body being killed by privation of sense and motion. It remains, that the soul does not perish with the body, nor is reduced to insensibility by the death of it.' Whitby. The language exposes the impotent rage of those, who, by brutal treatment of the lifeless body, try to do more than merely kill the hated object; for this does nothing, nor should the apprehension of it cause any uneasiness.

(27.) Hear in the ear. 'Allusion is here made to the manner of the schools, where the doctor whispered out of the chair into the ear of the interpreter, and he, with a loud voice, repeated to the whole school what, which was spoken in the ear.'

Preach (i. e. proclaim) ye upon the house-tops. 'Perhaps this alludes to the custom, that the minister of the synagogue, on the sabbath-even, sounded with a trumpet six times, on the roof of an exceeding high house, that thence all might have notice of the coming in of the sabbath. The first sound was, that they should come in from their work in the fields; the second, that they should cease from it in the city; the third, that they should light the sabbath candle, &c.'

The houses of Judea were flat roofed, with a balustrade round about. As there are no bells among the Turks, a cry proclaims even now at times of public worship from the house-tops.

(28.) Kill the soul. 'There is here such an opposition between the soul and the body, as clearly proves the former to be immaterial; what does not and cannot perish with the body. The soul exists separate from will the soul. But rather fear him, which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell.

kinge. It shall be given you (said Christ) in that same hour what ye shall speak.

Christ's disciples being from among the foolish of the world, unlearned and ignorant, might justly distrust their own abilities, especially when called before great men; as Moses, when sent to Pharaoh, I am not eloquent, (Exod. 4:10.) and Jeremiah, when set over the kingdoms, I am but a child, Jer. 1:6, 10. Hence, they are promised, that it should be given them, in that same hour, what they should speak. They shall speak extempore, and yet as much to the purpose, as if it had been never so well studied. Note, When God calls us to speak for Him, we may, even though under the greatest disadvantages and discouragements, depend on Him to teach us. They are also assured that the blessed Spirit should draw up their plea for them. It is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father which speaketh in you, &c. 20. They were then not left to themselves, but God undertook for them; his Spirit of wisdom spoke in them, as sometimes his providence spoke for them, should be made good quickly. It is a comfort to Christ's laborers, that their working time will be short, and soon over, as the hiring has his day; and that then they shall be advanced to a higher station. When the Son of man comes, they shall be endued with great power from on high. Now they are sent forth as agents; soon their commission shall be enlarged, and they be sent forth as plenipotentiaries into all the world.

Many words relate to their work in general, and the troubles they were to meet in it; and they are good words and comfortable.

1. That their sufferings were for a testimony against them and the Gentiles, v. 18. When the Jews transfer you to the Romans, to put you to death, your being hurried from one judgment-seat to another, will help to make your testimony the more public, and give you opportunity to bring the Gospel to Gentiles, as well as Jews; nay, you will testify to them and against them, by the very troubles you undergo. Note, God's people, and especially his ministers, are his witnesses, (Isa. 43:10.) not only in what they do, but in what they suffer. Hence they are called martyrs—witnesses for Christ, that his truths are of undoubted certainty and value; and being witnesses for Him, they are witnesses against those who oppose Him and his Gospel. The sufferings of the martyrs, as they witness the truth of the Gospel they profess, so are they a proof of the enmity of their persecutors, and a testimony against them; and will be so produced in the great day, when the saints shall judge the world; then the reason of the sentence will be, Inasmuch as ye did it unto these, ye did it unto me. Now if their sufferings be a testimony, how cheerfully should they be borne: for the testimony is not finished till those come, Rev. 11:7. If they be Christ's witnesses, they shall be sure to have their charges borne.

2. That on all occasions they should have God's special presence, and the immediate assistance of his Holy Spirit, particularly when called to bear testimony before governors and kings. It shall be given you (said Christ) in that same hour what ye shall speak. Christ's disciples being from among the foolish of the world, unlearned and ignorant, might justly distrust their own abilities, especially when called before great men; as Moses, when sent to Pharaoh, I am not eloquent, (Exod. 4:10.) and Jeremiah, when set over the kingdoms, I am but a child, Jer. 1:6, 10. Hence, they are promised, that it should be given them, in that same hour, what they should speak. They shall speak extempore, and yet as much to the purpose, as if it had been never so well studied. Note, When God calls us to speak for Him, we may, even though under the greatest disadvantages and discouragements, depend on Him to teach us. They are also assured that the blessed Spirit should draw up their plea for them. It is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father which speaketh in you, &c. 20. They were then not left to themselves, but God undertook for them; his Spirit of wisdom spoke in them, as sometimes his providence spoke for them, and by both they were manifested in the consciences even of their persecutors. God gave ability then to speak to the purpose, and with holy zeal. The same Spirit assisted them in the pulpit and at the bar. They cannot but come off well, who have such an Advocate: to whom God says, as to Moses, Go, and I will be with thy mouth, and will teach thee what thou shalt say.

3. That he who endures to the end shall be saved, v. 22. Here it is comforting to consider that there will be an end of these troubles. Christ comforted Himself with this, and so may his followers: The things concerning me have an end, Luke 22:37. A believing prospect of the period of our troubles, will greatly aid in supporting us under them. The weary will be at rest when the wicked cease from troubling, Job 3:17. Troubles may seem tedious, like the days of an hireling, but, blessed be God, they are not everlasting: He will bring an expected end, Jer. 29:11. While they continue, it is comforting that they may be endured: as they are not eternal, so they are not intolerable; they may be borne, even to the end, because the sufferers shall be borne up under them in everlasting arms: The strength shall be according to the day, 1 Cor. 10:13. Salvation, too, will be the eternal recompense of all that endure to the end. The weather is stormy, the way foul; but the pleasure of home will make amends for all. A believing regard to the crown of glory has been in all ages the cordial and support of suffering saints, 2 Cor. 4:16-18. Heb. 10:34. This is both an encouragement to endure, and an engagement to endure to the end. They who endure but a while, and in time of temptation fall away, run in vain, and lose all their attainments; but they who persevere are sure of the prize, and they only. Be faithful death, and thou shalt have the crown of life.

4. That whatever hard usage the disciples of Christ meet, it is no more than their Master suffered before, (v. 24, 25.) the disciple is not above his master; a reason this, why they should not hesitate to perform the meanest duties; no, not to wash one another's feet, John 13:16. Here, it is a reason why they should not stumble at the hardest sufferings. They are reminded of this saying, John 16:20. Note, Jesus Christ is our Master, our teaching Master, our ruling Master, whose servants we are; He is Master of the house. Further, Jesus Christ, our Lord and Master, had very hard usage from the world. They called Him Beelzebub, the god of flies, a name of the chief of devils, with whom they said He was in league. It is hard to say which is most to be wondered at, the wickedness of men in thus the body, and must be conscious of that existence; else the soul would be as properly killed as the body. The latter clause proves that the soul may perish, by being subject to future misery; but it does not cease to exist.

One of them shall not fall, &c.] 'These words are a full proof of the universality of a divine providence; but the singular interposition of it in favor of good men, may in a much more convincing manner be argued, from the prayers and praises offered in Scripture with regard to particular events, and the promise of temporal blessings made to those that fear and serve God. Nor can I think we are much concerned to determine how far any of these are miraculous, and how far the result of general laws settled in exact congruity to the temper and conduct of every individual affected by them, which an omniscient God foresees, and which his excellent schemes might easily provide for, by methods to us unsearchable.'

'These very strong instances are plainly chosen on purpose to quiet all our fears, and to banish from our minds every idea of our being too small and insignificant for the care and protection of Almighty God. Here we have that most important and consolatory doctrine of a particular providence plainly and clearly laid down. It is Scripture only which on this momentous point can give rest to our souls.'

These two are both the commanding and the dividing principles of all our actions; for whoever acts in opposition to one, does it always in behalf of the other. None ever opposed Christ, but to gratify self and none ever renounced an interest in self, but from a partiality to the interest of Christ.'

[Practical Observations.]

34 ¶ Think not that I am come to send peace on earth: I came not to send peace, but a sword.

35 For I am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law.

36 And as a man's foes shall be they of his own household.

37 He that loveth father or mother more than me, is not worthy of me: and he that loveth son or daughter more than me, is not worthy of me.

38 And he that taketh not his cross and followeth after me, is not worthy of me.

39 He that findeth his life shall lose it: and abusing Christ, or the patience of Christ in suffering their abuse: that He who was the Prince of light and life, should be stigmatized as the prince of the powers of death and darkness: that Satan's greatest Enemy and Destroyer should be run down as his confederate, and yet endure such contradiction of sinners. The consideration also of the ill treatment which Christ met in the world, should lead us to expect and prepare for the like, and bear it patiently. Let us not think it strange, if they who hate Him, hate his followers for his sake: nor if they, who shortly are to be made like Him in glory, be now made like Him in sufferings.

5. That there is nothing covered that shall not be revealed, v. 26. We understand this, first, of the revealing of the Gospel to all the world. 'Do you publish it, (v. 27.) for it shall be published. The truths now hid as mysteries, shall be made known to all nations in their own language,' Acts 2: 11. The ends of the earth must see his salvation. Note, The certainty that it shall be done, is a great encouragement in doing Christ's work. It is a plough which God will speed. Or, secondly, of clearing up the character of Christ's servants, who are called Beelzebub: their true character is now invidiously disguised and covered, but its innocence and excellence shall be revealed; perhaps in this world: certainly in the world to come: then their glory shall be manifested to all men and angels, to whom they are now made a spectacle, 1 Cor. 4: 9. All their reproach shall be rolled away, and their graces and services, now covered, be revealed, 1 Cor. 4: 5. Note, It is a comfort to the people of God, under all the calumnies and censure of men, that there will be a resurrection of names as well as bodies, when the righteous shall shine forth as the sun. Let Christ's ministers faithfully reveal his truth, and leave it for Him, in due time, to reveal their integrity.

6. That the providence of God is especially conversant about the saints in their sufferings, v. 29—31. It is good to have recourse to first principles, and particularly to the doctrine of God's universal providence, extended to all creatures and their actions, even the most minute. The light of nature teaches this, and all good men, who can in faith call God their Father, find comfort in it. See here,

First, the extension of providence to all creatures, even the least considerable as to sparrows, v. 29. These are of so small account, that one of them is not valued: there must go two for a farthing, (nay you shall have five for half a penny, Luke 12: 6.) and yet they are not shut out of the divine care: One of them shall not fall to the ground without your Father: that is light on the ground to pick a grain of corn but your heavenly Father, by his providence laid it ready for them. In the parallel place, Luke 12: 6. it is said, not one of them is forgotten before God, forgotten to be provided for: He feedeth them, ch. 6: 26. Now He that feeds the sparrows, will not starve the saints. Or, they fall not to the ground by death, without the notice of God: though they are a part of the creation so small, yet even their death comes within the notice of the divine providence: much more does the death of these disciples. Observe, The birds that soar above, when they die, fall to the ground; death brings the highest to the earth. Some think that Christ here alludes to the two sparrows used in cleansing the leper: (Lev. 14: 4—6.) of which one was killed, and fell to the ground, the other was let go. Now it seemed a casual thing which of the two was killed; the persons employed took which they pleased, but God's providence designed and determined which. God, who has such an eye to the sparrows, best sees they are his creatures, will much more have an eye to you, who are his children. If a sparrow die not without your Father, surely a man does not,—a Christian,—a minister,—my friend, my child. A bird is not caught, nor shot, and comes not into market, but according to the direction of providence: your enemies may lay snares for you, and privily snarl at you, but they cannot take or hit you, unless God give leave. Therefore be not afraid of death, for your enemies have no power against you, but what is given them from above. God can break their bows and snares, (Ps. 37: 14, 15: 64: 4, 7.) and make our souls to escape as a bird; (Ps. 124: 7.) Fear ye not therefore, v. 31. Note, The doctrine of God's providence is enough to silence all the fears of God's people: Ye are of more value than many sparrows. All men are so, other creatures being made for man, and put under his feet: (Ps. 8: 4, 5, 8.) much more the disciples of Jesus Christ, who are the excellent of the earth, however contemned.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 16—33. Ministers should advert to their character and situation, and count their cost. They are sent as 'sheep' among 'wolves'; let them remember to be like lambs and doves; not resisting evil, nor retorting reproaches and injuries. Let them temper zeal and boldness with discretion, and so act as to furnish their enemies with no plausible pretext for their malignity. This 'wisdom is from above,' and must be sought by prayer, or it will be a time-serving caution. Yet, if they united the 'wisdom of the serpent with the harmlessness of the dove,' they could not escape hatred and contempt.—Those who take the Lord's part against the ungodly, will be opposed, reviled, and evil treated. The excellent servants of Christ in all ages hitherto have been imprisoned, scourged and put to death as malefactors. They have been brought before kings for no other crime, than bearing the name and preaching the Gospel of Christ! Thus the Lord brings truth to those, who would else have been strangers to it; yet this testimony turns against them.—The work of the ministry requires study and preparation; but should the minister be suddenly called to declare his message even before princes, he need not be anxious how or what to speak, but rely on Him, who has promised to give his people 'a mouth and wisdom,' which their enemies cannot 'gainsay or resist.'—Opportunities of doing good may be expected in every place; and hence we are not required to stay among persecutors; yet we must not neglect our work, or conceal our relation to Christ. If, then, we are ready to faint under the difficulties we meet, we should look to our Lord; for we should be willing to bear the same treatment from the world, which He bore. Yet none of us is made to suffer as He was. Let us, then, pray to be free from the fear of man; and if falsely accused, let us wait for the Lord to 'bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and make manifest the counsels of all hearts,' and then every faithful servant 'shall have praise of God.' Let us openly profess and plainly declare his truth, and if we be called to seal our testimony with our blood, we should fear apostasy more than tortures; for 'man can only kill the body,' but the Lord is able to 'destroy both body and soul in hell.' 'If any man draw back, He will have no pleasure in him,' and he only 'that endureth unto the end, shall be saved. The Savior is able to comfort us under the sharpest sufferings, and protect us in extreme perils; and without Him the most trivial event cannot occur. Let us, then, confess Christ and obey Him before men, assured, that He will own poor sinners as his brethren before his Father. But woe be to them, who are ashamed of Him at his words among men; or deny Him before his enemies; for Christ will disown them in that day when eternal happiness or misery will be awarded by his word.

Peace on the earth.] 'On the land, namely of Judea,' DODD. 'The meaning will be plain when we consider the import of the word peace, which was used among the Hebrews to express all possible blessings, temporal and spiritual; but especially the former. The expectation of the Jews was, that when the Messiah should come, all temporal prosperity would be accumulated on the land of Judea. The import of our Lord's teaching here is this, "Do not imagine, as the Jews in general vainly do, that I am come to send forth, by forcing out the Roman yoke, that temporal prosperity which they long for; I am not come for this purpose, but to send forth the Roman sword, to cut off a disobedient and rebellious nation, the cup of whose iniquity is already full, and whose crimes cry aloud for speedy vengeance." See also on Luke 12: 43. From the time they rejected the Messiah, they were a prey to the most cruel and destructive factions; they employed their time in butchering one another, till the Roman sword was unsheathed against them and desolated the land.'

He will honor them before his Father. It is a dangerous thing for any to deny and disown Christ before men, for such He will disown in the great day, when they most need Him. I tell you, I know you not, ch. 7:23. In the first ages of Christianity, when to confess Christ was to venture all that was dear in this world, it was more a trial of sincerity, than afterwards, when secular advantages attended it.

8. That the foundation of their discipleship was laid in a temper and disposition of such kind, as would make sufferings light and easy to them: and that on condition of preparedness to suffer, Christ took them to be his followers, v. 37-39. He told them at first, that they were not worthy of Him, if they were not willing to part with all for Him. In any profession, men neitate not at expected difficulties, necessarily attendant on it, but cheerfully submit to them, or disclaim its privileges and advantages. So in the Christian profession, they are reckoned unworthy of its dignity and felicity, who put not such value on their interest in Christ, as to prefer it before any other interests. For the gains of a bargain, we must come up to its terms. Now the terms are settled. If religion be worth any thing, it is upon any malignity, or any deficiency in that, but on the lusts and corruptions of men, who have either directly opposed or grossly perverted it.

A man's foes, &c. Our Lord refers here to their own traditions, which were near by in the very words He used; and the apostles, who were memorable, especially since they professedly point at the time of the Messiah's coming. Let any one also read the terrible account given by Josephus of their crimes and sufferings. In rejecting Christ, they were abandoned of God.

As crucifixion was not a Jewish punishment, this mention of it may seem prophetic, and to have alluded to his own crucifixion.

BLOOMF.

When we are commanded in Scripture "to take up our cross and follow Christ," to "deny ourselves," to "mortify our members," &c. these expressions by no means imply, what some have chosen to infer from them, that we are to renounce the world and all its pleasures, employments, connections and concerns; to forego every thing that is cheerful and agreeable to our nature, and to consume our whole life in abstinence and austerity. According to the fairest and most established

Secondly, the particular cognizance which Providence takes of Christ's disciples, especially in their sufferings, (v. 30.) But the very hairs of your head are all numbered. This is a proverbial expression, denoting God's regard to the concerns of his people, even the most minute. This is not to be made a matter of curious inquiry, but of encouragement to live in continual dependence on God's providential care, which extends to all occurrences, yet without disparagement to the infinite glory, or disturbance to the infinite rest of the Eternal Mind. If God numbers their hairs, much more their heads, and He takes care of their lives, their comforts, their souls. It intimates, that God takes more care of them than they do of themselves. Those who are solicitous to number their money, and goods, and cattle, were yet never careful to number their hairs; but God numbers the hairs of his people, and not a hair of their head shall perish: (Luke 21:18.) no hurt be done them, but on a valuable consideration: so precious to God are his saints, and their lives and deaths!

7. That He will shortly, in the day of triumph, own those who now, in the day of trial, own Him; when those who deny Him, shall be forever disowned and rejected, v. 32, 33. Note, It is our duty, and if we do it, it will be hereafter our unspeakable honor and happiness, to confess Christ before men; not to believe in Christ only, but to profess our faith in suffering for Him, when called to it, as well as in serving Him. We must never be ashamed of our relation to Him, our attendance on Him, or our expectations from Him: hereby our sincerity is evinced, his name honored, and others edified. However this may expose us to trouble now, we shall be abundantly recompensed in the resurrection of the just, when it will be our unspeakable happiness and honor that Christ shall fulfil his promise. 'Him will I confess before my Father, as the purchase of my blood, and the workmanship of my Spirit, a friend, and beloved by me, though a worm of the earth.' Those who honor Christ He will thus honor. They honor Him before men, but worth every thing; then, *'one all who receive his truth will come up to the price of it: and they who make it their business and bliss, will make every thing else yield to it. Those who like not Christ on these terms, may leave Him—at their peril. Note, It is very encouraging to think, that whatever we leave, lose, or suffer for Christ, we make no hard bargain for ourselves. The pearl of price is worth what we give for it. The terms are, that we must prefer Christ, First, Before our nearest and dearest relations, father or mother, son or daughter. Between these relations, as there is less room for envy, so there is commonly more for love; therefore these are instanced, as most likely to have effect. Children must love their parents, and parents their children; but if they love them better than Christ, they are unworthy of Him. As we must not be deterred from Christ by the hatred of our relations. v. 25, 36.) so we must not be drawn from Him by their love. Christians must be as *'one who said to his father, I have not seen him. Dent 33 9.

Secondly, Before our ease and safety. We must take up our cross and follow Him, else we are not worthy of Him. Here observe, that they who would follow Christ, must expect their cross, and take it up. In taking it up, we must follow Christ's example, and bear it as He did. In bearing crosses, it is also a great encouragement that we follow Christ, who has showed us the way; and that if we follow Him faithfully, through suffering, He will lead us to glory with Himself.

Thirdly, Before even life, v. 39. He that findeth his life shall lose it: he who thinks he has found it, when he has saved it by denying Christ, shall lose it in an eternal death: but he who loseth his life for Christ's sake, or rather than deny Christ, shall find it, to his unspeakable advantage, in an eternal life. They are best prepared for the life to come, that are most loose to this present life.

9. That Christ Himself would so heartily espouse their cause, as to show Himself a friend to all their friends, and repay the kindness bestowed on them, v. 40-42.

First, It is here implied, that though the generality would reject them, some would receive them and welcome their message. Why was the gospel-market made, but that if some will not, others will? In the worst times there is a remnant, according to the election of grace. Christ's ministers shall not labor in vain.

Secondly, Jesus Christ takes what is done to his faithful ministers, whether kind or unkind, as done to Himself. He that receiveth you receiveth me. Honor or contempt put on an ambassador, reflects the same on the prince that sends him; and ministers are ambassadors for Christ. See how Christ may still be entertained by those who would testify their respects to Him; his people and ministers we have always with us; and He is with them always, rules of interpretation, these, and other similar phrases, enjoin but a constant habit of vigilance and self-government, a cautious and jealous attention to the movements of our minds and the progress of our passions, a strict abstinence from all irregular and immoral gratifications; without either declining any of the duties, or sullenly withdrawing from the harmless enjoyments, conveniences, and comforts of social life.

Bp. PORTER.

His testimony to John, 7-15. The perverseness of the people concerning both John and Jesus illustrated, 16-19. He upbraids the impetuosity of those, who had witnessed most of his mighty works; and denounces woes against Chorazin, Bethsaida, and Capernaum, 20-24. He addresses the wise and holy sovereignty of the Father, in revealing the truth; and declares his own personal and mediatorial power and majesty, 25-27. He invites and instructs the weary to come unto Him for rest, 28-30.

and ministers, shall not only be accepted, but suitably and richly rewarded. Much is to be gained by doing good offices to Christ's disciples. If done ^aof the Lord, He will repay them with interest; for He is not unrighteous to forget any labor of love, (Heb. 6:10.) They shall receive a reward, and in no wise lose it. He does not say, they deserve a reward: we cannot merit any thing as wages from God: but they shall receive a reward from the free gift of God: and shall in no wise lose it, as, through falsehood or forgetfulness, is often the case among men. The reward may be deferred,—the full reward will be deferred till the resurrection of the just; but it shall ^bin no wise be lost, nor shall they be losers by delay. A prophet's or a righteous man's reward is, either the reward that God gives to righteous men and prophets; (the blessings conferred on them shall distil on their friends;) or it is the reward He gives by prophets and righteous men, in answer to their prayers, (Gen. 20: 7.) He is a prophet, and shall pray for thee, that is a prophet's reward: and by their ministry; when He gives the instructions and comforts of the Word to those, who are kind to the preachers of the Word, then He sends a prophet's reward. Prophets' rewards are blessings in heavenly things; and if we know how to value them, we shall reckon them good payment.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 34-42. The enmity of the carnal heart against God must be desperate, when the Gospel of peace excites, in those who hear it, rancorous malice, dissolving the bonds of relative and social life, and prompting to unnatural murders and massacres; and when they, who deserve to be revered and loved, become objects of contempt and hatred! Even now the believer's inveterate foes are often 'they of his own household.' But we should remember, that 'we are by nature children of wrath even as others,' and if we now love the truth, cause, and servants of Christ, the praise is due to Him, who by his grace 'hath made us to differ.' This should teach us to bear our cross patiently, and meekly, and to pity and pray for our adversaries. No human regards must interfere with our love to Christ; or to expression of it; for He will not endure a rival. And let us ask, can father or mother, son, or daughter

Their cities. By this title, Dr. A. Clarke understands simply 'the cities of the Jews;' Campbell considers it as referring to the Gallileans, 'in whose cities they then were;' but Bp. Pearce regards it as designating 'the cities of the Jews in Galilee,' an opinion reconciling both the views.

sions imply commands. Their preaching of the Gospel was not only permitted, but enjoined. Necessity was laid upon them, 1 Cor. 9: 16. His promises to them are included in these commands, for the covenant of grace is a word which He hath commanded. Ps. 135: 8. He made an end of commanding. Note, Christ's instructions are ever full, thorough. When Christ had said to his disciples what was needful, He departed thence. It would seem they were very loath to leave their Master, till He departed, and separated Himself from them, as the nurse withdraws the hand, that the child may learn to go by itself. He would now teach them how to live and work without his bodily presence. It was expedient for them that He should thus go away, that they might be prepared for his long departure; and that, by the help of the Spirit, their own hands might be sufficient for them, (Deut. 33: 7.) and they not be always children. We have little account of what they did now; but they went abroad, probably into Judea, (for the Gospel had been preached hitherto mostly in Galilee,) publishing the doctrine of Christ, and working miracles in his name; though in more immediate dependence on Him, and not being long from Him, thus they were trained up by degrees for their great work.

Christ departed to teach and preach in the cities whither He sent disciples before Him to work miracles, (ch. 10: 1, 8.) and raise public expectation preparatory to his coming. Thus was the way of the Lord prepared. John prepared it by bringing people to repentance, but did no miracles. The disciples go further, and work miracles for confirmation. Note, Repentance and faith prepare people for the blessings of the kingdom of heaven, which Christ gives. When Christ empowered them to work miracles, He was Himself teaching and preaching, as it was that were the more honorable of the two. Healing the sick was the saving of bodies, but preaching the Gospel was the saving of souls. Christ had directed his disciples to preach, (ch. 10: 7.) yet did not Himself leave off preaching. He set them to work, not for his own sake, but for the common welfare, and was no less busy Himself. How unlike Christ are those, who yoke others only that they may themselves be idle. Note, The increase of labors in the Lord's work should not excuse our negligence, but encourage our diligence. The more busy others are, the more so should we be; and all is little enough, so much work is there to be done. Observe, He went to preach in their cities—populous places; He cast the net of the Gospel where there were most fish to be inclosed. Wisdom cries in the cities, (Prov. 1: 21.) at the entry of the city, (Prov. 8: 3.) in the cities of the Jews, even of them who made light of Him, notwithstanding they had the first offer.

Here is next a message to Christ from John do us the service in that awful period, which He can do? Have they done as much to deserve our love? Are they so worthy of it? Surely we are unworthy of Him, if we prefer an earthly object to Him! Surely we ought readily to bear our cross, and to be crucified for Him, as He was for our sins. How, then, can we expect his friendship, if we refuse to bear our lighter tribulations for his sake? He can compensate our losses for his cause, so that if we suffer death by cleaving to Him, we shall not perish, but have eternal life. Let us, then, abide in Him, and show our love to Him by kindness to his people and ministers, welcoming their message, and esteeming them highly in love for their work's sake; satisfied that whatever is done from right principles and motives to the least of his disciples will be rewarded.

Verses 2-6.

Some have supposed that the faith of John in Jesus as the Messiah, was wavering; but this is not probable. His disciples, however, were evidently far from being satisfied. They were jealous for their master's honor, and did not clearly apprehend the nature of the Messiah's kingdom; objecting to the unreserved and social manner in which Jesus and his disciples lived. John seems, therefore, desirous to procure them some decisive testimony from Christ himself, to terminate their hesitation. Hearing of his miracles, he now sends two of his own disciples to inquire if He were the Messiah, or not. The question shows, that the Jews generally considered the Messiah as at hand; and if Jesus were not He, another must be expected. Eighteen hundred years have

3 And said unto him, 'Art thou he that should come, or do we look for another?'

4 Jesus answered and said unto them, Go and shew John again these things which ye do hear and see:

22-6. 21:5,9. Gen. 3:15. 12:3. 13:10. Num. 24:17. Deut. 18:15-18. Ps. 2-22. 110:1-5. Is. 7:14. 9:6,7. Jer. 23:5,6. Ez. 34:23. 34. Dan. 9:24-26. Hos. 3:5. Joel 2:28-32. Am. 9:11,12. Ob. 21. 'Mic. 5:2. Zeph. 3:14-17. Hag. 2:7. Zech. 9:9. Mal. 3:1. 4:2. John 4:27. 6:14. 7:31,41,42.

two of his question to Him, and of their interview we have here an account.

I. The question they proposed: Art Thou He that should come, or do we look for another? A serious and important question: Art Thou the Messiah promised?—the Christ? Tell us. It is taken for granted, that the Messiah should come. One of the names by which He was known to the Old Testament saints was, He that cometh, or shall come, Ps. 118: 26. He is now come, but we still expect his other coming. The disciples intimate, that, if this be not He, they would look for another. Note, We must not be weary of looking for a promised blessing; nor ever say we will no more expect it till it come. Though it tarry, wait for it; for He that shall come will come. They intimate likewise, that if they be convinced that this is He, they will not be sceptics, but will look for no other. They therefore ask, Art Thou He? John had said for his part, I am not the Christ. John 1: 20. Some think John's object was his own satisfaction. He had borne testimony to Christ, and declared Him to be the Son of God, (John 1: 34.) the Lamb of God, (v. 29.) He that should baptize with the Holy Ghost, (v. 33.) and the Sent of God, (John 3: 34.) but he desired greater proof that He was the long-promised and expected Messiah. Note, In things relating to Christ, and our salvation by Him, it is good to be sure. Christ appeared not in that external pomp and power which was expected of Him. His own disciples stumbled at this and perhaps John also. Christ saw in the inquiry something of this nature, when He said, blessed is he, who shall not be offended in Me. Note, It is hard, even for good men, to bear up against vulgar errors. John's doubts might arise from his own circumstances. He was a prisoner, and might think, if Jesus be indeed the Messiah, whence is it that I, his friend and forerunner, am in this trouble, and left so long in it; never looked after, never visited, nor sent to, nor inquired for by Him, having nothing done for me, either to sweeten my imprisonment, or hasten my enlargement? Doubtless Christ, for a good reason, did not go to John in prison, lest there should seem to be collusion between them: but, John, perhaps, thought it neglect, and it shocked his faith. Note, True faith may have a mixture of unbelief. The best are not always alike strong. Troubles for Christ, if long unrelieved, sometimes prove too severe for our faith. The remaining unbelief of good men may sometimes strike at the root, and call in question the most fundamental truths. Will the Lord cast off forever? But we will hope John's faith did not fail; he only desired to have it strengthened. Note, The best saints have need of the best helps to confirm their faith, and arm them against temptations to unbelief. Abraham believed, and yet desired a sign; (Gen. 15: 6, 8.) so Gideon, Judg. 6: 36, 37. Others think John's object was not so much his own satisfaction, as that of his disciples. Observe, Though he was a prisoner, they adhered to him, and were ready to receive his instructions: they loved him, and would not leave him. Now, they were weak in knowledge, and wavering in faith, and needed instruction and confirmation. They were jealous for their Master, and of our Master: loath to acknowledge Jesus to be the Messiah, because He eclipsed John, and loath to believe their own master, when they think he speaks against himself and Barth, and his reply, v. 2-6. It was said before that Jesus heard of John's sufferings, ch. 4: 12. Now we are told that John, in prison, hears of Christ's doings, which, no doubt, he was glad to hear, as a true friend of the Bridegroom, John 3: 29. Note, When one useful instrument is laid aside, God knows how to raise up others. The work went on, though John was in prison, and it was a comfort to him, not a grief. Nothing comforts God's people in distress more, than to hear of the works of Christ, and experience them in their own souls. This turns a prison into a palace. In one way or other, Christ will convey the notices of his love to such as are in trouble for conscience's sake. John could not see the works of Christ, but he could hear of them with pleasure. And blessed are they who have not seen, but only heard, and yet have believed.

them. Good men may have their judgments biased by their interest. John would have their views rectified, and wished them to be as well satisfied as he himself was. Note, The strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and do what they can to help them. When thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren. John was industrious to turn over his disciples to Christ, as from the school to the academy. Perhaps he anticipated his death, and wished his disciples to be better acquainted with Christ, with whom he must leave them. Note, Ministers must direct every one to Christ. And those who would know the certainty of his doctrine must apply to Him: He is come to give understanding. Those who would grow in grace must be inquisitive.

II. Christ's answer, v. 4-6. It was not so direct and express, as when He said, I that speak unto thee am He; but it was a real answer, an answer in fact. Christ would have us studious of the evidences of the Gospel.

1. He directs them to report to John what they heard and saw, that he might thence more fully instruct and convince them. Note, Our senses are to be appealed to in things that are their proper objects. Therefore the popish doctrine of the real presence agrees not with the real truth as it is in Jesus: for Christ refers us to the things we hear and see.

Tell John what you see of the power of Christ's miracles; how, by the word of Jesus, the blind receive their sight, the lame walk, &c. Christ's miracles were done in the view of all; for they feared not the strictest and most impartial scrutiny. Truth seeks no concealment. They are to be considered as the acts of a divine power. Only the God of nature could thus overrule and outdo the course of nature. It is particularly spoken of as God's prerogative to open the eyes of the blind, Ps. 146: 8. Miracles are therefore the broad seal of heaven, and the doctrine to which they are affixed must be of God, for his power will never contradict his truth; nor can it be imagined that He should seal a lie. However lying wonders may be brought in proof of false doctrines, true miracles evince a divine commission. Such were Christ's, and they leave no room to doubt, that He was sent of God, and his doctrine that of Him who sent Him. His miracles are the accomplishment of a divine prediction. It was foretold, (Isa. 35: 5, 6,) that our God should come, and the eyes of the blind be opened. If Christ's works agree, as they plainly do, with the words of the prophet, no doubt this is our God, whom we have waited for, who shall come with a recompense.

Tell John what you hear of the preaching of his Gospel, accompanying his miracles. Faith, though confirmed by seeing, comes by hearing. Tell him, 1. That the poor preach the gospel: so some. It proves Christ's divine mission, that those whom He employed in founding his kingdom were poor men, destitute of all secular advantages, who therefore could never have elapsed, and no other has come, Jews themselves being judges. How thin can they evade the inference, that Jesus of Nazareth was the promised Messiah?—Our Lord answered rather by actions than words; probably, lest an explicit reply should expose Him to enemies. He wrought miracles, therefore, in presence of John's messengers, requiring them to report to John what they saw and heard; specially, that, while the rich, learned, and powerful rejected Christ and his doctrine, the poor and lowly heard and received the Gospel. This accorded to the prophecies of the Messiah; but was contrary to the conduct of deceivers, who from carnal policy, address, in general, the great and powerful. John had wrought no miracle, and this rendered the miracles of Christ more decisive evidence. The dead are raised, (5.) The widow's son at Nain had been raised just before; (Luke 7: 11-21.) Have the Gospel preached unto them.] This use of the original word seems to imply both the imparting and the reception of the glad tidings. The poor were preached unto, and they heard gladly that Gospel, which superior persons rejected.

(2) Prison.] 'John was cast into prison by order of Herod Antipas, chap. 14: 3. &c., a little after our Lord began his public ministry, chap. 4: 12, and after the first passover, John 3: 24.'

Works of Christ.] 'Deeds such as the Jews expected the Messiah would perform; 2 Tim. 4: 5.'

(3) Art Thou He.] 'Mr L'Efant, with some others, thinks, (as Justin Martyr and Tertullian did,) that John was so discouraged by his own long imprisonment, that he began himself to doubt whether Jesus was the Messiah; and supposes that when our Lord afterwards said, Happy is he that is not offended in me, He meant it as a caution to John, that he should be on his guard against a temptation so dangerous. But, considering what clear evidence John had before received by a miraculous sign from heaven, and what express and repeated testimonies he himself had borne to Jesus, I cannot imagine this possible; especially as he foresaw and foretold, that he must himself quickly be laid aside, (John 3: 30.) But he might think it necessary to put his disciples in the way of farther satisfaction: not to say that the warmth of John's temper might render him something uneasy at the reserve which Christ maintained; and that he might imagine it agreeable to the general design of his own office, as his forerunner, thus to urge a more express declaration.'

DODD.

He that cometh.] 'By speaking of the Messiah thus, the pious Jews, it seems, expressed in the most lively manner their expectation of Him, and eager longing for his approach, as the greatest and most welcome messenger of God to man, that ever did or should come into the world; (See Mark 11: 9, 10. comp. Ps. 118: 26. Hab. 2: 3. Sept. Isa. 62: 11. and Zech. 9: 9.) Bp. Pearson justly observes that this, among many arguments, proves that the notion of two Messiahs, one sufferer, the other triumphant, is a vain dream of modern Jews, and unknown to the ancients.'

(4) Go and shew John.] 'Was it for an impostor, or a enthusiast, to refer messengers who came to him, to miraculous works, performed before their eyes to things done on the spot, to the test run by of their own senses?'

Nazareth, the poverty of his life, the low condition of his followers, the slights put on Him by great men, the strictness of his doctrine, contradicting flesh and blood, and the sufferings that attend the profession of his name; these are things that keep many from Him, who otherwise cannot but see in Him much of God. Thus He is set for the fall of many, even in Israel, (Luke 2:34.) a rock of offence, 1 Pet. 2:8. They are happy who get over these offences, and conquer their prejudices. Blessed are they. The expression intimates, that it is a difficult thing to do, and dangerous not to do it; but as to those, who, notwithstanding, do believe in Christ, their faith will be found to be much the more to praise, and honor, and glory.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-6. Our Redeemer was unwearied in his labor of love: We, then, 'should not be weary in well doing, for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not.' The laying aside, and removing eminent ministers, at the time when they seem to be peculiarly need, appears very mysterious. But God will not permit any serv. ant to interfere with the glory of his Son; and He will show all, that though He may employ them, He can do without them. Patience in a prison, or sick room, glorifies the Lord, as well as active services. But if we cannot do what we wish, we should attempt, as we can, to direct the judgment and confirm the faith of such as regard our words; and Christ will honor those, who humbly serve and honor Him. What multitudes allow, that the Savior is already come, and look for no other, and yet, alas! how few bow to the sceptre of his grace! The things which men see and hear, if compared diligently with the Scriptures, direct them to religion, and show in what way it is to be found. Though miracles are no longer

V. 7-15. We have here our Lord's high encomium of John Baptist, to revive his honor and his work. From John's question, some of Christ's disciples might regard him as weak, wavering, and inconsistent with himself. To prevent this, Christ gives him this character. Note, We ought to consult the reputation of our brethren, and not only remove, but prevent jealousies and ill thoughts of them; and we must take every occasion, especially of infirmity, to speak well of the praise-worthy, and give them the fruit of their hands. John, when he was on the stage, and Christ in retirement, bore testimony to Christ; and now that Christ appeared publicly, and John was under a cloud, He bore testimony to John. Note, Those who have a confirmed interest themselves, should aid the credit and reputation of others, whose character claims it, but whose temper or present circumstances deprive them of it. This honors those to whom honor is due. John had abased himself to honor Christ, (John 3:29, 30. Ch. 3:11.) had made himself nothing, that Christ might be All, and now Christ dignifies him with this character. Note, Those who humble themselves shall be exalted, and those who honor Christ, He will honor; those that confess Him before men, He will confess, and sometimes before men too, even in this world. John had finished his testimony, and now Christ commends him. Note, Christ reserves honor for his servants when they have done their work. John 12:26.

Concerning this commendation, observe,

I. Christ spoke thus honorably of John, not till after the departure of John's disciples; as they departed; just after they had gone, Luke 7:24. He would not even seem to flatter him, nor have these praises reported to him. Note, Though forward to give all due praise for encouragement, we must avoid all flattery, and whatever may puff up. Those who in other things are mortified to the world, yet cannot well bear their own praise. Pride is a corrupt humor, which we must not feed in others or in ourselves.

II. What Christ said concerning John, was intended not only for his praise, but for the people's profit, who for a season, and but for a season, rejoiced in his light, John 5:35. 'Now consider, what went ye out into the wilderness to see?' John preached in the wilderness, where people flocked to him, though in a remote and

(5.) The blind, &c. [These miracles were not only the most convincing proofs of the supreme power of Christ, but were also emblematic of that work of salvation which He effects in the souls of men. Sinners are blind; their understanding is so darkened by sin, that they see not the way of truth and salvation. They are lame; not able to walk in the path of righteousness. They are leprovous; their souls are defiled with sin, the most loathsome and inveterate disease; despoiling in themselves, and infecting others. They are deaf; to the voice of God, his word, and their own conscience. They are dead; in trespasses and sins; God, who is the life of the soul, being separated from it by iniquity.]

Christ's doctrines have been complained of, as laying too great a restraint on human nature; as hard and impracticable sayings. His mysteries have been doubted of, disputed against, and ridiculed by men of perverse and proud minds, who are resolved to believe nothing farther than they can thoroughly and clearly comprehend.

Bp. ATTERBURY.

Verses 7-11.

John came as Christ's forerunner, and multitudes attended his ministry, and received his baptism; yet few gave due attention to the great object of his preaching. His testimony was, therefore, very important with those who believed him to be a prophet; and Christ's inquiry was suited to excite them to consideration. Surely they had not come into the wilderness to see the reeds shaken by the wind, or to hear a man preach, who was as easily shaken as they, by every rumor, prejudice, or change in circumstances. John was a man of different spirit. He acknowledged Jesus as the Messiah, and persisted in his testimony. Why, then, did they not regard him? They had gone forth, as men thought to gaze on a royal procession, but they could not expect to see in the desert a man clothed in delicate and sumptuous raiment. Such persons were found in places, and the people knew John to be a plain, rough man, meanly clad. (Note 3:4.) What, then, was their object? They would answer, to see and hear a prophet, sent by God to instruct and reform them; and John was a prophet, and more than a prophet, the person of whom Malachi had prophesied; and not predicting the Messiah, but pointing Him out as come. In the passage referred to JERONIMUS says, "my face" and "I bore Me" in a people flocked to him, because he was not a reed. Note, There is nothing lost, in the end, by an unshaken resolution in our work, neither courting the smiles, nor fearing the frowns of men.

2. He was a self-denying man, and mortified to this world. 'Was he a man clothed in soft raiment? Then you would not have gone to the wilderness to see him, but to the court. You went to see one that had his raiment of camel's hair, and a leathern girdle about his loins; which showed him dead to the pomps of the world, and pleasures of sense: his clothing agreed with the wilderness he lived in, and his doctrine of repentance. Now you cannot think that he, who was such a stranger to the pleasures of a court, should be brought to change his mind by the terrors of a prison, and to question whether Jesus be the Messiah or not?' Note, Those who have lived a life of mortification are least likely to be driven from their religion by persecution. He was not a man of soft raiment; such there are, but they are in kings' houses. Note, It becomes people in all things to be consistent with their character and situation. Preachers must not affect to look like courtiers; nor those whose lot is cast in common dwellings, be ambitious of princely and royal apparel. Prudence teaches us to be of a piece. John appeared rough and unpleasant, yet they flocked after him. Note, The remembrance of former zeal should quicken us in our present work: let it not be said that we have done and suffered so many things in vain, run in vain, and labored in vain.

3. Here quoted as the Father saying to the Son, 'before thy face,' and the way before. Thee; so that the way of Christ was the way of the Lord, of Jehovah, for 'He and the Father are One.'—Our Lord said, 'All born of women,' (of all men) there had not arisen a greater than John the Baptist; none more holy, faithful, and humble; none who was in a more honorable service; none favored with clearer views of evangelical truth, and none who had personally seen the subject of prophecy. Yet the least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he. The least of the apostles, or New Testament prophets, who were called to establish the Messiah's kingdom, would know more of the person, obedience, atonement, and mediation of Christ, and be in a more distinguished service, and endowed with more of the Holy Spirit, than John had been, and would possess miraculous powers, which he did not. If we extend the passage to all faithful ministers, or believers, it can relate only to the excellence of the Gospel, and the more distinct views of its nature and glory with which they are favored; for, in personal excellence, few have been greater than John, or indeed equal to him. (Murg. He.) But the first interpretation is most satisfactory.

(7) 'Christ designs here to convince the scribes and Pharisees of the inconsistency of their conduct, in acknowledging John Baptist for a divinely authorized teacher, and not believing in the very Christ he pointed out to them. He also shows, from the excellencies of John's character, that their confidence in him was not misplaced.'

'Our Lord meant by this praise, to avert from John any suspicion of inconvenient place. It is better to retire into obscurity, with teachers, than be without them. Now if his preaching was worth taking so much pains to hear, surely it was worth the care of recollecting. The greater the difficulties we have broken through to hear the Word, the more we are concerned to profit by it. They went out to see him; rather for curiosity than conscience. Note, Many attend on the Word rather to see and be seen, than to learn and be taught; to have something to talk of, than be made wise to salvation. Christ inquires, What went ye out to see? Note, We shall be called to account as to our intentions and improvements in hearing the Word. We think that, when the sermon is done, the care is over; no, then the greatest care begins. It will shortly be asked, 'What business had you at such a time, at such an ordinance? What brought you thither? Custom, company, or a desire to honor God, and get good? What have you brought thence? What knowledge, grace, or comfort? What went you to see?' Note, When we go to read and hear the Word, we should see that our aim is right.

III. The commendation of John. They knew not how to answer our Lord's question: He therefore tells them what a man John Baptist was. 1. 'He was a firm, resolute man, and not a reed shaken with the wind: as you have been in your thoughts of him. He was not wavering in principle, not uneven in conversation, but remarkable for steadiness and uniform consistency.' He was strong in spirit. Eph. 4:14. When the wind of popular applause, on the one hand, blew fresh and fair, and the storm of Herod's rage, on the other, grew fierce and blustering, he was still the same. His testimony to Christ was not that of a reed, of a man who was of one mind to-day, and of another to-morrow: not a weather-cock testimony; no, his constancy in it is intimated, (John 1:20.) he confessed, and denied not, but confessed and maintained it afterwards, John 3:23. The question, therefore, sent by his disciples was not to be construed into any suspicion of the truth of what he had formerly said: Hence the

3. His office and ministry. This was more his honor, than any personal endowments or qualifications could be.

He was a prophet, yea, and more than a prophet: (v. 9.) so said He who was the great Prophet, to whom all the prophets bear witness, John said of himself, he was not that Prophet, that great Prophet, the Messiah; and now Christ: (the most competent judge) says of him, that he was more than a prophet. He owned himself inferior to Christ, and Christ owned him superior to all other prophets. Observe, Christ's forerunner was not a king, but a prophet, lest his kingdom should seem to be laid in earthly power; yet, his forerunner, as such, was a transcendent prophet, more than an Old-Testament prophet: they did virtuously, but John excelled them all: they saw Christ's day at a distance; their vision was yet for a great while to come; but John saw the day dawn, he saw the sun arise, and told the people of the Messiah, as One that stood among them. They spake of Christ, but he pointed Him out: they said, A virgin shall conceive; he said, Behold the Lamb of God!

He was the same that was predicted to be his forerunner, (v. 10.) This is he of whom it is written. He was prophesied of by the other prophets, and therefore was greater than they. Malachi prophesied concerning him, Behold I send my messenger before thy face. Herein some of Christ's honor was put on him, and this honor have all the saints, that their names are written in the Lamb's book of life. It was great preferment to John above all prophets, that he was Christ's harbinger. He was a messenger sent on a great errand; one of a thousand, deriving his honor from Him, whose messenger he was: he is his messenger, sent of God, and sent before the Son of God. His business was, to prepare Christ's way, disposing the people to receive the Savior, by showing them their sin and misery, and need of Him. This he had said of himself, (John 1:23;) and now Christ said it of him, intending not only to honor John's ministry, but revive people's regard to it, as making way for the Messiah. Note, Much of the beauty of God's dispensations lies in their mutual connection and reciprocal concurrence. John was above the Old-Testament prophets, as coming immediately before Christ. Note, The nearer any are to Christ, the more truly honorable are they.

There was not a greater born of women than John the Baptist, v. 11. Christ knew how to value persons according to their worth, and He prefers John before all that went before him, all that had been born. John is the most eminent of all whom God had raised up for service in his church, more so than Moses; for he began to preach the gospel-doctrine of remission of sin to those who are truly penitent, and had more signal revelations from heaven than any, for he saw heaven opened, and the Holy Ghost descend. He also had great success in his ministry: almost the whole nation flocked to him: none rose on a design so great, or came

'By the kingdom of heaven in this verse, is meant the fulness of the blessings of the Gospel of peace; which fulness was not known till after Christ had been crucified, and had risen from the dead. It does not mean the state of future glory.—See chap. 3:2. It is not in holiness or devotedness to God, that the least in this kingdom, is greater than John; but merely in the difference of the ministry. The prophets pointed out a Christ that was coming. John showed that the Christ was then among them; and the preachers of the Gospel prove that this Christ has suffered, and entered into his glory, and that repentance and remission of sins are proclaimed through his blood.

Some understand it of Christ Himself, who was younger, and, as some think, less than John; who always spoke diminishingly of Himself: I am a worm, and no man, yet greater than John. So it agrees with what John said, (John 1: 15.) He that cometh after me is preferred before me. But it is rather to be understood of the apostles, and ministers of the New Testament, the evangelical prophets: and the comparison between them and John respects office, not character. He preached Christ coming, but they Christ come, nay, crucified and glorified. John came in the gospel-dawn, and therein excelled foregoing prophets; but he was taken off ere the noon, before the rending of the veil, before Christ's death and resurrection, and the pouring out of the Spirit; hence the least of the apostles and evangelists, having greater discoveries made them, and being on a greater embassy, is greater than John. He did no miracles; the apostles wrought many. The ground of this preference is the preference of the New-Testament dispensation to that of the Old. Ministers of the New Testament excel, because their dispensation excels, 2 Cor. 3: 6, &c. The great commendation of John the Baptist was, that God owned his ministry, and made it wonderfully successful in preparing the way for the kingdom of heaven. Verse 12.

With the ministry of John, the new dispensation began to be introduced, and the kingdom of heaven to be preached; and while generally disregarded, persons of the worst character, (who might rather have been expected to plunder houses,) earnestly sought admission into it, and it seemed to suffer violence, and the violent seized it by force; and they, who were supposed to have no right in these blessings, obtained them, while scribes, Pharisees, priests, and rulers, who regarded these benefits as their unalienable inheritance, were excluded, and publicans and harlots entered before them. Presseth into it, Luke 16: 16. In Luke, the middle verb is used actively, but here it is translated passively, and the context confirms the translation. These persons were so convinced and excited by our Lord's preaching 'the kingdom of God,' that they broke through whatever hindered their entrance into it. Verse 13—15.

Moses, and all the prophets, by types and predictions, foretold the coming of the Messiah as a future event; but John declared Him to be at hand, and pointed Him out as come; and if the people would believe this declaration, John was the person, predicted under the name of Elias, as sent to prepare the way for the Messiah. This information on an errand so noble, or had such claims to a welcome reception. Many born of women had made a great figure in the world, but Christ preferred John before them. Note, Greatness is not to be measured by appearances and outward splendor: but they are the greatest men who are the greatest saints, and the greatest blessings; who are, as John was, great in the sight of the Lord, Luke 1: 15.

Yet this high encomium of John has a surprising limitation; notwithstanding, he that is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he; that is, the kingdom of glory. John was a great and good man, but imperfect; he therefore came short of glorified saints, and the spirits of just men made perfect. Note, First, There are degrees of glory in heaven; though every vessel is alike full, all are not alike capacious. Secondly, The least saint in heaven is greater, and knows more, loves more, and does more in praising God, and receives more from Him, than the greatest in this world. The saints on earth are excellent ones, (Ps. 16: 3,) but those in heaven are more excellent: the best in this world are lower than the angels, (Ps. 8: 5,) the least are there equal with angels: hence we should long for that blessed state, where the weak shall be as David, Zech. 12: 8. 2. But by the kingdom of heaven here, is rather to be understood the kingdom of grace, the gospel-dispensation the perfection of its power and purity. He that is less in that, is greater than John. Some understand it of Christ Himself, who was younger, and, as some think, less than John; who always spoke diminishingly of Himself: I am a worm, and no man, yet greater than John. So it agrees with what John said, (John 1: 15.) He that cometh after me is preferred before me. Note, All true greatness is derived from and denominated by the gracious manifestation of Christ. The best are no better than He pleases to make them. What reason for thankfulness have we, that our lot is cast in the days of the kingdom of heaven, under such advantages of light and love! But the greater the advantages, the greater will be the account, if we receive the grace of God in vain.

The great commendation of John the Baptist was, that God owned his ministry, and made it wonderfully successful in preparing the way for the kingdom of heaven. From the days of his first appearing until now, (not much above two years,) great good was done; so quick was the motion when it came near to Christ, the Centre. The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence—like that of an army storming a city, or of a crowd bursting into a house. We have the meaning in a parallel phrase, (Luke 16: 16.) Every man presseth into it. Multitudes are wrought upon.

1. Improbable multitudes: such, one would think, as had no right or title to the kingdom, and so seemed intruders, making a wrongful and forcible entry. When the children of the kingdom are excluded, and many come from the east and the west, then it suffers violence. Compare this with ch. 21: 31, 32. The publicans and harlots believed John, whom the scribes and Pharisees rejected, and so went into the kingdom of God before them; took it over their heads while they trifled. Note, It is no breach of civility to go to heaven before men of higher rank; and it commends the Gospel greatly, that it has brought many to holiness who were very unlikely.

2. Importunate multitudes. This violence denotes a vigor and earnestness of desire and endeavor. It shows also what fervency and zeal are required in those who mean to make heaven of their religion. Note, Those who would enter the kingdom of heaven, must strive to enter: self must be denied, the bias, frame, temper of the mind must be altered; hard services are to be performed, and sufferings to be undergone—a force is to be put on corrupt nature; we must run, wrestle, fight, and be in an agony; and all little enough to win such a prize, and overcome such opposition from without and within. The violent take it by force. Those who determine on the great salvation, are carried out towards it with a strong desire; will have it on any terms, and not think them hard, nor quit their hold without a blessing, Gen. 32: 26. Such as will make their calling and election sure, must give diligence. The kingdom of heaven was never intended to include the ease of triflers, but to be the rest of them that labor. It is a blessed sight,—Oh that we could see a greater number,—not with an angry contention, thrusting others out, but with a holy contention, thrusting themselves into the kingdom of heaven!

The ministry of John was the beginning of the Gospel, as it is reckoned, Mark 1: 1. Acts 1: 22. This is shown here in two things:

1. In John, the Old-Testament dispensation began to die, v. 13. The obligation of the law of Moses was not removed till Christ's death, but the discoveries of the Old Testament began to be superseded by the more clear manifestation of the kingdom of heaven at hand. The light of the Gospel (as that of nature) was to precede and make way for its law; therefore the prophecies of the Old Testament came to an end; (an end of completion, not of duration,) before the precepts of it; so when Christ says, all the prophets and the law prophesied until John. He shows us, First, How the light of the Old Testament was set up, even in the law and the prophets, who spoke, though darkly, of Christ and his kingdom. Observe, The law is said to prophesy as well as the prophets, concerning Him that was to come. Christ began it Moses, (Luke 24: 27.) Christ was foretold by the dumb signs of Mosaic work, as well as by the more articulate voices of the prophets; was exhibited not only in personal and real types, but in verbal predictions. Blessed be God, that we have both the New-Testament doctrine, to explain the Old-Testament prophecies, and the Old-Testament prophecies concerned all men; and every one capable of hearing, ought to listen to it as a truth connected with his duty and happiness. (Marg. Ref. 1.) This is the meaning of the concluding sentence, and is often repeated. The limitation of it to an 'inward hearing ear' tends to prevent the effect designed, which is to excite universal attention. Scott.

Secondly, that he should appear before the destruction of the second temple. Even the Lord, whom ye seek, shall suddenly come to his temple, ibid. Thirdly, that he should preach repentance to the Jews, and that some time after, the great and terrible day of the Lord should come, and the Jewish land be smitten with a curse, chap. 4: 5, 6. two Testaments, as Noah was the link connecting both worlds. The concluding prophecy was, Behold, I will send you Elijah, Mal. 4: 5, 6. Those words prophesied until John, when they became history, and prophesied no longer. First, Christ speaks of it as a great truth, that John the Baptist is the Elias of the New Testament: not in person, as the Jews expected: he denied that, (John 1: 21.) but in the spirit and power of Elias. (Luke 1: 17.) like him in temper and conversation, pressing repentance with terrors, and, as in the prophecy, turning the hearts of the fathers to the children. Secondly, He speaks of it as a truth, which would not be easily apprehended by those, whose expectations fastened on the temporal kingdom of the Messiah. Christ suspects the welcome of it; If ye will receive it. Not but that it was true, whether received by them or not, but He reproves their backwardness to receive truths so favorable to their interests, only because they were opposed to their sentiments. Or, 'If you will receive him as the promised Elias, he will be an Elias to you, to turn you, and prepare you for the Lord.' Note, Gospel truths are, as they are received, a savor of life, or death.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 7-15. Alas! how unsatisfactory an account can many give of what they go to see or hear, in places of public worship! They go to satisfy curiosity, or to trifle away time. Instead of meeting to see the shaking of a reed, or 'a man clothed in soft raiment,' they mean to exhibit their own apparel, or compare it with that of their neighbors!—For 'soft raiment' is not now confined to kings, but all endeavor to wear it, whatever their ability; and more of it appears in worshipping assemblies, than consists with the precepts and glory of God, the interests of families, the good of the poor, or prosperity of souls. But the Lord will call those, who go to hear his Word, to an account of their motives, as well as those who do not go, for their neglect. We should, then, attend to hear his messengers, who come to prepare the way, that his kingdom may be set up. And as the least of faithful ministers, who now preach the Gospel, is greater, in some respects, than all, who lived before that dispensation, it behoves us 'to give the more earnest heed to the things we have heard, lest at any time we should let them slip.' (Note, Heb. 2: 1-4.) Considering our light and information, 'what manner of persons ought we to be in all holy conversation and godliness!' In every age, 'the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force.' Most atrocious transgressors, who 'strive to enter in at the strait gate,' who wrestle in prayer, and are in earnest about their souls, outstrip their more moral, decent neighbors, who are supine, dilatory, and lukewarm. They who are resolved, at all adventures, to find admission, succeed; but such as postpone the concerns of their souls to worldly interest, pleasures and diversions, will come short; as well as those who seek salvation in any other way than by 'repentance towards God and faith' in his beloved Son. To Him, 'Moses and all the prophets,' John the Baptist, and the apostles and evangelists bear witness, that whosoever believeth in Him shall receive remission of sins.' This we must attest, whether men will receive it or not, and call on all, 'who have ears to hear,' seriously to regard it.

Our Lord next exposed the perverseness of the Jews by an apt similitude. They were like sullen children, who quarrel on every attempt of their fellows to please them, or induce them to join in the diversions, for which they met in market-places. Their companions piped a cheerful tune to engage them, but they refused to dance to it: they represented the mournful strains of the funeral, but they refused to lament. Such a capricious disposition is often observed in children, and is ought to deserve correction. Yet, in a matter of infinite importance, the people of that generation copied it. The Lord used means to prepare them for the blessings of the Gospel, but they objected to all. John came, abstinence and austere, and they said, 'he is a melancholy lunatic, and possessed with a devil.' The Son of man came free, and social, eating and drinking without austerity: He partook of entertainments as circumstances required; but instead of being pleased at his courteous and social demeanor, they malevolently and absurdly called Him a 'glutton,' and 'wine-bibber,' and because He went among notorious sinners, to reform them, they accused Him of loving their characters and company. But the divine wisdom in these and all appointments will be perceived, approved, and adored by those, who are born and taught of God, and thus made wise unto salvation. All these are taught by grace to adore the depth of the riches both of the knowledge and wisdom of God, in dispensations, which they do not understand, and give Him credit for wisdom, justice and goodness, where they do not perceive them; and to understand many designs and appointments, which to others appear perplexed. (Notes. Rom. 11: 33-36. 1 Cor. 2: 14-16.) Gluttonous. This is stronger than the original, 'an eater, and a drinker of wine.'

SCOTT.

(16.) Like unto children. 'Like the children complained of, and not like those that made the complaint: but, more especially in Matthew's style, the phrase, it is like, often signifies only in general, that the thing spoken of may be illustrated by the following similitude.' And so the phrase must be understood, Matt. 13. 24, and 45. 18: 23. 1. and 22: 2.

These things the children acted and personated in the streets in play, and the rest, not following the leader as usual, gave occasion to the speech ascribed to them.'

Markets. 'The forum, or market-place, was usually a public market, on one side only, the other sides of the area being occupied by temples, theatres, courts of justice, and other public buildings. Here the philosophers met, and taught; here laws were promulgated; and here devotions, as well as amusements, occupied the populace. Note, 1. God uses a variety of proper means and methods for the conversion and salvation of men. He would have all men to be saved, and therefore leaves no stone unturned in order to it. The great thing He aims at is to melt our wills into a compliance with his will, by affecting us with discoveries of Himself. As there are various affections to be wrought on, He uses various ways, which, though differing one from another, all tend to the same thing; and God is in them carrying on the same design. In the parable, this is called his pipino to us, and his mourning to us; the former in his promises, working on our hopes, the latter, in his threatenings, working on our fears, that thus He might alarm us out of our sins, and allure us to Himself. He has piped to us in gracious and merciful providences, mourning to us in calamities and afflictions, and has set the one over against the other. He has taught his ministers to change their voice: (Gal. 4: 20.) sometimes to speak in thunder from mount Sinai, sometimes in a still small voice from mount Zion.

In the explanation of the parable is shown the different temper of John's ministry and of Christ's, the great lights of that generation.

On the one hand, John came mourning to them, neither eating nor drinking; not being familiar with the people, nor ordinarily eating with them, but alone, in his cell in the wilderness, where his meat was locusts and wild honey. Now this, one would think, should work on them; for such an austere, mortified life, was agreeable to his doctrine, and that minister is most likely to do good, whose life accords with his instructions; and yet the preaching even of such a minister is not always effectual.

On the other hand, the Son of man came eating and drinking, and thus pipino unto them. Christ was familiar with all sorts of persons, affecting no peculiar austerity, but being often at feasts with Pharisees and publicans, to win those whom John's severity had not awed. So Paul learned to become all things to all men, 1 Cor. 9: 22. Not that, by this freedom, Christ would condemn John, any more than John, by his reserve, would have condemned Christ; but so different were their manners. Note, Though never so clear in the goodness of our own practice, we must not judge of others by it. There may be a great diversity of operations, where it is the same God that worketh all in all, (1 Cor. 12: 6.) and this various manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal, v. 7. Observe especially, that God's ministers are variously gifted: the ability and genius of some lie one way, of others, another; one is a Boanerges—a son of thunder; another a Barnabas—a son of consolation; yet all these worketh that One and the self-same Spirit; (1 Cor. 12: 11.) and therefore we ought not to condemn either, but praise both, and praise God for both, who thus deals variously with persons of various tempers, that they may be either made piable, or left inexcusable; so that whatever be the issue, God may be glorified.

Note, 2. The various methods God takes for the conversion of sinners, are with many fruitless and ineffectual; ' Ye have not danced, ye have not lamented: ' you have not been suitably affected either with the one or the other.' Particular means are designed, as in medicine, for particular ends, in order to the great and general result: now if people will be neither bound by laws nor invited by promises, nor alarmed by threatenings, will neither be awakened by the greatest things, nor allured by the sweetest, nor startled by the most terrible, nor be made sensible by the plainest; if they will hearken to the voice neither of Scripture, nor reason, nor experience, nor providence, conscience, or interest, what more can be done? The bellows are burned, the lead is consumed, the founder melteth in vain: reprobate silver shall men call them, Jer. 6: 25. Ministers' labor is bestowed in vain, (Isa. 49: 4.) and, a much greater loss, the grace of God received in vain, 2 Cor. 6: 1. Note, It is some comfort to faithful ministers, when unsuccessful, that it is no new thing for the best preachers and best preaching to come short of the desired end. Who has believed our report? If the bow of great commanders, of Christ and John, so often turned empty, (2 Sam. 1: 22.) no marvel if ours do so, and we prophesy to little purpose upon dry bones.

Note, 3. Those who do not profit by the means of grace, are commonly perverse and reflect on the ministers by whom they possess these means: and because they get no good themselves, prejudice others against the Word, and the faithful preachers of it, and do what hurt they can. Those who will not comply with God, and walk after Him, confront Him, and walk contrary to Him. So this generation did: unwilling to believe Christ and John, and to own them for the best of men, as they ought, they abused them, and represented them as the worst. As for John the Baptist, they say, He has a devil. They imputed his manner of life to melancholy, or to some Satanic influence. ' Why should we heed him! He is a poor hypochondriac man, full of fancies, and under the power of a crazed imagination.' As for Christ, they imputed his free and obliging conversation to habits of luxury and animal indolence. Behold a gluttonous man, and a wine-bibber. No reflection could be more foul and invidious: it is the charge against the rebellious son, (Deut. 21: 20.) He is a glutton and a drunkard, yet none could be more false and unjust; for Christ pleased not Himself, (Rom. 15: 3.) nor did any man ever live a life of such real mortification to the world, as Christ lived. He that was undefiled and separate from sinners, is here represented as in league with them, and polluted by them. No degree of innocence, or of excellence, will always be a defence against the reproach of tongues: nay, a man's best gifts and best actions may be made his reproach. Our best actions indeed may become our worst accusations, as David's fasting, Ps. 69: 19. It was true, in some sense, that Christ was a Friend of publicans and sinners, the best Friend they ever had; who came into the world to save them, even the chief of sinners; so he said very feelingly who had himself been, not a publican and sinner, but a Pharisee and sinner; but this is, and will be to eternity, Christ's praise; and they forfeited the benefit of it who thus turned it to his reproach.

Note, 4. The cause of the great unfruitfulness and perverseness of people under the means of grace, is, that they are like children sitting in the markets—foolish as children, forward as children, mindless and playful as children. Would they but show themselves men in understanding, there might be hope of them. The market-place is to some a place of idleness (ch. 20: 3.) to others, a place of worldly business: (James 4: 13.) to all, a place of noise or diversion: so if you ask why people get little good by the means of grace, you will find it is because they are slothful and trifling, and take no pains; or because their heads, hands, and hearts are full of the world, the cares of which choke the word, and their souls at last, (Ezek. 33: 31. Amos 8: 5.) and they study to divert their thoughts from every thing serious. Thus in the markets they are, and there they sit; in these things their hearts rest, and by them they abide.

Note, 5. Though many abuse, yet a remnant improve, the means of grace, to the glory of God, and the good of their own souls. But wisdom is justified of her children. Christ is Wisdom: in Him are hid the treasures of wisdom: the saints are the children God has given Him, Heb. 2: 13. The Gospel is wisdom, it is the wisdom from above: true believers are begotten again by it, and born from above: they are wise children, wise for themselves and their

' By children, our Lord may simply mean the fruits or effects of wisdom, according to the Hebrew idiom, which denominates the fruits or effects of a thing, its children. So in Job, chap. 5: 7, sparks emitted by coals are termed, the children of the coal.'

' It should be observed, that our Lord enjoined no austerities as absolute duties, nor even recommended any as carrying men to a higher degree of Divine favor. The religion of Christ stands eminently distinguished in this respect, when compared with other religions which have been founded in the fanaticism, either of their authors, or their first followers.'

ticular to those places, to affect them. Then began He to upbraid them, v. 20. He began to preach to them long before, (ch. 4: 17.) but did not begin to upbraid till now. Gentle means must be used first. Christ is not apt to upbraid. He gives liberally, and upbraideth not, till sinners, by their obstinacy, extort it from Him. Wisdom first invites, but when slighted, then she upbraids, Prov. 1:20, 24. Those are unlike Christ who begin with upbraidings. Now observe

The sin charged on them; not any against the moral law: then an appeal would have lain to the Gospel, which would have relieved; but impenitence, a sin against the Gospel, the remedial law itself, this was it He upbraided them with, that they repented not. Note, Wilful impenitence is the great, damning sin of multitudes that enjoy the Gospel, with which (more than any other,) sinners will be upbraided to eternity. The great doctrine not only of John, but of Christ and his apostles, was repentance; their uniform design being, to prevail with people to change their minds and ways, to leave their sins and turn to God; and to this they would not be brought. He does not say, because they believed not; for some kind of faith many of them had, as that Christ was a Teacher come from God: but, because they repented not: that faith did not prevail to the transforming of their hearts, and the reformation of their lives. Christ reproved them for their other sins, that He might lead them to repentance; but when they repented not, He upbraided them with that, as their refusal to be healed: He did so, that they might upbraid themselves, and see their folly. Consider

The aggravation of the sin: they were the cities in which most of his mighty works were done. Note, Some places enjoy the means of grace in a higher degree than others. God is a free Agent, and so acts in all his dispensations, both as the God of nature and God of grace, common and distinguishing grace. By Christ's mighty works they should have been prevailed with, not only to receive his doctrine, but to obey his law: the curing of bodily diseases should have been the healing of their souls, but had not that effect. Note, The stronger the inducements to repent, the more heinous the impenitence, and the more severe the reckoning: for Christ remembers the mighty works done among us, and the gracious works done for us, too, by which also, we should be led to repentance, Rom. 2:4.

true interests; not like the foolish children that sit in the markets. These children of wisdom justify wisdom: they comply with the designs of Christ's grace, answer the intentions of it, and so evince the wisdom of Christ in it. This is explained, Luke 7: 29. The publicans justified God, being baptized with the baptism of John, and afterwards embracing the Gospel of Christ. Note, The success of the means of grace justifies the wisdom of God in the choice of them, as the cure of the patient justifies the wisdom of the physician in his prescription: therefore Paul is not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ, because, whatever it is to others, to them that believe it is the power of God unto salvation, Rom. 1: 16. When the cross of Christ, which to others is foolishness and a stumbling block, is to them that are called the wisdom of God, and the power of God, (1 Cor. 1: 23, 24.) so that they make the knowledge of it the summit of their ambition, (1 Cor. 2: 2.) and the efficacy of it the crown of their glorying, (Gal. 6: 14.) here is wisdom justified of her children. Wisdom's children are wisdom's witnesses in the world, (Isa. 43: 10.) and shall be produced as such in that day, when Wisdom, now justified by the saints, shall be glorified in the saints, and admired in all them that believe, 2 Thess. 1: 10. If the unbelief of some reproach Christ, and give Him the lie; the faith of others shall honor Him; by setting to its seal that He is true, and that He also is wise; 1 Cor. 1: 25. Whether we do it or not, it will be done; not only God's equity, but his wisdom will be justified, when He speaks, when He judges.

This, then, is the account Christ gives of that generation; and as it was then, it has been since, and is still: some believe the things which are spoken, and some believe not, Acts 23: 24.

II. As to the particular places in which Christ was most conversant. What He said in general of that generation. He applied in particular to those places.

Verse 20-24.

We are not competent to solve every difficulty in this subject, or fully to understand it. It suffices that Christ knew the impenitent Jews to be more hardened, and less susceptible of suitable impressions from his doctrine and miracles, than the inhabitants of Tyre and Sidon would have been; and, therefore, their condemnation would be proportionately tolerable. It is possible, that inhabitants of these cities professed to believe in Christ, yet did not repent; and our Lord, by upbraiding them, not repenting, emphatically showed the inefficacy of an impenitent faith.

(21.) Woe to thee. Better, alas for thee; an exclamation of pity, rather than a denunciation of wrath.

Chorazin! About two miles from Caesarea, of Galilee.

Bethsaida! On the lake of Gennesareth, at the north end, where the said. Christ came to bless, but if slighted He has woes in reserve, woes most terrible. These two cities were situate on the sea of Galilee, the former on the east side, the latter on the west, rich and populous places; Bethsaida was lately advanced to a city by Philip, the tetrarch; out of it Christ took at least three of his apostles: thus highly were those places favored! Yet, because they knew not the day of their visitation, they fell under these woes and soon dwindled into mean, obscure villages. So fatally does sin ruin cities, and so certainly does the word of Christ take place!

These places are compared with Tyre and Sidon, two maritime cities of Old-Testament report, just beginning to flourish again from previous ruin. These cities bordered on Galilee but were of ill fame among the Jews for idolatry, and other wickedness. Christ sometimes went into the coasts of Tyre and Sidon, (ch. 16: 21.) but never thither: the Jews would have taken it as a great offence; therefore, to convince and humble them, He here shows,

That Tyre and Sidon would not have been so bad as Chorazin and Bethsaida. If they had had the same Word preached, and the same miracles wrought among them, they would have repented long ago, as Nineveh did, in sackcloth and ashes. Christ, who knows all hearts, knew that, if He had gone, and lived, and preached among them, He would have done more good, than where He was; yet he continued where He was for a time, to encourage his ministers to do so, though they see not the success they desire. Note, Some are more easily wrought on than others, and it is an aggravation of the impenitence of those who have plentiful means of grace, not only that many who enjoy the same are wrought on, but that many more who enjoy less, would be wrought on if they enjoyed the same means. Ezek. 3: 6, 7. Our repentance is slow and delayed, but theirs would have been speedy; they would have repented long ago. Ours has been slight and superficial; theirs would have been deep and serious, in sackcloth and ashes. Yet we must observe, with an awful adoration of the divine sovereignty, that the Syrians and Sidonians will justly perish in their sin, though if they had had the means of grace, they would have repented: for God is a debtor to no man. Therefore Tyre and Sidon shall not be so miserable as Chorazin and Bethsaida, but it shall be more tolerable for them in the day of judgment, (v. 22.) Note, First, At the day of judgment, the everlasting state of men will, by an unerring and unalterable doom, be determined; happiness or misery, and the several degrees of each. Therefore it is called the eternal judgment, (Heb. 6: 2.) because decisive of the eternal state. Secondly, In that judgment, all the means of grace enjoyed in the state of probation, will certainly come into the account: and it will be inquired, not only how bad we were, but how much better we might have been, Isa. 6: 3, 4. Thirdly, Though the damnation of all that perish will be intolerable, yet that of those who had the fullest and clearest discoveries made them of the power and grace of Christ, will be most intolerable. The Gospel prepares all who become acquainted with it, either for higher happiness, or deeper damnation. "If self-reproach be the torture of hell, it must be hell indeed to those, who had fair opportunity of getting to heaven, and yet did not improve it. Son, remember that."

river Jordan flows into it. The name imports "a place of hunting and fishing;" for the latter of which, especially, its situation was very convenient. Three of the apostles, Peter, Andrew, and Philip, belonged to this city. It is reduced to the state of a very poor village, consisting of only five or six miserable cottages.

Tyre and Sidon.] Places remarkable for their luxury, pride, and contempt for religion. This is frequently the case with rich trading cities: and that it was so with these in particular, may be learned from many passages in the Old Testament, as well as from profane writers. See Judg. 18: 7. Isa. 23: 9. Ezek. 26: 2, 5, 17, 22. and Amos 1: 9, 10.

(22.) Day of judgment.] Final and universal judgment. Our Lord plainly speaks of a judgment "at was yet to come on all these places that He mentions."

23 And thou^d Capernaum, which art exalted unto heaven, shalt be brought down to hell: for if the mighty works which have been done in thee, had been done in Sodom, it would have remained until this day.

24 But I say unto you, That it shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom in the day of judgment, than for thee.

[Practical Observations.]

25 ¶ At that time, Jesus answered and said, I thank thee, O Father, ^kLord of heaven and earth, because thou hast hid sis, (v. 23.) 'And thou, Capernaum, hold up thy hand and hear thy doom.' Capernaum was honored above all the cities of Israel, in being Christ's most usual residence: it was like Shiloh of old, the place He chose to put his name there; and it shared the fate of Shiloh, Jer. 7: 12, 14. Christ's miracles here were as daily bread, and, therefore, as the manna of old, despised, and called light bread. Many a sweet and comfortable lecture of grace had Christ read them to little purpose; now, therefore, He reads them a dreadful lecture of wrath: those who will not hear the former, shall be made to feel the latter.

1. Her doom is put absolutely: Thou which art exalted to heaven, shalt be brought down to hell. 'Note, Such as enjoy the Gospel in power and purity, are exalted to heaven—have great honor for the present, and great advantage for eternity; they are lifted up toward heaven: but if, notwithstanding, they still cleave to the earth, they may thank themselves that they are not lifted into heaven. Gospel advantages abused will also sink sinners so much the lower in hell. Our external privileges will be so far from saving us, that, if our hearts and lives be not agreeable to them, they will but inflame the reckoning: the higher the precipice, the more fatal the fall from it. Let us not therefore be high-minded, but fear: not slothful, but diligent. Job 20: 6, 7.

2. In comparison with the doom of Sodom, a place more remarkable both for sin and ruin, than perhaps any other.

First, Capernaum's means would have saved Sodom. If these miracles had been done among the Sodomites, had as they were, they would have repented, and their city would have remained to this day, a monument of sparing mercy, as it now is of destroying justice, Jude 7. Note, Upon true repentance through Christ, even the greatest sin shall be pardoned, and the greatest ruin prevented, that of Sodom not excepted. Angels were sent to Sodom, and yet remained not; but if Christ had been sent thither, it would have remained: how well for us, then, that the world to come is put in subjection to Christ, and not to angels! Heb. 2: 5. It would not have seemed as one that mocked, if he had wrought miracles.

Secondly, Sodom's ruin will therefore be less at the great day than Capernaum's. Sodom will have many sins to answer for, but not the sin of neglecting Christ. If the Gospel prove a savor of death, it is doubly so: it is of death unto death, so great a death: (2 Cor. 2: 16.) Christ had said the same of all other places that receive not his ministers and Gospel: (ch. 10: 15.) It shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom than for that city. We that have the Bible, and the preaching of the Gospel, and the administration of its ordinances, and live under the dispensation of the Spirit, have advantages not inferior to those of Chorazin, Bethsaida, and Capernaum, and the account in the great day will be accordingly. It has therefore justly been said, that professors of this age, whether they go to heaven or hell, will be the greatest debtors in either of these places: if to heaven, the greatest debtors to divine mercy for the rich means that brought them thither: if to hell, the greatest debtors to divine justice, for those rich means that might have kept them thence.

V. 25—30. In these verses, we have Christ's thanksgiving to his Father for the sovereignty and security of the covenant of redemption, and his offer to all men of the privileges and benefits of the covenant of grace.

I. Christ's thanksgiving: Jesus answered and said. It is called an answer, though no other words are recorded but his own, because it is so comfortable a reply to the melancholy considerations preceding. The sin and ruin of those cities was, no doubt, a grief to the Lord Jesus: He could not but weep over them, as over Jerusalem: (Luke 19: 41.) With this thought, therefore, and in the form of thanksgiving, that it may be more refreshing, He

V. 16—24. Natural depravity causes sensible men to act with folly in the concerns of their souls. Their cavils are often futile and malignant. Their dislike to the message dictates objections to the messengers, and they urge something against every one, however holy. Determined to be displeased, they misconstrue their best actions. Their self-denial arises from melancholy; their cheerfulness from levity; their socialness from intemperance; their endeavors to reform the profligate are ascribed to a congeniality of disposition, and to dislike of goodness; their methods of doing good are but varied modes of mischief. In short, men will censure every thing to excuse themselves from joining Christians in mourning for sin, and seeking happiness from God, glorifying Him, and doing good to mankind. In vain may we hope to escape the calumnies of such men, as said that John the Baptist was a demoniac, and the Holy One of God, a 'gluttonous man,' and 'a wine bibber,' a companion of publicans and sinners. These are children of mischief, but wisdom's children welcome the messengers of God, and bless Him for their gifts and endowments, and they adore the divine wisdom in the things at which he ungodly cavil, to their eternal ruin. Our Lord will never upbraid the trembling penitent with his iniquities, but will awfully condemn such as continue impenitent under the means of grace. He knows the different degrees of enmity and obduracy, which possess the hearts of unbelievers, and will proportion their punishment accordingly. But it will be more tolerable for pagans in the judgment, than for wicked professors of Christianity. The Lord sends the Gospel to whom He pleases. He punishes none more than they deserve, and rejects none who seek salvation from Him. But those who have been exalted to heaven with outward advantages, should fear lest, by abusing them, they sink the deeper in hell: and many who dwell in this favored land will, undoubtedly, perish with a condemnation deeper than those of Tyre, Sodom, or Gomorrah.

SCOTT.

(23.) Exalted unto heaven, &c. A Hebrew metaphor, expressive of the utmost prosperity, and possession of the greatest privileges. It is a prophetic word of this city, because that in it our Lord dwelt, and wrought many of his miraculous works.

Hell. If, as Bp. Pearce suggests, is meant here not the place of torment, but rather a state of desolation, this prediction of our Lord was literally fulfilled; for, in the wars between the Romans and the Jews, these cities were totally destroyed, so that no traces are now found of Bethsaida, Chorazin or Capernaum.

IB.

The sovereignty of God, in giving more means of instruction to one city, or region, than to another which was better disposed to attend to them, might excite objections; to which perhaps Jesus answered by glorifying the divine conduct in a similar concern. He addressed the Father as the Governor of the universe, who doeth whatever pleases Him, and thanked, or adored Him, and professed acquiescence in his wisdom, equity, and goodness, in that He concealed the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven from the scribes and wise men of the nation, and revealed them to the poor and unlearned, to men of limited capacities, as education; despised for their ignorance and inexperience, but number as teachable as children: and this, for wise and gracious reasons, which He did not assign. (Note, Eph. 1: 9—12.) God did not, by positive influence, hide the proofs of Christ's mission from the wise and prudent. They had the Scriptures. They saw, or heard, his miracles, and had opportunity to know his doctrine. But they were blinded by pride and prejudice; and He gave them up to be judicially blinded, perhaps, among other reasons, that the success of the Gospel might appear to be the effect of divine power, and not of human wisdom and sagacity. (Note, 2 Cor. 4: 7.) But there was a positive influence in making known the truth to the apostles and disciples.

(Note, 18: 17.) The "wise and prudent" here are not men spiritually wise, but men of carnal, worldly wisdom, and swelling conceit of their proficiency; which indisposes men to spiritual wisdom. And our Lord's God is said to have hid the wisdom of the Gospel, because He permitted them to continue in the conceit and worldly mindedness, which caused them to reject it as disagreeable to their inclinations and sentiments. The "babes" are the humble, meek persons, who, with a low esteem of their own wisdom, give themselves up to the divine wisdom, and, being free from carnal affections, embrace it when revealed. It being suitable to the wisdom of God, who "resists the proud, but giveth grace to the humble," to make known his will to persons so prepared to receive it, our Lord adds, "for so it seemed good in thy sight." Whitby (Note, 6: 3.) I thank Thee. (25.) I confess to Thee. (3: 6; Luke 10: 21. Thou hast hid. 'God is often said, in Scripture, to do those things which He determines to permit, and which, He foresees, will be in fact the consequence of those circumstances in which his creatures are be grateful, and to say, Thank you, father, as readily as, Pray, father. When, also, we come to God as a Father, we must remember that He is Lord of heaven and earth: we must come to Him with reverence, as to the sovereign Lord of all; with confidence, likewise, as to One able to do for us whatever we need or desire; to defend us from all evil, and to supply us with all good. Christ, in Melchizedec, has long since blessed God as the Possessor, or Lord of heaven and earth; and in all our thanksgivings for mercies in the stream, we must give Him the glory of the all-sufficiency that is in the fountain.

2. The thing for which He gives thanks: Because Thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes. These things: He does not say what things, but means the great things of the Gospel, the things that belong to our peace, Luke 19:42. He speaks emphatically of them, these things, because they were things that filled Him, and should fill us, all other things are 'as nothing to these.

Note, The great things of the everlasting Gospel have been and are hid from many wise and prudent, eminent for learning and worldly policy; some of the greatest scholars and greatest statesmen have been great strangers to gospel mysteries. The world by wisdom knew not God, 1 Cor. 1:21. Nay, there is a science falsely so called, (1 Tim. 6:20) opposed to the Gospel. The most expert in things sensible and secular, are commonly least experienced in spiritual things, not feeling the power of them.

While the wise and prudent of the world are in the dark about Gospel mysteries, even babes in Christ have the sanctifying, saving knowledge of them: Thou hast revealed them unto babes: such Christ's disciples were: men of mean birth and education; no scholars, no artists, no politicians; unlearned and ignorant men, Acts 4:13. Thus are the secrets of wisdom made known to babes and sucklings, that out of their mouths might be ordained strength, refreshes Himself, that, for all this, there is a remnant, though but babes, to whom the things of the Gospel are revealed: though Israel be not gathered, yet shall He be glorious. Note, We may take great encouragement in looking up to God, when round about us we see nothing but discouragement. It is sad to see how regardless most men are of their own happiness, but comfortable to think, that the wise and faithful God will, however, effectually secure the interests of his own glory. Jesus answered and said, I thank Thee. Note, Thanksgiving is a proper, and may be an effectual remedy for dark and disquieting thoughts. Songs of praise are sovereign cordials for the desponding and melancholy. When we have no other answer to the suggestions of grief and fear, we may have recourse to this, I thank Thee, O Father: let us bless God that it is not worse with us than it is.

In this thanksgiving of Christ, we may observe,

1. The titles He gives to God: O Father, Lord of heaven and earth. Note, In all our approaches to God, it is good to eye Him as a Father, and to fasten on that relation, whether we ask for needed mercies, or give thanks for mercies received. Mercies are doubly sweet, and powerful to enlarge the heart in praise, when received as tokens of a father's love, and gifts of a father's hand: Giving thanks to the Father: Col. 1:12. It becomes children to and God's praise be perfected. Choice was not made of the learned men of the world, to be the preachers of the Gospel, but of the foolish things of the world, 1 Cor. 2:6, 8, 10.

This difference between the prudent and babes is of God's own making. [1.] It is He that has hid these things from the wise and prudent; He gave them parts, and learning, and understanding above others, and they were proud of that, rested in it, and looked no further: therefore God justly denies them the Spirit of wisdom and revelation; and though they hear the sound of the Gospel tidings, they are to them a strange thing. God is not the author of their ignorance and error, but He leaves them to themselves, and their sin becomes their punishment, and the Lord is righteous in it. See John 12:39, 40. Rom. 11:7, 8. Acts 28:26, 27. Had they honored God with their wisdom and prudence, He would have given them the knowledge of these better things; but because they served their lusts with them, he has hid their hearts from this understanding. It is God who has revealed them unto babes. Things revealed belong to our children, (Deut. 29:29.) and to them He gives understanding to receive these things, and the impressions of them. Thus He resists the proud, and gives grace to the humble, Jam. 4:6.

All this must be resolved into the divine sovereignty; Christ Himself referred it to that; Even so, Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight. Christ here subscribes to the will of his Father in this matter: Even so. Let God glorify Himself in what way, and by what instruments He pleases: his grace is his own to give, or to withhold. We can give no reason why Peter, and not Nicodemus, should be made an apostle; but so it seemed good in God's sight. Christ said this in the hearing of his disciples, to show them that it was not for any merit of their own, that they were thus dignified and distinguished, but purely from the good pleasure of God, who had made them to differ.

This way of dispensing divine grace is to be acknowledged by us, as it was by our Lord Jesus, with all thankfulness. We must thank God, 1. That these things are revealed; the mystery hid from ages and generations manifested; that they are revealed, not to a few, but to be published, to all the world. 2. That they are revealed to babes, that the meek and humble are beautified with this salvation: and those are thus honored whom the world contemns. 3. It magnifies the mercy to them, that these things are hid from the wise and prudent: distinguishing favors are most obliging. As Job adored the name of the Lord, in taking away as well as in giving; so may we, in hiding these things from the wise and prudent, as well as in reveal-placed, though their wills are laid under no constraint. (Compare Exod. 7:3, 4. 2 Sam. 12:11, 12. 24:1. and 1 Kings 22:22, 23.) In this sense alone did He say to hide those things from the learned and well-disposed persons, though children in understanding, might come to the knowledge of them. Compare Matt. 10:34, 35.

There is a remarkable saying in the Talmudists, which casts light upon this. Rab. Johanan said, "From the time in which the temple was destroyed, wisdom was taken away from the prophets, and given to fools and children." Again, "In the days of the Messiah, every species of wisdom, even the most profound, shall be revealed; and this even to children."

Wise and prudent. [Sages, and the learned.] CAMPBELL (1863). "To all the bold and presumptuous reasonings of the human mind, which have been, or may be hereafter brought forward, against the exercise of JEHOVAH'S sovereignty, the answer is direct. Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right? Surely the LORD is not called to give account of the motives of his holy will and pleasure to any of his creatures. One thing we know, that his counsel and purpose must stand, and He will do all his pleasure; and that all He doeth is right. His conduct towards his creatures is by an unerring standard. His mercy is not moved by any good in us, nor kept back by our undeservings; for neither our merit, nor our misery, can be said to have disposed the purposes of his sovereign will towards us. That the Lord hath taken occasion, from our misery, to magnify the abounding riches of his mercy, is true; but his mercy was before our misery, and his own everlasting love the sole cause of our blessedness in Christ. Our LORD'S own words are, therefore, most apposite: even so, Father! for so it seemed good in thy sight!" HAWKER.

This verse contains a declaration of our Lord's personal and mediatorial dignity. The Father had delivered all things into his hands, all power, authority, and judgment. (Notes, 28:18. John 3:27-36. rev. 5:5, 20-29.) None knew Jesus as the Son of God, but the Father; none knew the Father except the Son; neither could any truly know the Father except as the Son revealed his nature and glory: for this was committed to Him, as Mediator in respect to all our race. This represents the Son as co-equal with the Father, and incomprehensible; and it demonstrates, that those, who reject the teaching of Jesus as the Son of God, and do not depend on Him 'to reveal the Father' to them, cannot rightly know the one, true and living God, whom they profess to worship. 'There is no true knowledge of God, nor quietness of mind, but in Christ alone,' Beza. The worship of the Jews, since the nation rejected their Messiah, of Mohammedans, of deists, and all unbelievers, is rendered to an imaginary deity: 'the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ' being to them 'the unknown God.' Scott. All things are delivered.] 'This is a great truth, and the key of the science of salvation. The man Christ Jesus receives from the Father, and in consequence of his union with the eternal Godhead, becomes the Lord and sovereign Dispenser of all things. All the springs of the Divine favor are in the hands of Christ, as Priest of God, and atoning sacrifice for men; all good proceeds from Him, as Savior, Mediator, Head, Pattern, Pastor, and sovereign Judge of the world.'

Dr. A. CLARKE. No one knoweth the Son but the Father.] 'These words evidently declare that there is something inexplicably mysterious in the nature and person of Christ; which indeed appears in the most convincing manner from the account elsewhere given of his Divine Scripture.'

The full comprehension and acknowledgment of the Godhead, and the mystery of the Trinity, belong to God alone.

sanctified and sealed to be the sole Plenipotentiary, to concert and establish this great affair. In order to this, He has all power, both in heaven and in earth; (ch. 23: 18.) power over all flesh; (John 17: 2.) authority to execute judgment, John 5: 22, 27. This encourages us to come to Christ, that He is commissioned to receive us, and to give us what we come for, having all things delivered to Him for that purpose, by Him who is Lord of all. All powers, all treasures, are in his hand. Observe, The Father has delivered his all into the hands of the Lord Jesus; let us but deliver our all into his hand, and the work is done. God has made Him the great Referee, the blessed Days-man, to lay his hand upon us both: what we have to do, is, to agree to the reference, to submit to the arbitration of the Lord Jesus, and enter into bonds to stand to his award. He exhilits, Secondly, His intimacy with the Father: No man knoweth the Son but the Father, neither knoweth any man the Father save the Son. This gives us further and abundant satisfaction. Ambassadors have not only their public commissions, but their private instructions, to be made use of as there is occasion in their negotiations. Our Lord Jesus had both, not only authority but ability, for his undertaking. In transacting the great business of our redemption, the Father and the Son are the parties principally concerned; the counsel of peace is between them, Zech. 6: 13. We have the encouraging assurance therefore, that they each understood one the other in this concern: that the Father knew the Son, and the Son knew the Father, and both perfectly, (a mutual consciousness, we may call it, between the Father and the Son,) so that there could be no mistake, as there often is among men, to the overthrow of contracts, and breaking of the measures taken. The Son had lain in the bosom of the Father from eternity; John 1: 18. He was by Him, as one brought up with Him, (Prov. 8: 30.) so that none knows the Father, save the Son; He adds, and he to whom the Son will reveal Him. Note, The happiness of men lies in an acquaintance with God: it is life eternal, the perfection of rational beings. Those, also, who would have an acquaintance with God, must apply to Jesus Christ, in the face of whom shines the light of the knowledge of the glory of God, 2 Cor. 4: 6. We are indebted to Christ for all the revelation we have of God, the Father's will and love, ever since Adam sinned: There is no comfortable intercourse between a holy God and sinful man, but in and by a Mediator, John 14: 6.

2. The offer itself, and an invitation to accept it. After so solemn a preface, we may well expect something great: and it is so, a faithful ing them unto babes; not as it is their misery, but as it is a method by which self is abased, proud thoughts brought down, all flesh silenced, and divine power and wisdom made to shine the more brightly. See 1 Cor. 1: 27, 31.

II. Christ's gracious offer of the benefits of the Gospel. Observe, 1. The solemn preface, which, both to command attention and encourage compliance, ushers in this call or invitation. That we might have strong consolation, in lying for refuge to this hope set before us, Christ prefixes his authority, or produces credentials, showing that He is empowered to make this offer.

Two things He here lays before us, v. 27. First, His commission from the Father: All things are delivered unto me of my Father. Christ, as God, is equal in power and glory with the Father; but, as Mediator, receives his power and glory from the Father; has all judgment committed to Him. He is authorized to settle a new covenant between God and man, and to offer peace and happiness to the apostate world, on such terms as He should think fit: He was saying, and well worthy of all acceptance, words whereby we may be saved. We are here invited to Christ, as our Priest, Prince, and Prophet, to be saved, and in order to that, to be ruled and taught by Him.

We must come to Christ as our Rest, (v. 28.) Come unto Me, all ye that labor. Observe, 1. The character of the persons invited; all that labor, and are heavy laden. This is a word in season to him that is weary, Isa. 50: 4. Those who complain of the burden of the ceremonial law, a yoke intolerable by itself, and much more so by the tradition of the elders, (Luke 11: 46.) let them come to Christ, and they shall be made easy; He came to free his church from the yoke, (of carnal ordinances,) and to introduce a purer and more spiritual worship; but it is rather to be understood of the burden of the guilt and power of sin. Note, All those, and those only, are invited to rest in Christ, that are sensible of sin as a burden, and groan under it, that are not only convinced of the evil of sin, of their own sin, but are contrite in soul for it; that are really sick of their sins, weary of the service of the world and of the flesh; that see their state and danger by reason of sin, and are in fear and pain about it, as Ephraim, (Jer. 31: 18-20,) the prodigal, (Luke 15: 17,) the publican, (Luke 18: 13,) Peter's hearers, (Acts 2: 37,) Paul, (Acts 9: 4, 6, 9,) the jailor, (Acts 16: 29, 30.) This is a necessary preparation for pardon and peace. The Comforter must first convince; (John 16: 8.) I have torn, and I will heal.

Consider, 2. The invitation itself: Come unto Me. That glorious display of the greatness of Christ, in v. 27, as Lord of all, might frighten us from Him, but here He holds out the golden sceptre, that we may touch and live. Note, It is the duty and interest of weary and heavy laden sinners, to come to Jesus Christ. Renouncing whatever stands in opposition to Him, or comes in competition with Him, we must accept of Him as our Physician and Advocate, and give up ourselves to his conduct and government: choosing to be saved by Him in his own way, and on his own terms. Come and cast that burden upon Him, under which thou art heavy laden. This is the gospel-call. The Spirit saith, Come; and the Bride saith, Come; let him that is athirst, come: whosoever will, let him come.

Observe, 3. The blessing promised to those that do come: I will give you rest. Christ is our Noah, whose name signifies rest, for this same shall give us rest; Gen. 5: 29. 8: 9. Truly, rest is good, (Gen. 49: 15.) especially to those that labor and are heavy laden, Eccl. 5: 12. Note, Jesus Christ will give assured rest to weary souls, that, by a lively faith, come to Him for it: rest from the terror of sin, in a well-grounded peace of conscience; rest from

Verses 28—30.

The Divine Savior, having declared his dignity and authority, invited 'all who labored and were heavy laden' to come to Him. In some sense this included all, for worldly men labor like slaves, and burden themselves with cares to increase wealth, or acquire honor. The dissipated labor hard, and are heavy laden with pleasures and diversions. The slave of Satan and his own lusts is a drudge, and if he attempt, by his own strength, to break loose, he labors in vain. The superstitious labor in the fire, and are heavy laden with self-imposed burdens. The ceremonial law laid heavy burdens on the people compared with the Gospel. They, who try to establish their own righteousness, are wearied in vain. The convinced, trembling sinner is heavy laden with guilt and terror; and the tempted believer has his labors too. Every heart knows its own bitterness, but Christ invites all, who in any respect 'labor and are heavy laden,' to come to Him for rest: though such as labored under a sense of guilt, or were heavy laden with burdens imposed by scribes and Pharisees, seem specially intended. Christ alone gives this invitation. Others direct men to go to the Savior. The Father and the Spirit concur in the instruction.—Men come to Jesus, when feeling their guilt, misery, and inability to help themselves; and, believing his love and power to help them, they seek Him in fervent prayer and rely on Him for salvation. All, who thus come to Him, receive rest, are released from condemnation, relieved from anxious cares, fears, and superstitious, and obtain peace, satisfaction, and comfort. (Note, Jer. 6: 16, 17.) But, coming to Him, they must take his yoke upon them, and submit to his authority as their Lord. (Note, 7: 24—25.) They must learn of Him, as their teacher, whatever relates to their acceptance, comfort, or obedience, especially the true knowledge of God. (Notes, 27. John 17: 1—3.) For their encouragement, He assures them that He is 'meek and lowly in heart.' Some explain this of what He teaches, even the imitation of his meekness and lowliness. This is necessary, and leads to inward peace; for the storm which rends the cedar on the mountain, leaves the lily unmolested in the valley. But it is to be understood of our Lord, as a Teacher and Ruler. He does not treat his scholars with harshness; but deals gently with them, bears with their ignorance, condescends to their infirmity, rejects no willing scholar, and accepts the willing servant, notwithstanding his mistakes, defects, and incidental faults. In his service, men find rest, and there only. Nor need they fear his yoke. Most of his commandments are the same with the moral law, and all coincide with it; but that law is holy, just, and good, and obedience tends to proportionate felicity. As the Savior puts it as his yoke on the believer, it is deprived of its condemning power, enforced by evangelical motives, encouragements, and promises, made easy by love and divine consolations; and a correspondent disposition is wrought by regenerating grace. This obedience requires self denial, and exposes to difficulties; but it is compensated, even in this world, by inward peace and joy. So that Christ's yoke is easy in itself, as well as when compared with that of Satan and sin, which those, who reject the former, must bear. The burden of corrections, temptations, and tribulations, to which Christ's service exposes us, would sink us, if left to ourselves; but being counterpoised with internal supports, it proves 'light, is but for a moment, and works out for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory; (2 Cor 4 17, Gr.) so that every way his 'yoke is easy and his burden light.'

(28.) 'Come unto Me, then, by faith, all ye that labor and are heavy burdened, whether with the distresses of life, or with the sense of guilt. (See Psalm 23: 4. 38: 4.) or with the load of ceremonial observances, which your unmerciful teachers are so ready to impose (Matt. 23: 4.) and I will ease you of the grievous burdens under which you sink.'

(29.) 'Be instructed by Me, whom ye will find a meek and condescending Teacher, not rough, haughty, and impatient, but one who can bear with the infirmities of the weak; and who, more desirous to edify lowly in heart: 'and ye shall find rest unto your souls.

50 For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light.

service of God, but an obligation to the duty we owe to Him. Note, Christ has a yoke for our necks, as well as a crozier for our heads, and this yoke He expects we should take upon us, and draw in it. To call those that are weary and heavy laden, to take a yoke upon them, looks like adding affliction to the afflicted; but the pertinence of it lies in the word, my. 'You are under a yoke which wears you; shake that off and try mine, which will make you easy.' Servants are said to be under the yoke, (1 Tim. 6:1.) and subjects, 1 Kings 12:10. To take Christ's yoke upon us, is to put ourselves into the relation of servants and subjects to Him, and then to conduct ourselves accordingly, in a conscientious obedience to all his commands, and a cheerful submission to all his disposals; it is to obey the Gospel of Christ, to yield ourselves to the Lord: it is Christ's yoke: the yoke He has appointed; a yoke He has Himself drawn in before us, for he learned obedience; and which He does, by his Spirit, draw in with us, for He helpeth our infirmities. Rom. 8:26. A yoke speaks some hardship, but if the beast must draw, the yoke helps him. Christ's commands are all in our favor; we must take his yoke upon us, to draw in it. We are yoked to work, and therefore must be diligent; we are yoked to submit, and therefore must be humble and patient; we are yoked together with our fellow servants, and therefore must keep the communion of the saints; and the words of the wise are as goads to those who are thus yoked.

Now this is the hardest part of our lesson; therefore it is qualified, (v. 30.) my yoke is easy, and my burden light; you need not fear it.

1. The yoke of Christ's commands is an easy yoke—not only easy, but gracious, so the word signifies: it is sweet and pleasant: there is nothing in it to gall the yielding neck, nothing to hurt us, but on the contrary, much to refresh us. It is a yoke that is lined with love. Such is the nature of all Christ's commands, so reasonable, so profitable, and all summed up in one word, and that a sweet word, love. So powerful are the assistances He gives, so suitable the encouragements, and so strong the consolations attending the discharge of duty, that we may truly say, it is a yoke of pleasantness. It is easy to the new nature, very easy to him that understandeth, Prov. 14:6. It may be a little hard at first, but it is easy afterward: the love of God, and the hope of heaven, will make it easy.

2. The burden of Christ's cross is a light burden, very light; afflictions from Christ, which befall us as men: afflictions for Christ, which befall us as Christians: the latter are especially meant. This burden in itself is not joyous, but grievous; yet, as it is Christ's, it is light. Paul knew as much of it as any man, and he calls it a light affliction, 2 Cor. 4:17. God's presence, (Isa. 43:2.) Christ's sympathy, (Isa. 63:9.) Dan. 3:25.) and especially the Spirit's aids and comforts, (2 Cor. 1:5.) make suffering for Christ light and easy. As afflictions abound, and are prolonged, consolations abound and are prolonged too. Let this, therefore, reconcile us to the difficulties, and help us over the discouragements, we may meet, both in labor and suffering: though we may lose for Christ, we shall not lose by Him.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 25—30. While the Son, with his angels and redeemed people, adores the Father for hiding the mysteries of his redeeming love from the wise and prudent, and revealing them to the unlearned, 'even to babes,' because 'it seemeth good in his sight,' the proud and impenitent scorn, detest, and blaspheme such declarations. The wise of this world often demonstrate and illustrate the truth which they oppose. They show, that divine teaching only can make known divine things in their nature and glory; and they evince the propriety of our Lord's leaving them to be blinded by prejudices, seeing their arrogance more than equals their superior sagacity. But all things are committed to our Redeemer. We cannot know either the Father, or the Son, except by the holy Word and Spirit: we can know nothing of the one apart from the other. And as none can 'know the Father but the Son, and he to whom the Son will reveal Him,' so he must know most in this matter, who with docility and simplicity hears and believes his words. The Redeemer's condescension and mercy equal his majesty. And He invites the laboring, burdened sinner to Him for rest. Why, then, should any labor for what is not bread? Let us come to Him daily for deliverance from wrath and guilt, from sin and Satan, and from all perplexities. As our Prophet, let us learn of Him: as our Priest, rely on Him; and, as our King, obey Him; copy his meekness and lowliness; and, whatever impurity may object, or the world, the flesh, or devil suggest, we shall find his yoke easy and his burden light; his service, freedom and rest, and that 'in keeping his commandments, there is great reward.'

others than to please Himself, will not disdain to adapt his lessons to the capacities of the learners.

CAMPBELL.

(30.) Yoke. This word is applied by the Jews to the following things:—1. The yoke of the dominion of heaven—obedience to the revealed will of God. 2. The yoke of the law—the necessity of obeying all the precepts of the Law of Moses. 3. The yoke of the receipt—the necessity of performing that particular obligation, by which any person had bound himself, such as that of the Nazarite, &c. 4. The yoke of REPENTANCE—without which, they knew, they could not enter into the kingdom of heaven. With the Jews, repentance was only implied forsaking sin, but fasting, mortification, &c.

5. The yoke of FAITH—the necessity of believing in the promised Messiah. 6. The DIVINE yoke—the obligation to live a spiritual life; a life of thanksgiving and gratitude to God.

Dr. A. CLARK.

Easy. 'Rather, says Schleusner, "useful, salutary, beneficial." Freely. 'As our Savior's discourses were often suggested by the objects which offered themselves to his view, it is not improbable that, while speaking these words, He was looking on the concourse of travellers coming up to Jerusalem, at one of the great festivals, some of them loaded with burdens, and all fatigued with the journey. Hence He might take occasion to speak of things spiritual, of the easy yoke of religion, and the true rest of the soul. The things He requires He calls a yoke, and burden; that is, as matters of duty and obligation, with which we must needs comply. But it is only with respect to the perverse inclinations of men, that the religion of Christ may be called a yoke and burden: for it is easy and light compared with what men often lay on themselves and others, and the aids of the Gospel can remove all difficulties of which men complain in the practice of duty.'

JURIN.

'The word translated light properly signifies both light and pleasant; and that translated easy, may be also rendered gentle and agreeable; and so with great propriety may express that true pleasure and cheerfulness that are the genuine result of a sincere subjection to Christ's government, which is plainly the meaning of taking his yoke. (Compare Deut. 27:47, 48; 1 Kings 12:4; and Isa. 10:27.) It is observable that the word yoke is particularly used for ceremonial impositions. Acts 15:10; and 1 Gal. 5:1; and the word burden is used in the same sense. Matt. 23:4. Compare Matt. 46:19.'

CHAP. XII.

The disciples pluck ears of corn to eat, on the sabbath. 1. Christ vindicates them from the charge of breaking the sabbath, 2-8; heals the withered hand of one in the synagogue; and sheweth lawful to do good on the sabbath, 9-13. The Pharisees seek to kill him; He draws, yet works miracles, and so fulfils a prophecy of Isaiah, 14-21. He casts out 'devils' from a dumb and blind man, 22, 23; confutes the charge of the Pharisees, of casting out devils by Beelzebub, 24-30; and sheweth the sin against the Holy Ghost to be unforgivable and that every idle word must be accounted for, 31-37. He invites those who sought a sign, and will give none but that of Jonah, 38-40. The Ninivites, and the queen of the south, will condemn that generation, 41, 42. By a parable He sheweth their awful state, 43-45. His disciples are his most endeared relations, 46-50.

AT went on the sabbath-day through the corn; and his disciples were an hungered, and began to pluck the ears of corn, and to eat.

2 But when the Pharisees saw it, they said unto him, 'Behold, thy disciples do that which is not lawful to do upon the sabbath-day!'

3 But he said unto them, 'Have ye not read what David did, when he was an hungered, and they that were with him?'

4 How he entered into the house of God, and did eat of the shewbread, which was not lawful for him to eat, neither for them which were with him, but only for the priests?

rest in the love of God and Christ, and here obtain that which gives abundant satisfaction; quietness and assurance forever. And this satisfaction will be perfected and perpetuated in heaven, where we shall see and enjoy God immediately, shall see Him as He is, and enjoy, as He is ours. This rest is to be had with Christ for all who learn of Him.

Such, then, is the sun and substance of the gospel and offer: we are told, in few words, that the Lord Jesus requires of us, which agrees with what God said of Him once and again: This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased; hear ye Him.

CHAP. XII. v. 1-13. The Jewish teachers had corrupted many of the commandments, by interpreting them too loosely; a mistake which Christ noticed and rectified, (ch. 5.) in his sermon on the mount; but as to the fourth commandment, they had erred in the other extreme. It is common for men of corrupt minds, by their zeal in the externals of religion, to think to avenge the looseness of their morals. But they are cursed who add to, as well as they who take from, the words of this book, Rev. 22:16, 19. Prov. 30:6.

Now, what our Lord here lays down, is, that the works of necessity and mercy are lawful on the Sabbath day, which the Jews, in many instances, were taught to scruple. Christ's explanation of the fourth commandment intimates our perpetual obligation to observe religiously one day in seven, as a holy Sabbath. He would not expound a law that was immediately to expire, but doubtless intended hereby to settle a point, which would be of use to the church in all ages: so He teaches us, that our Christian Sabbath, though under the direction of the fourth commandment, is not under the injunctions of the Jewish elders.

It is usual to settle the meaning of a law by judgments given on cases that happen in fact, and so is settled the meaning of this law: in order to which, two incidents, both answering this design, but differing in date and nature, are here brought together.

1. Christ, by justifying his disciples in plucking the ears of corn on the Sabbath day, shows that works of necessity are lawful on that day. Observe,

1. What it was the disciples did. Following their Master one Sabbath day through a cornfield, and going, as is likely, to the synagogue, (v. 29, for it becomes not Christ's disciples to take idle walks on that day,) they were hungry; because, intent on Sabbath-work, they forgot to eat bread, or spent so much time in morning worship, that they had no time for their morning meal, but came out fasting, because they would not come late. Providence ordered it, that they went through the corn, and there they were supplied. Note, God has many ways of bringing suitable provision to his people when they need it, and will take particular care of them when going to worship, as, of old, of them that went up to Jerusalem to worship, (Ps. 84 6, 7,) for whose use the rain filled the pools while in the way of duty, Jehovah jireh, God will provide for us. Being in the corn-fields, they began to pluck the ears of corn; the law of God allowed this, (Deut. 23:25,) to teach the people to be kind, and not to insist on property in a small matter, whereby another may be benefitted. This was but a slender provision for Christ and his disciples, but it was the best they had, and they were contented.

2. The offence taken by the Pharisees at this. It was but a dry breakfast, yet the Pharisees would not let them eat in quietness. They did not quarrel with them for taking another man's corn, (being no great zealots for justice,) but for doing it on the Sabbath day; plucking and rubbing the ears of corn on that day being expressly forbidden by the tradition of the elders, because it was a kind of reaping. It is no new thing for those, especially, who are zealous of their own inventions and impositions, to reflect on the most innocent and harmless actions of Christ's disciples, as unlawful. The Pharisees complained of them for doing that which it was not lawful to do. Note, Those are no friends to Christ and his disciples, who make that to be unlawful which God has not made so.

3. Christ's answer to this cavil. The disciples could say little for themselves, inasmuch as the strictness of the Sabbath-sanctification seemed to be on the Pharisees' side; and it is better to be too strict than too loose: but Christ came to free his followers, not only from Pharisaic corruptions, but unscriptural impositions: therefore, He speaks for them, and justifies what they did, though a transgression of the canon. He justifies them by precedents, allowed to be good by the Pharisees themselves.

He urges an ancient instance of David, who, in a case of necessity did that, which otherwise he ought not to have done; (v. 3, 4.) 'Have ye not read (1 Sam. 21:6.) of David's eating the shewbread, which by the law was appropriated to the priest? (Lev. 24:5-9.) It is most holy to Aaron and his sons; and (Exod. 29:33.) a stranger shall not eat of it: yet the priest gave it to David and his men;' for the exception of a case of necessity, though not expressed, was implied in that and all other ritual institutions: nor was it David's dignity that justified him, (for Uzziah, though a king, was struck with the leprosy for invading the priest's office, 2 Chron. 26:16, &c.) but his hunger. The greatest shall not have their lusts indulged, but the meanest shall have their wants considered. Hunger is a natural appetite, which can-

NOTES.

CHAP. XII. v. 1, 2. Matthew seems to fix the date of this transaction, manifestly after the events mentioned in the last chapter: but other evangelists record it earlier in our Lord's history. (Notes, Mark 2:23-28. Luke 6:1-11.) Jewish writers say it was not customary to taste food till after the service at the synagogue: but this must be a 'tradition of the elders;' for the Scripture never mentions, nor hints it. In going on the Sabbath to the synagogue, or in returning from it, the disciples, being hungry, plucked the ears of corn, rubbed them in their hands, and ate. The law allowed them to take of the produce of any field or vineyard, in this manner, in passing through it. (Notes, Lev. 23:24, 25.) But the Pharisees, who, as has been supposed, were deputed by the chief priests and rulers, to watch Jesus and his disciples, condemned this as a profanation of the Sabbath, considering it equivalent to reaping and threshing the grain, and intending to involve Jesus also in the same accusation.

On the Sabbath day.] On the Sabbaths. By comparing verses 2, 5, 8, 12, in the original, with the parallel passages in Mark and Luke, it appears, that the plural and singular are used indiscriminately for the seventh day of the week. Luke mentions the Sabbath on which this event occurred. (Luke 6:1-5.)

(1.) Corn.] The original word means any kind of grain, as barley, rye, wheat, according to the present meaning of 'corn' in England. The passage is generally translated ears of barley, which was early ripe; the time is determined by Luke. See Luke 6:1. In America, the word is appropriated to maize, or Indian corn, an indigenous plant. Bloomfield, from a rabbinic authority, shows that there were paths leading through the fields of corn.

Were an hungered.] The custom of the nation had, as yet, held them fasting—'We' suffered none, unless he were sick, to taste any thing on the Sabbath, before the morning prayers of the synagogue were begun.

(2.) 'The Jews were so superstitious concerning the observation of the Sabbath, that, in their wars with Antiochus and the Romans, they thought it criminal to defend themselves on that day; to which, therefore, on observing it, their enemies deferred their operations. Thus Pompey took Jerusalem.'

'Those who know not the spirit and design of the divine law, are of ten superstitious to inhumanity, and indulgent to impiety. An intolerant and censorious spirit in religion is one of the greatest curses a man can well fall under.'

Dr. A. CLARKE. The fathers of the Traditions write thus: 'He that reaps on the Sabbath, though never so little, is guilty. To pluck the ears of corn is a kind of reaping,' &c. The canons of the scribes adjudged to stoning one who transgressed this law.'

VERSES 3, 4.

David had been blamed, and had condemned himself for other parts of his conduct: yet this was never deemed criminal, the necessity of the case being a sufficient reason for dispensing with a ceremonial institution. Why then should Christ's disciples be condemned, even if they deviated from the letter of the law, to satisfy hunger? (Notes, Ex. 20:8-11.) 'It is a small thing to say, it is lawful for us to eat the bread removed from the table. It would be lawful, in extreme hunger, to eat the bread now sanctified on the table, if there were no other.' Kimchi, in Whitley. Mark 2:26. Luke 6:4. Heb. 9:2. Lev. 24:5-9.

(4.) House of God.] 'Viz., the house of Ahimelech the priest, who dwelt at Nob, with whom the tabernacle then was, wherein the Divine presence was manifested.'

Shewbread.] In Hebrew, 'bread of the presence,' or faces; because this bread was to be set continually 'before the face of Jehovah.' See Exod. 25:23 and 30.

(Since part of the frankincense put upon the bread was to be burnt on the altar, for a memorial, Lev. 24:7, and since Aaron, and his sons

Verses 5, 6.

(5) of ane. 'Put to what might be called a common use, by slaying and offering up sacrifices, and by doing the service of the temple, as on common days. Exod. 29:38. Num. 28:9.'

(6) A greater. 'Our Lord might, perhaps, point to his own body, the noblest temple of the Deity; (compare John 2:21.) or it might refer to the work then going on; but the former sense is much more natural.'

Does not our Lord refer here to Mal. 3:1? Compare Heb. 8:3. The Jews esteemed nothing greater than the temple, except the God who was worshipped in it. Christ, by asserting He was greater than the temple, asserts that He was God; and this He does in still more direct terms, v. 8. Compare Gen. 2:3.'

Verses 7, 9

The passage here referred to has been considered. (Notes, 9:10-13. Hos. 6:6.) Had the Pharisees understood the declaration, that God required mercy rather than sacrifice, they would not have condemned the guiltless. Relieving the hunger of disciples attending on Jesus in his labors of love, was an act of mercy, sufficient to justify so trivial a deviation from the exact rest of the Sabbath. And He added, 'the Son of man is Lord even of the Sabbath.' He was Ruler of his church. Thus He intimated, that, as 'Son of God,' He instituted the Sabbath, gave the law from Sinai, and had lost none of his authority by his humiliation, but should make such alterations respecting the time and circumstances of observing this sacred rest, as it became Him. It cannot be, that Christ would have so often discussed this subject, and shown what is lawful on the Sabbath, without allowing exceptions, if He had not intended, that the institution substantially should continue in full force under the Christian dispensation.

SCOTT.

(7) Mercy, and not sacrifice. 'That is; I always prefer acts of charity to matters of positive institution, when in any instance they interfere with each other. It is plain, our Lord's argument here is intended to prove, that circumstances of necessity dispense with some ceremonial observances, which were, in the general, commended by God, and manifestly go upon this foundation, that ceremonial institution, being the means of religion, if circumstances occurred in which they interfered with the end of it, were suspended of course; and when this is the case, the conscience of particular persons is to judge, as in the sight of God.'

He urges a daily instance of the priests, v. 5. The priests in the temple did a great deal of servile work on the Sabbath day; killing, flaying, burning the sacrificed beasts, which, in a common case, would have been profaning the Sabbath; and yet it was never reckoned any transgression of the fourth commandment, because the temple service required and justified it. This intimates, that those labors are lawful on the Sabbath day, which are necessary, not only to the support of life, but to the service of the day; as tolling a bell to call the congregation together, travelling to church, and the like. Sabbath rest is to promote, not to hinder, Sabbath worship.

Our Lord justifies his disciples by three cogent arguments.

1. In this place, is One greater than the temple. v. 6. If the temple-service would justify the priests, much more would the service of Christ the disciples. The Jews had an extreme veneration for the temple, it sanctified the gold: Stephen was accused for blaspheming that holy place; (Acts 6:13.) but Christ, in a corn-field, was greater than the temple, for in Him dwelt, not the presence of God symbolically, but all the fullness of the Godhead bodily. Note, If, whatever we do, we do it in the name of Christ and as unto Him, it shall be graciously accepted of God, however it may be censured and cavilled at by men.

2. God will have mercy and not sacrifice, v. 7. Ceremonial duties must give way to moral; and the natural, royal law of love and self-preservation must take place of ritual observances. This is quoted from Hosea 6:6. It was used before, ch. 9:13. in vindication of mercy to the souls of men; here, of mercy to their bodies. The rest of the Sabbath was ordained for man's good, in favor of the body, Deut. 5:14. Now no law must be construed so as to contradict its own end. If you had known what this means, — what it is to be of a merciful disposition, — you would have been sorry that they were forced to do this to satisfy hunger, and would not have condemned the guiltless. Note, First, Ignorance is the cause of rash and uncharitable censures. Secondly, It is not enough to read the Scriptures. Let him that readeth understand them. Thirdly, Ignorance of the meaning of the Scripture is specially shameful, in those who take on them to teach others.

3. The Son of man is Lord, even of the Sabbath day, v. 8. The law respecting that, as all other laws, being put into Christ's hands to be altered, enforced, or dispensed with, as He saw good. By the Son, God made the world, and instituted the Sabbath, in innocency: by Him He gave the ten commandments at Sinai; and the Son, as Mediator, was intrusted with the institution of ordinances, to make what changes He thought fit; and particularly as being Lord of the Sabbath, He was authorized so to alter that day, that it should become the Lord's day, the Lord Christ's day. And if Christ be the Lord of the Sabbath, it is fit the day, and all the work of it, should be dedicated to Him. By virtue of this power, Christ here enacts, that works of necessity, if really such, and not pretended, are lawful on the Sabbath day; and this explication of the law plainly shows that it was to be perpetual. The exception confirms the rule.

Christ having thus silenced the Pharisees, (v. 9.) departed, and went into their synagogue, the synagogue of these same Pharisees. Note, First, We must take heed that nothing unfit us for, or divert us from, a due attendance on holy ordinances. Let us proceed in the way of our duty, however by the perverse disputings of men of corrupt minds, or other ways, Satan may seek to ruffle and discompose us. Secondly, Private feuds and personal piques must not keep us back from public worship. The Pharisees had maliciously cavilled at Christ, yet He went into their synagogue. Satan gains his point, if, by sowing discord among brethren, he prevail to drive any of them from the synagogue and the communion of the faithful.

II. Christ, by healing the man that had the withered hand on the Sabbath day, shows that works of mercy are lawful and proper on that day. The work of necessity was done by the disciples, and justified by Him; the work of mercy was done by Himself: works of mercy were his works of necessity; it was his merit and drink to do good. I must preach, says He, in four ways, positive laws may cease to oblige: by "a natural law of necessity; by a particular law, which is superior; by the law of charity and mercy; and by the dispensation and authority of the Lawgiver. These cases are all exemplified from verse 4, to verse 6."

DODD.

'Profanations of the Sabbath have sometimes been defended on the ground of this passage. Since our Lord reproves the Jews for too rigorously exacting the rest of the Sabbath, it intimates, as is alleged, that we ought not to be scrupulous; and that many things may be allowable, which timid minds consider unlawful. But Jesus condemns nothing in the Jews which was not plainly absurd and superstitious; and He allows no exceptions to that rest from labor which they observed on the Sabbath, except for works of necessity and charity. It is lawful, in short, as our Savior expresses it, to do well on the Sabbath day; to preserve ourselves, and to benefit our fellow-creatures: with these exceptions, and these only, we should consecrate the Sabbath, as a holy rest unto the Lord.'

Dr. A. CLARKE.

(8) Even of the Sabbath. 'This certainly implies, that the Sabbath was an institution of great and distinguished importance; and may perhaps refer also to that signal authority which Christ, by the ministry of his apostles, should exert over it, in changing it from the seventh to the first day of the week.'

Bp. PORTER.

Verses 9-13.

On another Sabbath, He entered a synagogue, and the same subject was again introduced. (Notes, Mark 3:1-5. Luke 13:10-17.) As a man, whose hand had withered, attended the synagogue, the Pharisees, watching to find matter of accusation, asked our Lord, whether it was lawful to heal on the Sabbath. If this was meant to include the inquiry, how far the labor of curing by medicine is consistent with hal- lowing the Sabbath, it was not without difficulty; for many things of this sort are works of necessity and mercy, and others might very well be postponed. It seems from the other evangelists, that Jesus answered first by another and more simple question: 'Is it lawful to do good on the Sabbath day?' He would not be diverted by their objections from his purpose of mercy, nor give them the ground of accusation for which they sought; and He asked them, whether, if a single sheep should fall into a pit, on the Sabbath, any one of their company

11 And he said unto them, 'What man shall there be among you, that shall have one sheep, and if it fall into a pit on the sabbath-day, will he not lay hold on it, and lift it out?'

12 How much then is a man better than a sheep! Wherefore 'it is lawful to do well on the sabbath-days.'

13 Then saith he to the man, Stretch forth thine hand. And he stretched it forth; and it was restored whole like as the other.

never made under the precepts of the elders. Is it lawful to heal? To inquire into the lawfulness and unlawfulness of actions, is very good, and we can apply to none, in reference to them, more fully than to Christ: but they asked here, not that they might be instructed by Him, but that they might accuse Him. If He should answer in the affirmative, they would accuse Him of contradicting the fourth commandment; to so great a degree of superstition had they brought the Sabbath rest, that, unless in peril of life, they allowed not any medical operations on the Sabbath day. If He should say it was not lawful, they would accuse Him of partiality, having lately justified his disciples in plucking the ears of corn on that day.

3. Christ's answer to this question, v. 11, 12. In case a sheep, (though but one, of which the loss would be great,) should fall into a pit on the Sabbath day, would they not lift it out? No doubt, they might do it; the fourth commandment allows it: they must do it, for a merciful man regardeth the life of his Luke 4: 43. This cure is recorded for the sake of the time when it was wrought.

Here is, 1. This poor man's affliction; his hand was withered, so that he could no longer get his living by working with his hands. This poor man was in the synagogue. Note, Those who can do but little, or have but little to do for the world, must do so much the more for their souls; as the rich, the aged, and the infirm.

2. A spiteful question of the Pharisees put to Christ on the sight of this man. They asked Him, saying, Is it lawful to heal? We read not of any address of the poor man to Christ for a cure, but they observed Christ began to notice him, and knew it was usual for Him to be found of those that sought Him not; therefore, with their badness, they anticipated his goodness, and started this case as a stumbling-block in the way of doing good: Is it lawful to heal on the Sabbath day? Whether it was lawful for physicians or not, which was disputed in their books, one would think it past dispute, that it is lawful for prophets, for Him who discovered a divine power and goodness in all He did, and manifested Himself to be the Sent of God. Did ever any one ask, whether it is lawful for God to heal; to send his word and heal?

It is true, Christ was now made under the law, by a voluntary submission to it, but He was beast, and for their parts they would do it, rather than lose a sheep. Does Christ take care for sheep? Yes, He does: He preserves and provides for both man and beast. But here He says it for our own sakes, (1 Cor. 9: 9, 10,) and hence argues, How much then is a man better than a sheep? Sheep are useful and highly valued, yet man is preferred before them, being a creature of more value than any of the brute animals: a reasonable creature, capable of knowing, loving, and glorifying God. The sacrifice of a sheep could therefore not atone for the sin of a soul. They do not consider this, who are more solicitous for their horses and dogs than for God's poor, or perhaps their own household.

Hence Christ infers a truth, which, even at first sight, appears very reasonable: that it is lawful to do well on the Sabbath days; they had asked, 'Is it lawful to heal?' Christ proves it is lawful to do well; and let any judge whether healing, as Christ healed, was not doing well. The duties of God's immediate worship are not the only way of doing well on Sabbath days; attending the sick, relieving the poor, helping those who are fallen into sudden distress; this is doing good: and this must be done from a principle of love, with humility and self-denial, and a heavenly frame of spirit, and this is doing well, and it shall be accepted, Gen. 4: 7.

4. Christ's curing of the man, v. 13. The Pharisees, though unable to answer Christ's arguments, persisted in their prejudice and enmity; but Christ went on with his work notwithstanding. Note, Duty is not to be left undone, nor opportunities of doing good, neglected, for fear of giving offence. Observe the manner of the cure: He said to the man, 'stretch forth thy hand; exert thyself as well as thou canst;' and he did so, and it was restored whole. This, as other cures Christ wrought, had a spiritual significance. By nature, our hands are withered, we are utterly unable of ourselves, to do any thing that is good. It is Christ only, by the power of his grace, that cures us; He

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-13. They who follow Christ must be ready, when called to it, to endure hunger, or submit to mean fare; and to be reproached, and falsely accused, for their close attendance on Him and his ordinances: but they should leave the Lord to plead in their behalf, and He will do it effectually.—Such professed Christians, as are most destitute of the power of godliness, are often most tenacious of forms, even to a scrupulous minuteness; especially when they can make use of them to support their credit or authority, to cloak iniquity, or oppose the upright servants of the Lord. Many of this description seem never to have read the Scriptures; for they severely censure, in living disciples, the very things, for which holy men of old were not blamed: and at the same time they profess to hold the latter in high estimation; because they have the sanction of general opinion, are no longer the subjects of envy or competition, and give them no opposition or uneasiness in their ungodly practices. They will also condemn those things in persons of another party, which they overlook or excuse in those of their own.—Whilst 'the Lord of the Sabbath,' who is far greater than the temple, and all external institutions, authorizes those labors on his holy day, which are necessary, and conducive to the real good of ourselves or others, or subservient to piety and charity, He doubtless most strictly binds us from all other secular employments. The exercise of mercy, rather than sacrifice, allows us, on some occasions, to omit attendance on public ordinances, and to make needful provision for our health and food: yet, surely, when domestics are confined at home, and families rendered a scene of hurry and confusion 'on the Lord's day,' in order to furnish a fast for visitants, who can then spare their time, more conveniently than on other days, for social indulgence, the case is very different! In censuring things of this kind, we need not fear 'condemning the guiltless.'—They, who are unable to labor for their bread, are sometimes capable of attending on the ordinances of God; and, in this way, may expect comfort under their calamities, or deliverance from them. But, alas! there are numbers, who frequent places of worship in order to start objections, or find matter of accusation, against the servants of God; and many a good question is proposed from very base motives. We cannot, like our Lord, discern the thoughts of such objectors: yet we must go on with our duty; endeavoring by meekness, benevolence, an irreproachable conduct, and unanswerable arguments, to obviate or silence their malicious insinuations.—Men will do more to save a trifle of their own property, than to relieve their neighbors: and some will even refuse to infringe the rest of the Lord's day, by visiting the afflicted, who would not decline labor if they were likely to lose the lives of their cattle! The Lord's day, however, is especially the time for healing the souls of men: and whilst the helpless sinner hears the voice of Christ, and endeavors to obey it; he feels and manifests, that he has received power to do those things, of which before, he was utterly incapable; and becomes, by his holy example, a witness of the Savior's power and love, and of the blessed effects of his Gospel. SCOTT.

would omit to pull it out, either from regard to his property, or compassion to the animal. Yet this would be labor, while his miracles were performed without any. But how much more valuable is a rational and immortal being, than a mere animal! How much more requisite, by the law of love, to bring immediate relief to the one than the other! It must, then, be consistent with the law, to perform actions of mercy on the Sabbath, which are good in themselves, and ornamental to piety, having thus silenced them. He ordered the man to stretch forth his hand, and it was immediately restored. SCOTT.

(10.) Withered hand. 'An atrophy, (of the limb,) and an inability to move the nerves and muscles, which would cause the limb to be rigid, was what the Jews understood by a "withered limb."'

BLOOMFIELD.
 (11.) It appears from authors quoted by Lightfoot, Clarke, and Bloomfield, that, however the glosses of rabbis might alter the precept forward, as mentioned by Buxtorf, yet, in the time of our Lord, full permission was allowed to rescue 'a beast fallen into a ditch on a holy day,' as in the Mishna. But we may assure ourselves that our Lord, to use the language of Dr. Gill, 'well knew their usages and customs, which He was able to object to them; in which, through covetousness, they showed more regard to their beasts, than humanity to their fellow-creatures.'

Ed.
 (13.) Stretch forth. 'The bare command of God is a sufficient reason of obedience. It might appear reasonable, had the man said, "Lord, my hand is withered; how can I stretch it out? Make it whole, and I will then do as Thou commandest." But this, in his case, would have been foolishness. At the command of the Lord he made the effort, and in making it the cure was effected! Faith disregards apparent impossibilities, where there is a command and promise of God. The effort to believe, is often that, faith by which the soul is healed. A little before (v. 6-8) Jesus Christ had asserted his Godhead, in this verse he proves it. It is worthy of remark, that as the man was healed with a word, without even a touch the Sabbath was unbroken, even according to the Jews' most rigid interpretation of the letter of the law.'

Dr. A. CLARKE.

14 ¶ Then the Pharisees went out, and held a council against him, how they might destroy him.

theirs, but that his doctrine directly opposed their pride, hypocrisy, and worldly interest: yet they pretended to be displeased at his breaking the Sabbath day, which was by the law a capital crime, Exod. 35: 2. Note, It is no new thing to see vile practices cloaked with specious pretences. Observe their policy; they took counsel about it. Observe their cruelty; they took counsel, not to imprison or banish, but to destroy Him. What an indignity, to run Him down as an outlaw and the plague of his country, who was the greatest blessing of it, the glory of his people Israel!

II. Christ's absconding on this occasion, (p. 15.) He could have secured Himself by miracle, but chose to do it by the ordinary means; because in this, as in other things, He would submit to the sinless infirmities of our nature. Herein He humbled Himself; thus also, He would give an example to his own rule. When they persecute you in one city, flee to another. Christ had said and done enough to convince those Pharisees, if reason or miracles would have done it; but instead of yielding to the conviction, they were hardened and enraged, and therefore, He left them as incurable, Jer. 51: 9.

Christ did not retire for his own ease, and was even then doing good, when He was forced to flee. Thus He gave an example to his ministers, to do what they can, when they cannot do what they would, and to continue teaching, even when removed into corners. When the Pharisees forced Him to withdraw, the common people crowded after Him, (p. 15.) This some would turn to his reproach, and call Him the ringleader of the mob; but it was really his honor; as it was also, that the poor were evangelized. Christ came into the world to be Physician-general, as the sun to the lower world, with healing under his wings. Though the Pharisees persecuted Him for doing good, yet He went on in it, and suffered not the people to fare worse for the wickedness of their rulers. Note, Though some are unkind to us, we must not on that account be unkind to others.

Christ studied to reconcile usefulness and privacy: He healed them all, and yet (p. 16.) charged them that they should not make Him known; which may be regarded, 1. as an act of prudence. Note, Wise and good men, though they covet to do good, are far from coveting to have it talked of when it is done: because it is God's acceptance, not men's applause, they aim at. And in suffering times, though we must holdly go on in the way of duty, yet we must contrive the circumstances of it so as not to exasperate, more than is necessary, those who seek occasion against us; Be ye wise as serpents, ch. 10: 16. 2. As an act of righteous judgment on the Pharisees, who were unworthy of any more of his miracles, having made so light of those they had seen. 3. As an act of humility and self-denial. Christ's intention in his miracles was to prove Himself the Messiah, and so bring men to believe on Him, yet sometimes he charged the people to conceal them, to set us an example of humility, and teach us not to proclaim our own goodness or usefulness, or desire to have it proclaimed. Christ would have his disciples be the reverse of those who did all their works to be seen of men.

Verse 14.

Took counsel together, by what means they might destroy Him, or find some plausible accusation against him, that He might be condemned to death as a deceiver or blasphemer.

This is the first time mention is made of a design on our Savior's life.

Held a council.] 'Rather, consulted together; for, as in Mark, the phrase implies not the calling of a council, but "taking counsel." The Pharisee had no privilege of a council by themselves.' GROTIUS.

Verse 15.

Withdrew.] 'It is the part of prudence and Christian charity not to provoke, if possible, the blind and the hardened; and to take from them the occasion of sin.'

Our Savior, instead of affliction on the Pharisees a punishment heals the withered hand, and by putting life into the dead soul, works in us both to will and to do. In order to our cure, He commands us to stretch forth our hands, to improve our natural powers, and do as well as we can to stretch them out in prayer to God, to stretch them out to lay hold on Christ by faith, to stretch them out in holy endeavors. Now this man could not stretch forth his withered hand of himself, any more than the impotent man could rise and carry his bed, or Lazarus come forth out of his grave: yet Christ bid him do it. God's commands to us, to do the duty which of ourselves we are not able to do, are no more absurd or unjust, than this command to the man with the withered hand, to stretch it forth; for, with the command, there is a promise of grace which is given by the word. Turn you at my reproof, and I will pour out my Spirit, Prov. 1: 23. Those who perish, are as incurable as this man would have been, had he not attempted to stretch forth his hand, and so had not been healed. But those who are saved have no more to boast of than this man had of contributing to his own cure, by stretching forth his hand; but are, as much as he, indebted to the power and grace of Christ.

V. 14-21. As in the midst of Christ's greatest humiliations, there were proofs of his dignity, so he gave proofs of his humility, in the midst of his greatest honors. Here we have,

I. The cursed malice of the Pharisees against Christ; (p. 14.) What vexed them was, not only that by his miracles his honor eclipsed

III. The fulfilling of the Scriptures in all this, p. 17. Christ retired into obscurity, that the Word of God might be fulfilled, and so illustrated and glorified. The Scripture here said to be fulfilled is Isa. 42: 1-4. which is quoted at large, p. 18-21. The scope of it is to show how mild and quiet, and yet how successful, our Lord Jesus should be in his undertaking; instances of both which we have in the foregoing passages. Observe here,

1. The pleasure of the Father in Christ; (p. 18.) Hence we may learn,

(1.) That our Savior was God's Servant in the great work of our redemption. He therein submitted Himself to the Father's will, (Heb. 10: 7.) and set Himself to serve the designs of his grace and the interests of his glory. It was a part of his humiliation, that though He thought it not robbery to be equal with God, He took on Him the form of a servant, received a law, and came into bonds. Though He were a son, yet learned He this obedience, Heb. 5: 8. The motto of this Prince is, I serve.

(2.) That Jesus Christ was chosen of God, as the only fit and proper Person for the management of the great work of our redemption. He is my Servant whom I have chosen, as equal to the undertaking. He was One chosen out of the people, (Ps. 89: 19.) chosen by Infinite Wisdom to that post of service and honor, for which neither man nor angel was qualified; none but Christ, that He might in all things have the pre-eminence. Christ did not thrust Himself on this work, but was duly chosen to it, as the Head of election, and of all other the Elect, for we are chosen in Him, Eph. 1: 4.

(3.) That Jesus Christ is God's Beloved Son; as God, He lay from eternity in his bosom; (John 1: 18.) He was daily his Delight, Prov. 8: 30. Between the Father and the Son there was before all time an eternal and inconvertible intercourse and interchanging of love, and thus the Lord possessed Him in the beginning of his way, Prov. 8: 22. As Mediator, the Father loved Him; then when it pleased the Lord to bruise Him, John 10: 17.

(4.) That Jesus Christ is One in whom the Father is well pleased, in whom his soul is pleased; which denotes the highest complacency imaginable. God declared this by a voice from heaven; and He is well pleased with us in Him; for He has made us accepted in the Beloved, Eph. 1: 6. All the interest which fallen man has or can have in God, is grounded on, and owing to, God's well pleasedness in Jesus Christ: for there is no coming to the Father but by Him, John 14: 6.

2. The promise of the Father to Him in two things;

(1.) That He should be every way well qualified for his undertaking; I will put my Spirit upon Him, as a Spirit of wisdom and counsel, Isa. 11: 2, 3. Those whom God calls to any service, He will qualify for it; as Moses, Exod. 4: 12. Christ, as God, was equal in power and glory with the Father; as Mediator, He received from the Father power and glory; and all that the Father gave Him, to qualify Him for his undertaking, was summed up in this; He put his Spirit upon Him; this was that oil of gladness with which He was anointed above his fellows, Heb. 1: 9. He received the Spirit, not by measure, John 3: 34. Note Whoever they be that God has chosen, and in whom He is well pleased, He will be sure to put his Spirit upon them. Wherever He confers his love, He confers somewhat of his likeness.

(2.) That He should be abundantly success-which might have destroyed them, chose to exhibit an example which might amend them. He showed them the difference between those malignant, vindictive passions which governed them, and the mild, gentle, conciliating disposition which his religion inspired: He withdrew Himself quietly and silently from them. Great multitudes following, He healed them all, and, to avoid all irritation and content charged them that they should not make Him known.

Healed them all.] i. e. 'All who desired to be healed by Him; for so particles of universality are frequently to be interpreted.'

He charged them to conceal, not his doctrine, nor his miracles, but his person.

Verse 16.

19 Behold 'my Servant, whom I have chosen; 'my Beloved, in whom my soul is well pleased: 'I will put my Spirit upon him, and he shall shew judgment to the Gentiles.

19 He shall not strive, nor cry; neither shall any man hear his voice in the streets.

20 A "bruised reed shall he not break, and smoking flax shall he not quench, 'till he send forth judgment unto victory.

21 And 'in his name shall the Gentiles trust.

ful in his undertaking. Those whom God sends, He will certainly own. It was secured by promise to our Lord Jesus, that the good pleasure of the Lord should prosper in his hand, Isa. 53: 10. And here we have an account of it.

He shall show judgment to the Gentiles. Christ in his own person preached to those who bordered on the heathen nations, (see Mark 3: 6—8.) and by his apostles showed his Gospel, called here his judgment, to the Gentile world. God's judgments had been the Jews' peculiar privilege, (Psal. 147: 19, 20,) but it was often foretold, by the Old-Testament prophets, that they should be shown to the Gentiles, which therefore ought not to have been a surprise to the unbelieving Jews, much less a vexation.

In his name shall the Gentiles trust, v. 21. He shall so show judgment to them, that they may observe what He shows them, and be influenced by it to depend on Him, to devote themselves to Him, and conform to that judgment. Note, The great design of the Gospel is to bring people to trust in the name of Jesus Christ, that precious name, which is as ointment poured forth: The Lord our Righteousness. The evangelist here follows the Septuagint; (or perhaps the latter editions of the Septuagint follow the evangelist,) the Hebrew (Isa. 42: 4,) is, The isles shall wait for his law. The isles of the Gentiles are spoken of, (Gen. 10: 5,) as peopled by the sons of Japhet, of whom it was said, (Gen. 9: 27,) God shall persuade Japhet to dwell in the tents of Shem; which was now to be fulfilled, when the isles, (says the prophet,) the Gentiles, (says the evangelist,) shall wait for his law, and trust in his name: compare these together, and observe, that they, and they only, can with confidence trust in Christ's name, that wait for his law with a resolution to be ruled by it. Observe also, that the law we wait for, is the law of faith, the law of trusting in his name. This is now his great commandment, that we believe in Christ, 1 John 3: 23.

3. The prediction concerning Him, and his mild and quiet management of his undertaking, v. 19, 20.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 14—21. The more good is done by the Gospel, the greater opposition proud Pharisees and enemies will excite against it; and the more clearly it is proved to be from God, the more determined will be their malice, if left to themselves. Whilst we take encouragement from the condescending mildness of our gracious Lord, we should also pray, that his Spirit may rest upon us; and enable us to copy his example. Thus we should look to Him, in behalf of ourselves and others, to bring forth judgment unto victory: expecting and earnestly praying also for the time, when all the Gentiles shall trust in his name, and wait for his law. Scott.—Surely fate does not more exactly answer to face in water, than the character of Christ, drawn by the prophet, to his temper and conduct, as described by the evangelists. How should Zion rejoice in such a King! Let us with pleasure trace his gentle administration, and confidently commit our souls to a hand so kind and so faithful: far from breaking, He will strengthen the bruised reed: far from quenching the smoking flax, He will rather blow it into a flame.—How well does it become disciples of Christ, especially his ministers, not to despise the day of small things!—Gentiles now trust in a Redeemer's name, and wait for his law. May our souls, with such submission bow to it, and observe it with such faithful care, that our example, wherever it is seen, may promote the reception of it among those, that, as yet, are strangers to its power! Dodd.

Verses 19—21.

Here are described the Christ, lowly, compassionate, condescending, and beneficent nature of Christ's miracles and personal ministry; his perseverance in the midst of opposition, without engaging in contentious dispute; and his kind and tender dealing with weak, discouraged, and tempted believers. When the cause of the Gospel, and that of our Lord's servants against his enemies, shall be tried, and judgment shall be brought forth unto truth; they will also be made victorious; when the Gentiles learn to trust in his name, they also 'wait for his law'; and when all nations shall trust in him, judgment will be set on established in the earth.—He that stretcheth not forth his hand to the sinner, and he that beareth not the burden of his brother, breaks 'the bruised reed; and he that despiseth the small spark of faith in 'little ones, quenches the smoking flax.' Jerome. The evangelist quotes the last clause of this passage from the Septuagint, and no more. In many things, the prophet's meaning is mistaken or obscured in that version. Thus the whole is ascribed to Israel as a nation, instead of being understood of the Messiah: but Matthew gives the meaning of the Hebrew, yet not attending to literal exactness: which in an inspired writer was not necessary. The Septuagint, though highly venerable, has acquired disproportionate reverence from the notion, that the writers of the New Testament confine themselves to it in their citations: but in fact, they quote it, only when it accords to the Hebrew, or gives the sense of it without material alteration. Scott.

(18.) Shew judgment. 'I shall teach the law and will of God.'

(19.) He shall not strive. 'He shall not contend with martial violence, nor cry out in a clamorous and turbulent manner; nor shall any one hear his voice in the streets, as giving a loud and disquieting alarm: but He shall manage his administration with so much gentleness and sweetness, with so much caution and tenderness, that (as is proverbially expressed) He shall not break even a bruised reed or cane; nor extinguish even the smoking flax, or wick of a lamp, which, when first beginning to kindle, is put out by every little motion with such kind and condescending regards to the weakest of his people, and to the first openings and symptoms of a hopeful character, shall He proceed, till He send forth judgment to victory, or till He make his righteous cause gloriously triumphant over all opposition.' Dodd.

(20.) Bruised reed—smoking flax. 'Bruised reed' and 'smoking flax' seem to be only proverbial expressions to signify a person of a most gentle character.'

'This prophecy is expressly referred to the Messiah by the Targumist, who renders, "Behold my servant, the Messiah," &c.' GREENFIELD. 'That is, He will not bear hard upon a wounded, contrite, and truly humble heart, bowed down with a sense of its infirmity. The faintest spark of returning virtue He will not extinguish by severity.'

Bp. PORTUS. 'The Jews used to employ flax, as we do cotton, for candles or lamps.'

The Gentiles trust. (21.) 'Hope. Comp. Ps. 146: 3. Jer. 17: 5. Rom. 15: 12. Eph. 1: 12.'

Horne, in his Intro. to N. T. cites this passage among the quotations agreeing with the Hebrew in sense but not in words, and also among those which differ both from the Septuagint and from the Hebrew, and are probably taken from some other translation, or paraphrase, or were so rendered by the sacred writers themselves. Ed.

(21.) 'Isaiah's saying, (chap. 42: 4.) The isles shall wait for his law, is illustrated and explained by this correspondent phrase which Matthew uses.'

that He came to destroy the works of the devil. This poor man could neither see to help himself, nor speak to others to help him. A soul under Satan's power, is blind in the things of God, and dumb at the throne of grace.

His cure was very strange, and the more so, because sudden: He healed him. Note, The conquering and dispossessing of Satan is the healing of souls. Christ's mercy is directly opposite to Satan's malice; his favors, to the devil's mischiefs. When Satan's power is broken in the soul, the eyes are opened to see God's glory, and the lips, to speak his praise; the blind and dumb both spake and saw.

II. The conviction this gave the people, (v. 23.) They inferred from it, Is not this the Son of David? The Messiah promised from the loins of David? Is not this He that should come? We may take this, as an inquiring question; they asked, Is not this the Son of David? But they did not stay for an answer; the impressions were cogent, but transient. It was a good question, but soon lost, and not prosecuted. Such convictions as these should affect the heart. Or, as an affirming question; Is not this the Son of David? 'Yes, certainly, it can be no other: such miracles as these plainly evince that the kingdom of the Messiah is now setting up.' And they were the people, the vulgar sort of spectators, that drew this inference. Atheists will say, 'That was because they were less prying than the Pharisees; no, the matter of fact was obvious, and required no search; it was because they were less prejudiced and biassed by worldly interest. So plain and easy was the way made to this great truth of Christ's being the Messiah and does not flame, shall not be blown out, but kindled. The day of small things is the day of precious things; therefore He will not despise it, but make it the day of great things, Zech. 4: 10. Note, Our Lord Jesus deals very tenderly with those who have true grace, though they be weak in it, Isa. 40: 11. Heb. 5: 2. (3.) The good issue and success of this, intimated in that, till He send forth judgment unto victory; He will go on, conquering and to conquer, Rev. 6: 2. Both the preaching of the Gospel in the world, and the power of the Gospel in the heart, shall prevail. Christ's judgment will be brought forth to victory, for when He judges, He will overcome. He shall bring forth judgment unto truth; so it is, Isa. 42: 3. Truth and victory are much the same, for great is the truth, and it will prevail.

V. 22-37. In these verses, we have,

I. Christ's conquest of Satan, in the cure of one who, by divine permission, was under his power, and in his possession, v. 22. Here observe,

The man's case was very sad; he was possessed with a devil. More cases of this kind occurred in Christ's time than usual, that Christ's power might be the more magnified; and that it might the more evidently appear, that He came to destroy the works of the devil. This poor man could neither see to help himself, nor speak to others to help him. A soul under Satan's power, is blind in the things of God, and dumb at the throne of grace.

His cure was very strange, and the more so, because sudden: He healed him. Note, The conquering and dispossessing of Satan is the healing of souls. Christ's mercy is directly opposite to Satan's malice; his favors, to the devil's mischiefs. When Satan's power is broken in the soul, the eyes are opened to see God's glory, and the lips, to speak his praise; the blind and dumb both spake and saw.

II. The conviction this gave the people, (v. 23.) They inferred from it, Is not this the Son of David? The Messiah promised from the loins of David? Is not this He that should come? We may take this, as an inquiring question; they asked, Is not this the Son of David? But they did not stay for an answer; the impressions were cogent, but transient. It was a good question, but soon lost, and not prosecuted. Such convictions as these should affect the heart. Or, as an affirming question; Is not this the Son of David? 'Yes, certainly, it can be no other: such miracles as these plainly evince that the kingdom of the Messiah is now setting up.' And they were the people, the vulgar sort of spectators, that drew this inference. Atheists will say, 'That was because they were less prying than the Pharisees; no, the matter of fact was obvious, and required no search; it was because they were less prejudiced and biassed by worldly interest. So plain and easy was the way made to this great truth of Christ's being the Messiah and Savior of the world, that the common people could not miss it; the way-faring men, though fools, could not err therein. See Isa. 33: 8. It was found of them that sought it not. It is an instance of the condescensions of divine grace, that the things that were hid from the wise and prudent were revealed unto babes. The world by wisdom knew not God and by foolish things the wise were confounded.

III. The blasphemous cavil of the Pharisees, v. 24. The Pharisees were a sort of men that pretended to more religion than others; yet they were the most inveterate enemies to Christ; and his doctrine. They were proud of the reputation they had among the people; and when they heard them say, Is not this the Son of David? they were extremely irritated; more at that than at the miracle itself: it made them jealous of our Lord Jesus, and apprehensive, that as his interest in the people's esteem increased, theirs must of course diminish; therefore they envied Him, as Saul his father David, 1 Sam. 18: 7, 8. Note, Those who find up their happiness in the praise and applause of men, expose themselves to perpetual uneasiness upon every favorable word they hear of any other. Observe,

How scornfully they speak of Christ, this fellow; as if that precious name of his were not worthy to be taken into their lips. It is an instance of their pride and superciliousness, and their diabolical envy, that the more people magnified Christ, the more industrious they were to vilify Him. It is a bad thing to speak of good men with disdain because they are poor.

How blasphemously they speak of his miracles; it was as plain as the sun, that devils were cast out by the word of Christ; nor could they deny that it was an extraordinary thing, and supernatural. Being thus forced to grant the premises, they had no other way to avoid the conclusion, that this is the Son of David, but to suggest that Christ cast out devils by Beelzebub; that there was a compact between Christ and the devil; pursuant to which, the devil was not cast out, but voluntarily retired: or as if by an agreement with the ruling devil, He had power to cast out the inferior devils. No surmise could be more palpably false and vile than this; that He, who is Truth itself, should be in compination with the father of lies, to cheat

Verse 22.

It is probable, that this miracle was wrought some time after what is before recorded. 'This miracle appears to have been performed on the morning of that day on which Christ delivered the parables of the power, &c. (compare Matt. 13: 1. &c.) and on the evening of which He crossed the sea, stilled the tempest, and went into the country of the Gadarenes, where He dispossessed the legion. (See Mark 4: 35. &c.)' As it is not said that Christ gave this man his hearing, it is plain 'he was not deaf, and indeed it appears worthy of remark, that we 'hardly ever meet with entire blindness and deafness in the same person.' DODGE. Zacharias appears to have been deaf as well as dumb: (Luke 1: 21-25.) but no other instance occurs in the N. T. in which the word here (v. 22.) rendered dumb clearly embraces both ideas. SCOTT.

Verse 23.

This miracle seems to have astonished the people, in an uncommon degree; and led them to conclude that Jesus must be the Messiah, the Son of David; which astonished the Pharisees, and made them fear that He would finally prevail: yet they could not deny the reality of the miracle; and therefore malignantly renewed their accusation, that He cast out devils, by the concurrence of Beelzebub the prince of the devils, with whom He had formed an alliance, (Notes, 9: 32-34.) 'This they did,' says Whitby, 'not only from an apprehension, that if this belief prevailed, it might bring the power of the Romans upon them; (John 11: 48.) but chiefly, because it put an end to their credit with, and authority over, the people; they being thus represented by our Lord, as blind guides and the worst of hypocrites.' SCOTT.

Is not this the Son of David? That is, 'Is not this the true Messiah? Do not these miracles sufficiently prove it? See Is. 35: 6.'

Verse 24.

'The term employed on this occasion is very properly rendered "this fellow" as expressive of contempt and aversion, observes Dr. Scott, but it is remarked by Campbell, after noticing the similar phraseology in the question, v. 22. "As the Greek term does not imply, a translator is not entitled to add, any thing contemptuous." ED.

Beelzebub is the same as Baal-zebub, the god of Ekron in Philistia. (2 Kings 1: 3.)—The heathens fabulously write of the temple of Hercules and Jupiter, that the deity kept the flies from them; the Jews say of their temple, that a fly was not seen in the slaughter-house.

Whitby in Scott.

'The god of the Ekronites was called Baal-zebub, author for the plenty of flies with which his temple abounded, or because they sought help from that idol, against the flies with which they were troubled. "This name the Israelites after, for the contempt of that idol, gave to the prince of the devils." LEIGH.

He is called Satan in our Lord's answer, (26.)

The origin of the name Beelzebub it is difficult to ascertain, 'ob serves Horne; but it is remarked by Jahn, "The astrologers divided the heavens into apartments or habitations, to each one of which apartments, they assigned a ruler or president. This fact developed the origin of the word Beelzebub, or the lord of the celestial dwellings." Archeol. 100. IV. 28 But if I cast out devils by the Spirit of God then the kingdom of God is come unto you.

should at all countenance such a design: if he should fall in with Christ, how should then his kingdom stand? He would himself contribute to its overthrow. Christ will destroy the devil's kingdom, but He needs not do it by any such little arts and projects as that of a secret compact with Beelzebub; no, this victory must be obtained by nobler methods.

2. It was not at all strange, or improbable, that devils should be cast out by the Spirit of God; for,

This fellow.] 'Rather, this man.' Why did not our translators say in the preceding verse, Is not this fellow the son of David? The pronoun is the same in both. Our idiom in many cases, will not permit us to use the demonstrative, without adding a noun. But as the Greek term does not imply, a translator is not entitled to add, any thing contemptuous. By such freedoms, one of the greatest beauties of these divine writers has been considerably injured.

VERSES 25, 26.

The Pharisees, it seems, circulated this opinion privately; but Jesus knew their thoughts, and took occasion to argue with them. Probably, his disregard to their traditions, and supposed violation of the Sabbath, caused this opinion; but He rested his argument on the tendency of his doctrine and example, to render men wise and holy, and delivering them from sin and Satan, to make them servants of God; so that, as his cause prevailed, Satan's kingdom must be perverted. As, therefore, these fallen spirits are too politic and sagacious to assist in ruining their own cause: and as a kingdom or family, if divided into contending parties, is desolated; so it was evident, that if Satan aided Jesus, his divided kingdom could not stand.—Nothing can be more conclusive than this argument.

Verse 27.

Your children cast them out.] For the proof of this fact, see Acts 19: 13. Mark 9: 38. Luke 9: 49. Joseph. Antiq. Jud. lib. viii. I do not see that there is any need of referring this to the apostles, who had not yet been sent out; and if they had, they to be sure would be involved in the same censure with Christ. It is more natural to suppose that the disciples of the Pharisees are here probably meant by their children.

DODDRIEDGE.

Your children expel them, who practise exorcisms, and are approved and extolled by you on that account, though some of them do it in my name.—Therefore they shall in this respect be your judges, and condemn you of a most partial and unequal conduct.

the world. This was the last resort of an obstinate infidelity. Observe, Among the devils there is a prince, the ringleader in apostasy and rebellion; but this prince is Beelzebub—the god of a fly, or a dunghill-god. How art thou fallen, O Lucifer! from an angel of light, to be a lord of flies!

IV. Christ's reply to this base insinuation, v. 25–30. It should seem that the Pharisees could not for shame speak it out, but kept it in their minds; they could not expect to satisfy the people with it, they therefore reserved it to silence the convictions of their own consciences. Note, Many are kept from their duty by that which they are ashamed to own, but which they cannot hide from Jesus Christ: yet it is probable that the Pharisees had whispered what they thought among themselves, to help to harden one another; but Christ's reply is said to be to their thoughts, because He knew with what mind and from what principle, they said it; that they did not say it in haste, but from a rooted malignity.

Christ's reply is copious and cogent, consisting of three arguments, by which He demonstrates the unreasonableness of this suggestion.

1. It would be very strange, and highly improbable, that Satan should be cast out by such a compact, because then Satan's kingdom would be divided against itself; which, considering his subtlety, is not a thing to be imagined, v. 25, 26.

Here is a known rule laid down, that in all societies a common ruin is the consequence of mutual quarrels; (v. 25.) 'What family,' says Cicero, 'is so strong, what community so firm, as not to be overturned by enmity and dissension?'

Divisions commonly end in desolations; if we clash, we break; if we divide, we become an easy prey to a common enemy; much more if we bite and devour one another, shall we be consumed one of another, Gal. 5: 15. Churches and nations have known this by sad experience.

The application of this to the case in hand, (v. 26.) If the prince of the devils should be at variance with the inferior devils, the whole kingdom and interest would soon be broken; nay, if Satan should come into a compact with Christ, it must be to his own ruin: for the manifest design and tendency of Christ's preaching and miracles was, to overthrow the kingdom of Satan, and to set up a kingdom of light, holiness and love. Therefore, it was the most absurd thing imaginable, to think that Beelzebub

How otherwise do your children cast them out? There were those among the Jews, who, in invocation of the name of God, sometimes cast out devils. Josephus speaks of some in his time, that did it; we read of Jewish exorcists, (Acts 19: 13,) and of some that in Christ's name cast out devils, though they did not follow Him, (Mark 9: 38,) or were not faithful to Him, ch. 7: 22. These the Pharisees condemned not, but imputed what they did to the Spirit of God, and valued themselves and their nation upon it. It was therefore merely from spite and envy to Christ, that they would own, that others cast out devils by the Spirit of God, but suggest that He did it by compact with Beelzebub. Note, It is the way of malicious people, especially the persecutors of Christ and Christianity, to condemn the same thing in those they hate, which they approve and applaud in those they have a kindness for: the judgments of envy are made, not by things, but persons; not by reason, but prejudice. But those were very unfit to sit in Moses' seat, who knew faces, and nothing else in judgment: Therefore they shall be your judges; 'This contradicting of yourselves will rise up in judgment against you, and condemn you.' Note, In the last judgment, not only every sin, but every aggravation of it, will be brought into the account, and some of our notions that were right and good, will be brought in evidence against us, to convict us of partiality.

This casting out of devils was a certain token of the approach and appearance of the kingdom of God: (v. 23.) 'But if it be indeed that I cast out devils by the Spirit of God, as certainly I do, then you must conclude, that though you are unwilling to receive it, the kingdom of the Messiah is now about to be set up among you.' Other miracles that Christ wrought proved Him sent of God, but this proved Him sent of God to destroy the works of the devil. Now that great promise was evidently fulfilled, that the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head, Gen. 3: 15. 'Therefore that glorious dispensation of the kingdom of God, which has been long expected, is now commenced; slight it at your peril.' Note, The destruction of the devil's power is wrought by the Spirit of God, that Spirit who works to the obedience of faith, overthrows the interest of that spirit who works in the children of unbelief, and disobedience. The casting out of devils is a certain introduction to the kingdom of God. If the devil's interest in a soul be sunk and broken by the Spirit of God, as a Sanctifier, no doubt the kingdom of God is come to that soul, a blessed earnest of the kingdom of glory.

3. The comparing of Christ's miracles, particularly this of casting out devils, with his doctrine, and the design and tendency of his holy religion, evidenced that He was so far from being in league with Satan, that He was

Verse 28.

'But if you must allow that I cast out demons by the finger, of the power and Spirit of God, then it undoubtedly follows that the kingdom of God is indeed come unto you, as I assert; and all the doctrines that I preach are proved by this to be divine, and consequently worthy of your most serious and obedient regard, since it plainly shows my superiority over all the infernal powers. Otherwise, it is evident I could not do this: for how can any one break and enter into the house of a strong man, &c.'

'Perhaps the Spirit of God is here mentioned by way of opposition to the magical incantations of the Jews; for it is well known, that, by fumigations and magical washings, they professed to cast out devils.'

Then the kingdom of God.] 'For the destruction of the kingdom of Satan plainly implies the setting up of the kingdom of God.' It come unto you.] 'Unexpectedly upon you.'

VERSES 29, 30.

The case might be illustrated by an apt similitude. How could any one enter into a strong man's house, whilst he was on his guard and plunder his property at pleasure, unless he first overpowered and bound the strong man? Thus it was evident, that Jesus by his divi power was able to subdue and limit the power of Satan: or He never could rescue the bodies and souls of men from his oppression. And, as He came to 'destroy the works of the devil,' so the cause would admit of no neutrality. Every one, who should refuse to join Him against the cause of Satan, would be adjudged an enemy; and all who would not concur with Him in rescuing sinners from the devil's kingdom, and bringing them into the kingdom of God, whatever pains they might take in any other way, would do worse than lose their labor; for all their contrivances, knowledge, and religious observances would tend to their own loss, and that of others, and they would finally lose their own souls.

at open enmity and hostility against him; (v. 29.) The world that sat in darkness, and lay in wickedness, was in Satan's possession, and under his power, as a house in the possession and under the power of a strong man; so is every unregenerate soul; there Satan resides, there he rules. Now, the design of Christ's Gospel was to spoil the devil's house, which, as a strong man, he kept in the world; to turn the people from darkness to light, from sin to holiness, from the power of Satan unto God; (Acts 26:18.) to alter the property of souls. Pursuant to this design, He bound the strong man, when He cast out unclean spirits. The doctrine of Christ teaches us how to construe his miracles, and when He showed how easily and effectually He could cast the devil out of people's bodies, He encouraged all believers to hope that, whatever power Satan might usurp and exercise in the souls of men, Christ by his grace would break it. When nations were turned from the service of idols to serve the living God, when some of the worst of sinners were sanctified and justified, and became the best of saints, then Christ spoiled the devil's house, and will spoil it more and more.

4. Christ's war against the devil and his kingdom admits of no neutrality, (v. 30.) In the little differences that may arise between the disciples of Christ, we are taught to lessen the matters in variance, and to account those who are not against us, to be with us; (Luke 9:50.) but in the great quarrel between Christ and the devil, no peace is to be sought, nor any such favorable construction to be made of any difference in the matter; he that is not hearty for Christ will be reckoned with as really against him. When the dispute is between God and Baal, there is no halting between two, (1 Kings 18:21.) there is no trimming between Christ and Belial; for the kingdom of Christ, as it is eternally opposite to, so it will be eternally victorious over, the devil's kingdom; and therefore in this cause there is no sitting still with Gilead beyond Jordan, or Asher on the sea-shore; (Judg. 5:16, 17.) we must be entirely, faithfully, and immovably on Christ's side: it is the right side, and will at last be the rising side; see Exod. 32:26.

The latter clause is to the same purport. Note, Christ's errand into the world was to gather in his harvest, those whom the Father had given Him, John 11:52. Eph. 1:10. Christ expects and requires his disciples to gather with Him; that they not only gather to Him themselves, but gather others to Him, and so strengthen his interest. Those who will not appear, and act, as furtherers of Christ's kingdom, will be looked on, and dealt with, as hinderers of it; if we gather not with Christ, we scatter; it is not enough, not to do hurt; we must do good. Thus is the breach widened between Christ and Satan, to show that there was no such compact between them as the Pharisees whispered.

V. His discourse on the occasion, concerning sins of the tongue; Wherefore I say unto you. He seems to turn fr. m. the Pharisees to the people; and from the sin of the Pharisees He warns the people concerning three sorts of tongue-sins; others' harms are admonitions to us.

1. Blasphemous words against the Holy Ghost, v. 31, 32. Now,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 22-30. In every way, we see illustrations of the power and malice of our formidable enemies, and of the superior power and mercy of our great Deliverer. The changes effected by divine grace form a continued proof, that Jesus is the Son of David, and the Son of God; and that the Gospel is the power of God unto salvation. This should induce all men to submit to Christ: but it has a contrary effect on many, who dare to ascribe these changes to enthusiasm, or even diabolical delusion! He, who knows men's thoughts, has taught us how to answer such objections; and the enemies of all good might teach Christians a useful lesson: hateful and hating as they are, they are too subtle to divide against themselves, so as to subvert their own kingdom; but, whilst they agree together in malice, they tempt Christians to divide into parties, and quarrel with each other, to the irreparable injury of the common cause!—But let us observe, that there are two grand interests in the world; all that side with Christ, against the kingdom of Satan, are his friends, but none else; and when unclean spirits are cast out by the Spirit of God, in the conversion of sinners to a life of faith and obedience, the kingdom of God is come unto us: nor could they be expelled did not One come upon them who is able to bind them at his will, take away from them their usurped possessions, and employ the convert, with all his talents, in his service and to his glory. All they, who refuse to concur, or do not rejoice, in such a revolution as this, are against Christ; and 'he that gathereth not with Him, scattereth.' Alas! what pains do many take in thus scattering abroad, and in ruining themselves and others, by promoting systems of human invention, in opposition to the Gospel of God our Savior!

SCOTT.

30.] Gathereth. 'He who gathereth not subjects into my kingdom with me, is but vainly and foolishly scattering abroad. Much more criminal and fatal than must the character and conduct of those be, who, with deliberate, implacable malice, oppose my cause, and are resolved at all adventures to bear it down, as you are attempting to do by the vile insinuations which you have now suggested. I therefore give you the most solemn and compassionate warning of your danger; for you are on the brink of a most dreadful precipice. That malignity of heart which leads you to ascribe these works of mine to a confederacy with Satan, may incline you to pass the same impious sentence on the greatest and fullest confirmation which is to be given to my Gospel, by the effusion of the Spirit on my followers; and therefore, to prevent, if possible, such guilt and ruin, verily I say unto you, all other sins shall, &c.'

Donne.

Verses 31, 32.

(Marg. Ref.) Scarcely any thing, in the whole Scripture, has given more discouragement to weak Christians than this passage, and a few others coincident with it. (Mark 3:22-30. Luke 12:8-10. Heb. 6:4-6. 10:26, 27. 1 John 5:16-18.) Almost every humble and conscientious believer, at one time or other, is tempted to think he has committed the unpardonable sin; and the interpretations many have given, without properly advertent to the context, frequently tend to increase these apprehensions and difficulties. In general we are sure, that they who indeed repent, and believe the Gospel, have not committed this sin, for repentance and faith are inseparably connected with forgiveness. On the other hand, without repentance and faith, no man can be forgiven, though he have not committed this sin.—It is probable, the matter was left in some measure of obscurity, to deter men from presumptuously venturing near the brink of so dreadful a precipice. One thing is clear, it does not hence follow, that any sin which is not forgiven here, will hereafter be forgiven: the expression only shows, that some of the Jews had notions of this kind, as well as papists and other professed Christians: but it seems to be no more than a form of speech common among the Jews, when they asserted strongly, that any thing should never be done.—The circumstances, in which this declaration was made, should carefully be adverted to. The Pharisees had spoken most blasphemous words against Christ and his miracles, which were indeed wrought by the power of the Holy Ghost, but not under the immediate dispensation of the Spirit. They had gone as far in impiety as they could, without finally excluding themselves from forgiveness. They had spoken 'blasphemy against the Son of man,' and ascribed his miracles to the power of the devil; &c. it they might be pardoned, and one further method would be used to convince them. In a short time, He, the promised Messiah, would be crucified, rise from the dead, and ascend into heaven; when, being exalted to the right hand of the Father, He would send forth the Holy Spirit on his apostles and disciples, enabling them to perform various wonderful works in his name, in proof of their testimony concerning his resurrection and ascension. Whosoever therefore should blaspheme this last and most complete attestation to Jesus, as the promised Messiah, and, from determined enmity to Him and his kingdom, deliberately ascribe the operations of the Holy Spirit to Satan;—that man would be given up to final obduracy and impenitency, and thus never be pardoned, but sink into final perdition. None therefore could commit this sin, who did not witness the effects of the pouring out of the Holy Spirit on the apostles: nor were all degrees of opposition thus finally destructive. Peter does not seem to have concluded, that Simon Magus had sinned beyond the reach of mercy, when he offered to buy the power of conferring the Holy Ghost. (Note, Acts 8:18-24.) Yet it is clear, that some kinds of apostasy, when attended with peculiar circumstances of aggravation, through love of this world, and enmity to the truth, were equivalent to it; and in every age, many provoke God to leave them to final impenitence. But there must be great opportunity of information, much inward conviction, determinate sinning against the light of a man's own conscience, and an obstinate opposition to it in defiance of evidence, to constitute this kind of impiety. They, who most fear having committed it, are generally at the greatest distance from it; while such as are thus given up, are, perhaps universally, either callous in presumption or enmity, or absolutely and outrageously impetrate, of which we sometimes meet awful instances: but the trembling, contrite sinner has 'the witness in himself,' that neither of these is his case.—The Jews, to this day, ascribe the miracles of Jesus, the reality of which they do not deny, especially his casting out devils, to enchantment; that is, to the power of Satan. SCOTT.

inevitably leaves the sinner in infidelity and impenitency. But if, when the Holy Ghost is given, in his inward gifts of revelation, speaking, with tongues, and the like, such as were the distributions of the Spirit among the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost is excepted. Let those who, while they cannot deny the facts of Christianity, despise and oppose its doctrines, tremble to think how near they approach to the boundaries of this sin, which is perhaps more obscurely described, than we may more cautiously avoid all such approaches. But let not the humble soul that trembles at God's Word, meditate terror to itself from such a passage; which, when viewed in its due connection, cannot, with any shadow of reason, be thought to belong to any who do not obstinately reject the Gospel, and maliciously oppose it, when made known to them with its fullest evidence.

(32.) World. "Rather state; which may mean the present life and the life to come, or the Jewish and Christian dispensations—of this ambiguity the original word admits." [But see again Mark 3:29. Ed.]

Blasphemy against the Holy Ghost. "When the person obstinately attributed those works to the devil, which he had the fullest evidence could be wrought only by the Spirit of God. That this, and nothing else, is the sin against the Holy Spirit, is evident from the connection in this place, and more particularly from Mark 3:23, 29, 30. Let it be observed, then, that no man who believes the divine mission of Jesus Christ, can commit this sin: therefore let no man's heart fail because of it."

Neither in this world, nor that which is to come. "The whole may be taken as a strong negative, frequent in the Jewish writers; and I must enter my protest against interpretations which curtail the plain sense of Scripture."

VERSES 33-37.

(Notes 3:7-10. 7:15-27.) Our Lord next showed the Pharisees his knowledge of the evil of their hearts. They were proud, carnal, malicious, ungodly men; yet made high professions of piety and sanctity. Thus they betrayed themselves: and, however they might deny this a light matter, Ch^r assured them, that every idle or useless

Here is a gracious assurance of the pardon of all sin on gospel-terms: the greatness of sin shall be no bar to our acceptance with God, if we truly repent and believe the Gospel; (v. 31.) Though the sin has been as scarlet and crimson, (Isa. 1:18.) ever so heinous, aggravated, or often repeated, though it reach up to the heavens, yet with the Lord there is mercy, that reacheth beyond the heavens: mercy will be extended even to blasphemy, a sin immediately touching God's name and honor: Paul obtained mercy, who had been a blasphemer, 1 Tim. 1:13. Well may we say, Who is a God like unto Thee, pardoning iniquity? Micah 7:18. Even words spoken against the Son of man shall be forgiven; as theirs were who reviled Him at his death, many of whom repented and found mercy. Christ herein has set an example to all the sons of men, to be ready to forgive words spoken against them: I, as a deaf man, heard not. Observe, They shall be forgiven unto men, not to devils; this is love to the whole world of mankind, above the world of fallen angels, that all sin is pardonable to them. Observe,

An exception of the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, here declared to be the only unpardonable sin. See here,

What this sin is; it is speaking against the Holy Ghost. See what malignity there is in tongue-sins, when the only unpardonable sin is such. It is not all speaking against the person or essence of the Holy Ghost, or some of his more private operations, or merely the resisting of his internal working in the sinner himself, that is here meant; for who then should be saved? It is adjudged in law, that an act of indemnity shall always be construed in favor of that grace and clemency which is the intention of the act; and therefore the exceptions in the act are not to be extended further than needs must. The Gospel is an act of indemnity; none are excepted but those only that blaspheme the Holy Ghost; which therefore must be construed in the narrowest sense: all presuming sinners are effectually cut off by the conditions of the indemnity, faith and repentance; therefore the other exceptions must not be stretched: and this blasphemy is excepted, not for any defect of mercy in God or merit in Christ, but because it inevitably leaves the sinner in infidelity and impenitency. We have reason to think that none are guilty of this sin, who believe that Christ is the Son of God, and sincerely desire who fear they have committed this sin, give a good sign that they have not. Whithy very well observes, that Christ speaks not of what was now said or done, but of what should be, Mark 3:28: Luke 12:10. Whosoever shall blaspheme. As for those who blasphemed Christ when He was here on earth, and called Him a wine-bibber, a deceiver, a blasphemer, and the like, they had some color of excuse: the proof of his divine mission not being perfected till after his ascension; therefore, on their repentance, they shall be pardoned: and it was hoped they might be convinced by the pouring out of the Spirit, as many of them were, who had been his betrayers and murderers. But if, when the Holy Ghost is given, in his inward gifts of revelation, speaking, with tongues, and the like, such as were the distributions of the Spirit among the apostles, if they continue to blaspheme the Spirit likewise, as an evil spirit, there is no hope of them, that they will ever be brought to believe in Christ; for, First, Those gifts of the Holy Ghost in the apostles were the last proof that God designed to make use of to confirm the Gospel. Secondly, This was the most powerful evidence, and more apt to convince than miracles themselves. Thirdly, Those therefore who blaspheme this dispensation of the Spirit, cannot possibly be brought to believe in Christ. Those who shall impute his miracles to a collusion with Satan, as the Pharisees did, what can convince them? This is such a strong hold of infidelity as a man can never be beaten out of, and is therefore unpardonable, because hereby repentance is hid from the sinner's eyes. See,

The sentence passed on it; v. 32. As in the then present state of the Jewish church, there was no sacrifice of expiation for the soul that sinned presumptuously; so neither under the dispensation of gospel grace, which is often in Scripture called the world to come, shall there be any pardon to such as tread under foot the blood of the covenant, and do despite to the Spirit of grace: there is no cure for a sin so directly against the remedy. It was a rule in our old law, No sanctuary for sacrilege. Or, It shall be forgiven, neither now, in the sinner's own conscience, nor in the great day, when the pardon shall be published. Or, This is a sin that exposes both to present wrath, and the wrath to come.

2. Other wicked words, the product of corruption reigning in the heart, and breaking out thence, v. 33-35. It was said (v. 25.) that Jesus knew their thoughts, and here He spoke with an eye to them, showing that it was not strange that they should speak so ill, when their hearts were so full of enmity and malice; which yet they often endeavored to cloak by feigning themselves just men. He therefore points to the springs, and heals them; let the heart be sanctified, and it will appear in our words.

The heart is the root; the language, the fruit; (v. 33.) if the nature of the tree be good, it will bring forth good fruit; and, on the contrary, whatever lust reigns in the heart, it will break out; diseased lungs make an offensive breath: men's language discovers what country they are of; so likewise what manner of spirit they are of; get pure hearts, and then you will have pure lips and pure lives. 'You may graft a crab-stock with a shoot from a good tree, and then the fruit will be good; but if the tree be still the same, plant it where you will, and water it how you will, the fruit will be still corrupt.' Note, Unless the heart be transformed, the reformation of the life will never be thorough. These Pharisees were shy of speaking out their wicked thoughts; but Christ here intimates, how vain it was for them to seek to hide them, when they never sought to repress them. Note, It word,—much more all pernicious, polluting, and impious words, must be 'given an account of at the day of judgment;' and at that solemn season, they will be deemed decisive evidences of a man's character, and the state of his heart; according to which a person professing religion will be justified as a true believer, or condemned as a hypocrite, and all men will be adjudged pious or impious, holy or unholy, as their habitual conversation has been. 'Discourse tending to innocent mirth,' says Doddridge, 'to exhilarate the spirits, is not idle discourse; as the time spent in necessary recreation is not idle time.'

SCOTT.

DOUGLAS.

(34.) Out of the abundance. 'Overflowing; wicked words and sinful actions may be considered as the overflowings of a heart that is more than full of the spirit of wickedness; and holy words and righteous deeds may be considered as the overflowings of a heart that is filled with the Holy Spirit, running over with love to God and man.'

DR. A. CLARKE.

Note, Bad things may be expected from bad people, as said the proverb of the ancients, Wickedness proceedeth from the wicked, 1 Sam. 24. 13. The vile person will speak villany, Isa. 32: 6. Those who are themselves evil, have neither skill nor will to speak good. Christ would have his disciples know what sort of men they were to live among, that they might know what to look for. As Ezekiel among scorpions, (Ezek. 2: 6,) they must not think it strange if they be stung and bitten. The heart is the treasury, the words are the things brought out of it, v. 36; and hence men's characters may be drawn, and judged of.

It is the character of a good man, that he has a good treasure in his heart, and thence brings forth good things, as there is occasion. Graces, comforts, experiences, good knowledge, good affections, good resolutions, these are a good treasure in the heart; the word of God hidden there, the law of God written there, divine truths dwelling and ruling there, are a treasure there, valuable and suitable, kept safe and secret, as the stores of the good householder, but ready for use on all occasions. A good man, thus furnished, will bring forth, as Joseph out of his stores; will be speaking and doing that which is good for God's glory, and the edification of others. See Prov. 10: 11, 13, 14, 20, 21, 31, 32. This is bringing forth good things. Some pretend to good expenses that have not a good treasure—such will soon be bankrupts: some pretend to a good treasure, but give no proof of it: they hope they leave it in them, and thank God, whatever their words and actions are, they have good hearts; but faith without works is dead: and some have a good treasure of wisdom and knowledge, but are not communicative, do not bring forth out of it: they have a talent, but know not how to trade with it. The complete Christian in this bears the image of God, that he both is good, and does good.

It is the character of an evil man, that he has an evil treasure in his heart, and out of it bringeth forth evil things. Lusts and corruptions dwelling and reigning in the heart, are an evil treasure, out of which the sinner brings forth bad words and actions, to the dishonor of God, and the hurt of others. See Gen. 6: 5, 12. Matt. 15: 18—20. Jam. 1: 15. But treasures of wickedness, (Prov. 10: 2,) will be treasures of wrath.

3. Idle words, (v. 36, 37.) It concerns us to think much of the day of judgment, that that may be a check on our tongues; and let us consider,

How particular the account will be of tongue-sins in that day: even for every idle word, or discourse, that men speak, they shall give account. 1. God notices every word we say, even that which we ourselves do not notice. See Ps. 139: 4. Not a word in my tongue but Thou knowest it: 2. Vain, idle, impertinent talk is displeasing to God, being the same with that should be more our care to be good, than to seem good.

The heart is the fountain; the words, the streams; v. 34. Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaks. A wicked heart is said to send forth wickedness, as a fountain casts forth her waters, Jer. 6: 7. A troubled fountain, and a corrupt spring, must needs send forth muddy and unpleasant streams, Prov. 25: 26. Evil words are the natural, genuine product of an evil heart. Nothing but the salt of grace will heal the waters, season the speech and purify the corrupt communication. This they wanted, they were evil; and how can ye, being evil, speak good things? They were a generation of vipers; John Baptist had called them so, (ch. 3: 7,) and they were all still the same.

Now, what could be expected from a generation of vipers, but that which is poisonous and malignant? Can the viper be otherwise than venomous? Note, Bad things may be expected from bad people, as said the proverb of the ancients, Wickedness proceedeth from the wicked, 1 Sam. 24. 13. The vile person will speak villany, Isa. 32: 6. 3. Idle words, (v. 36, 37.) It concerns us to think much of the day of judgment, that that may be a check on our tongues; and let us consider,

How particular the account will be of tongue-sins in that day: even for every idle word, or discourse, that men speak, they shall give account. 1. God notices every word we say, even that which we ourselves do not notice. See Ps. 139: 4. Not a word in my tongue but Thou knowest it: 2. Vain, idle, impertinent talk is displeasing to God, being the same with that foolish talking and jesting which is forbidden, Eph. 5: 4. that sin which is seldom wanting in the multitude of words; Job 15: 3. 3. We must shortly account for these idle words; they will be produced in evidence against us, to prove us unprofitable servants, that have not improved the faculties of reason and speech, which are part of the talents we are intrusted with. If we repent not of our idle words, and our account for them be not balanced by the blood of Christ, we are undone.

How strict the judgment will be on that account; v. 37: a common rule in men's judgments, here applied to God's. Note, The constant tenor of our discourse, according as it is gracious, or not, will be an evidence for or against us, at the great day. Those who seemed to be religious, but bridled not their tongue, will then be found to have put a cheat on themselves, Jam. 1: 26. Some think Christ here refers to that of Eliphaz, (Job 15: 6.) Thine own mouth condemns thee, and not I; or, rather to that of Solomon, (Prov. 18: 21.) Death and life are in the power of the tongue.

V. 38—45. The Pharisees with whom Christ here discourses, were probably not the same that cavilled at Him, (v. 24,) and would not credit the signs He gave; but another set, who saw there was no reason to discredit them, but would not admit the evidence of them, unless He would give them such further proof as they should demand. Here is,

I. Their address to Him, v. 38. They compliment Him with the title of Master, pretending respect, when they intend abuse: all are not indeed Christ's servants, who call Him Master. Their request is, We would see a sign from Thee. It was highly reasonable they should see a sign, and He by miracles prove his divine mission: see Exod. 4: 8, 9. He came to take down a model of religion that was set up by miracles, and therefore it was requisite He should produce the same credentials; but it was highly unreasonable to demand a sign now, when He had given so many signs already, proving Him sent of God. Note, It is natural to proud men to prescribe to God, and then to make that an excuse for insubmission to Him; but a man's offence will never be his justification.

II. His answer to this address, this insolent demand.

He condemns the demand, as that of an evil and adulterous generation, v. 39. He fastens the charge, on not only the scribes and Pharisees, but on the whole nation of the Jews; they were all like their leaders, a seed of evil doers;

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 31—37. In various ways, men sin against the truth, and even their own consciences; till, by resisting the Holy Ghost, they provoke God to give them up to final obduracy and impenitence.—Let all then be afraid of every approach to this fatal conduct: yet, let no trembling penitent yield to Satan's suggestions, to suppose that the sinful words and works of the days of his ignorance, which he now recollects with shame and contrition, or any of his sins when first brought under convictions, were of this malignant nature. 'All manner of sin and blasphemy' shall certainly be forgiven to the true believer; and 'him that cometh to Christ, He will in no wise cast out.' Indeed we might any of us have been left under condemnation, and the power of sin; but if 'God hath given us repentance, to the acknowledging of his truth,' we are evidently escaped 'from this snare of the devil,' and should not yield to discouraging fears. It is vain, however, for men to think that the tree is made good, when the fruit is evil: we should therefore seek to have our hearts cleansed by divine grace, and stored with divine truth and holy affections; that whilst numbers are injuring others, with the evil things which they speak, we may bring forth edifying discourse. We should consider this as a matter of great importance; for our Judge has declared, that men shall give an account of every idle word at the last day. If there were nothing else to be, at that awful season, produced against us, this alone would suffice to leave us without excuse. We ought, then, to examine ourselves, and seek forgiveness for the past; and keep a watch over ourselves, that we may for the future speak such words, and such alone, as consist with the Christian character, are suited to 'minister grace unto the hearers,' and may be produced as proofs of our faith and love, in the day of judgment. SCOTT.

(37.) By thy words thou shalt be justified. 'That is, the whole tenor of thy conversation shall be an evidence for or against thee, in the great day. How many are there who count words for nothing, and yet eternity often depends on them! Lord, put a watch before the door of my lips! is a prayer proper for all men.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

A sign—perhaps some such tremendous displays of the Divine glory, as their fathers had seen on mount Sinai; or somewhat like that which took place when, at the word of Joshua, 'the sun stood still in the midst of heaven, and hasted not to go down about a whole day.' Josh. 10: 12—14.

SCOTT.

So also Doctrinae and Rosam. Her. 'The words of Luke expressly refer it to this sense, and Matthew, in another relation of this kind, (Matt. 16: 1) expressly tells us they demanded a sign from heaven. [Compare also Mark 8: 11.] It is not therefore to be understood of a sign only of deliverance from the Roman yoke, or of the erection of [192]

the Messiah's temporal kingdom, as some have supposed; but rather of some miracle performed in the visible heavens, where they seem to have thought, impostors had less power than on earth.—And they might probably conclude their proposal reasonable, as Moses, (Exod. 9: 22—24.) Joshua, (Josh. 10: 12) Samuel, (1 Sam. 7: 9, 10.) and Elijah, (1 Kings 17: 36—39 and 2 Kings 1: 10.) had given such signs. (Comp. Isa. 7: 11. and 38: 8.)

He refuses to give them any other sign than that already given, of the prophet Jonas. Note, Though Christ is always ready to hear and answer holy desires and prayers, yet He will not gratify corrupt lusts and humors. Those who ask amiss, ask, and have not. Signs were granted to those who desired them for the confirmation of their faith, as to Abraham, and Gideon; but denied to those who demanded them for the excuse of their unbelief.

Justly might Christ have said, They shall never see another miracle: but see his wonderful goodness; they shall have the same signs still repeated, and one sign of a different kind from all these they shall have, and that is, the resurrection of Christ from the dead by his own power, called here the sign of the prophet Jonas; this was yet reserved for their conviction, and was intended to be the great proof of Christ's being the Messiah; for, by that He was declared to be the Son of God with power, Rom. 1: 4. That was such a sign as surpassed all the rest. If they will not believe the former signs, they will this; (Exod. 4: 9.) and if this will not convince them, nothing will. And yet the unbelief of the Jews found out an evasion, by saying, His disciples came and stole Him away; for none ^{of} ^{us} so incurably blind as those, who are resolved they will not see.

Now this sign of the prophet Jonas He further explains here; v. 40. 1. The grave was to Christ as the belly of the fish to Jonah; thither He was thrown, as a ransom for lives ready to be lost in a storm; there He lay, as in the belly of hell, (Jonah 2: 2.) and seemed to be cast out of God's sight. 2. He continued in the grave just as long as Jonah continued in the fish's belly, three days and three nights; not three whole days and nights: it is probable, Jonah did not lie so long in the whale's belly, but part of three natural days; He was buried in the afternoon of the sixth day of the week, and rose again in the morning of the first day; it is a manner of speech very usual; see 1 Kings 20: 29. Esth. 4: 16. 5: 1. Luke 2: 21. 3. As Jonah in the whale's belly comforted himself with an assurance that yet he should look again board God's holy temple, (Jonah 2: 4.) so Christ, when He lay in the grave, is expressly said to rest in hope, as one assured that He should not see corruption, Acts 2: 26, 27. 4. As Jonah on the third day was discharged from his prison, and came to the land of the living again, from the congregation of the dead, (for dead things are said to be formed from under the water, Job 26: 5.) so Christ on the third day should return to life, and rise out of his grave, to send abroad his Gospel to the Gentiles.

He takes this occasion to represent the sad character and condition of the generation in which He lived; and He gives it as it would stand in the day of judgment. Persons and things now appear under false colors; characters and conditions are here changeable. Therefore we would make a right estimate, we must take our measures from the last judgment; things are really, what they are eternally.

Now Christ represents the people of the Jews,

1. As a generation that would be condemned by the men of Nineveh, v. 41. Christ's resurrection will be the sign of the prophet Jonas to them: but it will not have so happy an effect on them, as that of Jonas had on the Ninevites, for they were by it brought to such a repentance as prevented their ruin; but the Jews will be hardened in an unbelief that shall hasten their ruin; and, in the day of judgment, the repentance of the Ninevites will be mentioned as an aggravation of the sin, and consequently the condemnation, of those to whom Christ preached now, and of those to whom Christ is preached now; for this reason, because Christ is greater than Jonah. Jonah was but a man, subject to like sinful passions, as we are; but Christ is the Son of God. Jonah was a stranger in Nineveh, but Christ came to his own. Jonah preached but one short sermon, and that with no great solemnity, but as he passed along the streets: Christ renews his calls, and He said; and taught in the synagogues. Jonah preached nothing but wrath; but Christ, beside warning us of our danger, has showed wherein we must repent, and assured us of acceptance on our repentance. Jonah wrought no miracle to confirm his doctrine, showed no good-will to the Ninevites; but Christ wrought abundance of miracles; and all miracles of mercy: yet the Ninevites repented at the preaching of Jonas, but the Jews were not wrought upon by Christ's preaching. Note, The goodness of some, who

Verse 39.

[Generation.] 'The original word should be translated "race of people," here and in most other places in the gospels; for our Lord, in general, uses it to point out this Jewish people. This translation is a key to understand some very obscure passages in the evangelists. There is the utmost proof from their own writings, that in the time of our Lord, they were most literally an adulterous race of people, for, at this very time, he, Johanan ben Zachai abrogated the trial by the bitter waters of jealousy, because so many were found to be thus criminal. [See on John 8: 3, 9.]

[Sign of Jonas.] 'A miracle, answering to that which our Lord did in the person of Jonas. Thus He signified his own death, burial, and resurrection. He said, in effect, "You ask a sign from heaven, but the only sign I shall vouchsafe you is a sign from the earth. Instead of descending from above, as you expect, in visible pomp and triumph, shall rise with still greater triumph from the grave, after being numbered three days with the dead."

'As the prophetic office of Jonas was confirmed to the Ninevites, by his miracle, so deliverance on the third day from the belly of the fish; so the divine authority of Christ should be confirmed to the Jews by his resurrection on the third day.'

Verse 40.

'Three days and three nights.' It is a received rule among the Jews, that a part of a day is put for the whole; so that whatsoever is done in any part of the day, is properly said to be done that day. ... 1 Kings 20: 29, "... When eight days were accomplished for the circumcision of the child, &c." ... yet the day of his birth and of his circumcision were two of those eight days. ... Since then our Savior was in the grave, all Friday night and Saturday; seeing He was in the grave all Saturday night, and part of the morning of the day following, ... He may, according to the Hebrew computation, be truly said to have been "three days and three nights in the heart of the earth."

'Three days and three nights.' The very same quantity of time, which is here termed "three days, and three nights, and which in reality was but one entire day, a part of two others, and two whole nights."

termed three days and three nights in the book of Esther: God neither eat nor drink THREE DAYS, NIGHT OF DAY, &c. chap. 4: 16. Afterwards it follows, chap. 5: 1. On the third day, Esther stood in the inner court of the king's house. This, as Lightfoot amply shows, was very common among the Jewish writers. Dr A. CLARKE

[Whale.] The original word here "denotes any large fish;" and that a fish of the shark kind, and not a whale, is here meant, Barchart has abundantly proved. GREENFIELD; with whom accord Doddridge, Campbell, Rosenmüller, Glark, and Harris. In vindication of its being a whale, Hume adduces the testimony of Ep. Jebb in the natural history of the whale, and concludes that "the only objection that can be offered to Dr. Hume's opinion is, that there is no authentic instance on record of whales being found in the Mediterranean sea." It is added by Dr. A. Clarke, however, "the throat of a whale is capable of admitting little more than the arm of an ordinary man; but of the shark species many have swallowed a man whole." See further on Jonah.

[Heart of the earth.] 'The sepulchre. An Hebraism; as may be seen in Ps. 46: 3. Deut. 4: 11.'

[Heart.] 'As in Jonah 2: 3. the original is, in the heart of the sea, and Deut. 4: 11. the heart of heaven; so here, in the heart means simply within, in.'

Verse 41, 42.

There is vast dignity and propriety in this declaration of Christ concerning Himself, when we consider Him as the incarnate Son of God; but on the supposition that He was a mere man, the words must impress the mind in a very different manner. (Marg. Ref.) "God," says Whitchy, 'having promised to Solomon such wisdom, that, as there was none like him before, ... so should there arise none like unto him; (1 Kings 3: 12.) He that was greater in wisdom than Solomon, must be more than a man.'

(1.) Rise in judgment. 'An allusion to the custom among the Jews and Romans for the witnesses to rise from their seats when they accused criminals, or gave evidence against them.'

'Etc.' observes Doddridge, "it was not properly on the testimony of the Ninevites that these sinners would be condemned. The plain

2. As a generation that would be condemned by the queen of the south, the queen of Sheba, v. 42. She had no invitation to come to Solomon; but we are invited to come to Christ. Solomon was but a wise man, but Christ is Wisdom itself, in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom. She had many difficulties to break through; she was a woman, the journey long and perilous; a queen, and what would become of her own country in her absence? We have no such cares to hinder us. She could not be sure that it would be worth her while to go so far on this errand: fame uses to flatter men, but we come not to Christ on such uncertainties. She came from the uttermost parts of the earth, but we have Christ among us, and his word high us: Behold He stands at the door, and knocks. It should seem, the wisdom she came for, was only philosophy and politics; but the wisdom that is to be had with Christ, is wisdom to salvation. Solomon could not give her wisdom: but Christ will give wisdom to those who come to Him; nay, He will Himself be made of God to them. Wisdom: so that, on all these accounts, if we do not hear the wisdom of Christ, the forwardness of the queen of Sheba to come and hear the wisdom of Solomon, will rise up in judgment against us and condemn us; for Jesus Christ is greater than Solomon.

3. As a generation that were resolved to continue under the power of Satan, notwithstanding all the methods that were used to dispossess him. They are compared to one out of whom the devil, here called the unclean spirit, is gone, but returns with double force, v. 43-56. Now,

The parable represents his possessing men's bodies: Christ having lately cast out a devil, and they having said, He had a devil, gave occasion to show how much they were under the power of Satan; but Christ's ejectment of him, was final, and such as barred a re-entry: we find Him charging the evil spirit to go out, and enter no more, Mark 9:25. Probably the devil was wont sometimes thus to sport with those he had possession of; hence the lucid intervals of those in that condition were commonly followed with the more violent fits. When the devil is gone out, he is uneasy, for he sleeps not except he have done mischief; (Prov. 4:16.) he walks in dry places, like one that is very melancholy; he seeks rest, but finds none, till he returns again. When Christ cast the legion out of the man, they begged leave to enter into the swine, where they went not being in dry places, but into the lake presently.

The application of the parable makes it to represent the case of the body of the Jewish church and nation: So shall it be with this wicked generation. The devil, who, by the labors of Christ and his disciples, had been cast out of many of the Jews, sought for rest among the heathen, from whose persons and temples the Christians would everywhere expel him: so Whithy? or finding no where in the heathen world such desirable habitations, as here in the heart of the Jews; so Hammond: he shall therefore enter again into them; and then he shall take a durable possession here, and the state of this people is likely to be more desperately damnable, (so Hammond) than it was before Christ came among them, or would have been if Satan had never been cast out.

The body of that nation is here represented, First, As apostate. After the captivity in Babylon, they began to reform; but they soon corrupted themselves again: though they never relapsed into idolatry, they fell into all manner of impiety and profaneness, and added to all the rest of their wickedness a wilful contempt of Christ and his Gospel. Secondly, As marked for ruin. A new commission was passing the seals against that hypocritical nation, (like that, Isa. 10:6,) and their destruction by the Romans was likely to be greater than any other: then it was that wrath came on them to the uttermost, 1 Thess. 2:15, 16. Let this be a warning to all nations and churches, to take heed of leaving their first love, and returning to that wickedness which they seem to have forsaken: for the last state of that man will be worse than the first.

V. 46-50. Many excellent, useful sayings came from the mouth of our Lord Jesus on particular occasions; even his digressions were instructive, as well as his set discourses: as here, meaning is, that their case would illustrate the guilt of those who rejected Christ: so that here those are said to condemn others who furnish matter for their condemnation.

(Greater.) 'Something greater. There is a delicacy in the use made of the neuter gender in these verses, which a translator ought not to overlook. Our Lord chooses, on this occasion, rather to insinuate, than affirm the dignity of his character; and to afford matter of reflection to the attentive among his disciples, without exposing Himself to the contradiction of declared enemies.'

Verses 43-45.

This parable is a prophecy of the rejection of the Jews, and their awful state of enmity to the Gospel to this day. But it is also applicable to the case of individuals, who hear the word of God, are convinced of its truth, and in part reformed, but not truly converted: the unclean spirit indeed retires, but Christ is not welcomed to dwell in the heart by faith. The evil spirit hankers after his old abode, and waits his opportunity of returning: on examination, he finds his habitation empty, swept from convictions and serious impressions; and garnished or ready furnished, for the reception and entertainment of unclean spirits, by a preparation of heart to comply with their suggestions. Thus, instead of one evil spirit, seven take up their abode in the man, and his last state becomes worse than the first: he becomes, perhaps, a more decent, plausible, or presumptuous enemy of God; but seven fold more callous and inveterate than before—This was doubtless the case with great numbers, who had heard John the Baptist, Jesus, and the apostles, with attention, but who afterwards relapsed into wickedness: and it is the case of many, in all places where the Gospel is faithfully preached. (Marg. Ref.—Note 2. Pet. 2:21-23.)

(43.) The unclean spirit. 'Had there been no reality in demoniacal possessions, [as some represent,] our Lord would scarcely have appealed to a case of this kind here, to point out the real state of the Jewish people, and their approaching desolation. Had this been only a vulgar error, of the nonsense of which the learned scribes and wise Pharisees must have been convinced, the case, not being in point because not true, must have been treated with contempt by the very people for whose conviction it was designed.'

Dr. A. CLARKE.

Through dry places, seeking rest. 'Here is a plain reference to the common notion of evil demons had their haunts in deserts and desolate places. (Compare Isa. 13: 21. and Rev. 18: 2.) Some may think that a desire of doing mischief might rather have prompted the evil spirit... to continue in some city, or other place of public resort: but as he may be supposed... to apprehend that, after being driven out, he should for a while be under some extraordinary restraint, it seems... very natural and beautiful circumstance thus to represent this malignant being as impatient, of the sight of mankind, and rather choosing to seek his rest in the prospect of a sandy desert, than in the view of any more agreeable scene, which might renew his anguish, by presenting to him the memorials of Divine goodness to the human race.'

DOODRIDGE.

Seeking rest. 'Or, refreshment. Strange! a fallen, corrupt spirit can have no rest but in the polluted human heart: the corruption of the one is suited to the pollution of the other, and thus like cleaves to like.'—In the Orphic demonology, evil spirits were divided into five classes, viz: celestial, aerial, aquatic, terrestrial, and subterranean demons. The Platonists, the followers of Zoroaster, and the primitive Jews, made nearly the same distinctions.'

Dr. A. CLARKE.

To consider this parable as a great moral lesson of general and practical utility, it evinces the inefficacy and danger of irresolute purposes of amendment, and partial repentance, when men are enslaved to some particular sin. Not uncommonly are sinners conscious of guilt, and yet fail to return decidedly to the path of duty. In a short interval of contrition, a vulnerable conscience and a divided heart make them wretched. Their gratification in vice is lost, and they have no relish for virtue. Before peace can be restored to the soul, the victim of sinful passions feels an intolerable vacancy of enjoyment, making life a burden. He returns therefore to his former courses, and welcomes back his darling sins. Then it is usual for persons, relapsing desperately, not only to aggravate former transgressions, but to add new. He, who was at first a drunkard, becomes also a liar, a blasphemer, an adulterer, perhaps, and thief. Such is the natural progress of evil, making the last state worse than the first.'

HEWLETT.

(44.) Empty, swept, and garnished. 'Our Lord hereby strongly suggests, that indulging sinful habits is like sweeping and furnishing the house, to invite the abode of Satan there; in the same manner: as purity, devotion, and love are elsewhere represented as consecrating the soul for a temple to the Holy-Ghost.'

DOODRIDGE.

(45.) 'According to Josephus, the character of the Jews just before their final destruction by the Romans, was the vilest that can be conceived; and they pressed on to their own ruin, as if they had been possessed by legions of devils, and wrought up to the last degree of madness.'

Id.

Seven. 'One of the numbers used,' observes Hewlett, 'in an indefinite sense for "many" or "several." It is often imitated, with the Jews, something perfect, completed, filled up. It is the proper import of the Hebrew word. This meaning may refer to the completion of God's creative design, when He 'rested' on the seventh day. Seven demons—as many as could occupy his soul, filling it with pride, anger, self-will, lust, &c. and torturing the body with diseases.'

learned to command her Son, as the iniquity and idolatry of the church of Rome has since pretended to teach her: nor was she so free from fault and folly as they would make her. It was Christ's prerogative, and not his mother's, to do every thing wisely, and well, and in its season. Christ once said to his mother, How is it that ye sought me? Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business? And it was then said, she laid up that saying in her heart; (Luke 2:49.) but if she had remembered it now, she would not have given him this interruption when He was about his Father's business. Note, There is many a good truth that we thought well laid up, when we heard it, which yet is out of the way, when we have occasion to use it.

II. How He regarded this interruption, v. 48-50. He would not hearken to it; v. 48. Not that natural affection is to be put off, or that, under pretence of religion, we may be disrespectful to Observe, I. How Christ was interrupted in his preaching, p. 46, 47. It is needless to inquire which of his brethren they were that came along with his mother: perhaps they were those who did not believe in Him; (John 7:5.) or what their business was; perhaps it was only designed to oblige Him to break off, for fear He should fatigue Himself, or to caution Him to take heed of giving offence by his discourse to the Pharisees, and of involving Himself in a difficulty, as if they could teach Him wisdom.

He was as yet talking to the people. Note, Christ's preaching was talking; plain, easy, and familiar. What He had delivered had been cavilled at, and yet He went on. Note, The opposition we meet in our work, must not drive us from it. He left off talking with the Pharisees, for He saw He could do them no good; but continued to talk to the common people, who, not having such a conceit of their knowledge as the Pharisees had, were willing to learn.

His mother and brethren stood without, desiring to speak with Him. They had the advantage of his daily converse in private, and therefore were less mindful to attend on his public preaching. Frequently those who are nearest to the means of grace are most negligent. Familiarity and easiness of access breed some degree of contempt. We are apt to neglect that to-day, which we think we may have any day, forgetting that it is only the present time we can be sure of. There is too much truth in that common proverb, 'The nearer the church, the further from God'; pity it should be so.

They not only would not hear Him themselves, but interrupted others that heard Him gladly. We often meet with hindrances and obstructions in our work, by our friends that are about us, and are taken off by civil respects from our spiritual concerns. Those who really wish well to us and our work, may sometimes, by their indiscretion, prove impediments to us in our duty. The mother of our Lord desired to speak with Him; it seems she had not then parents, or unkind to other relations; but every thing is beautiful in its season, and the best duty must stand by, while the greater is done. When our regard to our relations comes in competition with the service of God, and the improving of an opportunity to do good, we must say to our father, I have not seen him, as Levi did, Deut. 33:9. The nearest relations must be comparatively hated, that is, we must love them less than Christ, (Luke 14:26.) and our duty to God must have the preference. Of this Christ has here given us an example. And we must not take it ill of our friends, nor put it to the score of their wickedness, if they prefer the pleasing of God to the pleasing of us; but we must readily forgive those neglects, which may be easily imputed to a pious zeal for God's glory and others' good. Nay, We must deny ourselves and our own satisfaction, rather than do that which may any way divert our friends from, or distract them in, their duty to God.

He took that occasion to prefer his disciples, who were his spiritual kindred, to his natural relations as such. He would rather be profiting his disciples, than pleasing his relations. Observe.

1. The description of Christ's disciples. They are such as do the will of his Father; not only hear it, and know it, and talk of it, but do it, for doing the will of God is the best preparative for discipleship, (John 7:17.) and the best proof of it; (ch. 7:21.) that denominates us his disciples indeed. Christ does not say, 'Whosoever shall do my will,' for He came not to seek or do his own will distinct from his Father's; his will and his Father's are the same; but He refers us to his Father's will, because now, in his present state and work, He referred Himself to it, John 6:38.

2. The dignity of Christ's disciples: The same is my brother and sister, and mother. His disciples that had left all to follow Him, and embraced his doctrine, were dearer to Him than any that were akin to Him according to the flesh. They had preferred Christ before relations; they left their father, (ch. 4:22 10:37.) and now, to make them amends, and to show that there was no love lost, He preferred them to his relations. Did not they hereby receive, in point of honor, an hundred fold? ch. 19:29. It was very endearing and encouraging for Christ to say, Behold my mother and my brethren; yet it was not their privilege alone; this honor have all the saints. Note, All obedient believers are near akin to Jesus Christ. They wear his name, bear his image, have his nature, are of his family. He loves them, converses freely with them as his relations, bids them welcome to his table, takes

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 33-50. Many from the remotest regions of the earth, who, by some faint report of the Gospel, have been led to inquire after Christ and his salvation, will rise up in judgment against unbelievers in this age and nation, and condemn them. — Let none rely on convictions, or external reformation; for every heart, indeed, is the residence of unclean spirits; those excepted, which are become the temple of the Holy Spirit, by faith in Jesus Christ. These enemies will, therefore, watch their opportunities, when convictions and terrors are vanished, and inclinations after former indulgences revive: and, finding no effectual opposition, will re-enter, and render the man more entirely their slave. Such characters cannot but be noticed, with mingled grief and horror, by those who carefully observe the state of congregations, where the Gospel is faithfully dispensed.—What encouragement does our Redeemer give us to follow Him unwearily, to attend on his instruction, to trust in his mercy, and, by obeying Him, to do the will of God our Father! Earthly relatives often fail of the duties incumbent on them: but he is such a Relation and Friend as men would have been, had sin never entered; indeed far more desirable. Whatever there is peculiar in the affection or regard of the different endeared relations of life, all centres in the love of Christ to his true disciples; yea, to the poorest, weakest, and most sinful of them. Whatever credit, comfort, or advantage could be derived from a loving brother, father, husband, or son, who was advanced to the highest state of earthly dignity and authority; this, and far more, may we confidently expect from Christ, in life, death, judgment, and to eternity. Let us then cease from men, and cleave to Him; let us look upon every Christian, even in the lowest condition of life, as the beloved brother or sister, or honored mother, of the Lord of glory; and let us love, respect, and be kind to them for his sake, and after his example, and count this our privilege and delight: remembering his words, 'Forasmuch as ye did it to the least of these my brethren, ye did it unto Me.' (Notes, 25: 34-46. P. O. 31-46.)

Verses 46-50.

It appears from the other evangelists, that the earnestness and assiduity of Jesus, in teaching the people, gave disquietude to near relations. (perhaps the children of Joseph by a former wife, or his cousins.) They wanted Him to desist, and seem to have engaged Mary to concur in the design to prevent Him from proceeding. (Notes, 7: 21-23. John 19: 25-27.)

Brethren, &c. 'This word in the Hebrew idiom means also, as is well known, cousins, nephews, and other near relations.'

'Abramam called Lot his brother, Gen 13: 8. Laban called Jacob his brother, though only his cousin.'

CAMPBELL. Dr. A. CLARKE. Gen 13: 8. Laban called Jacob BROTHER.

(48.) Who is my mother? 'To suppose that our Lord here intends to put any slight on his mother, would be very absurd: He only took the opportunity of expressing his affection to his obedient disciples in a peculiarly endearing manner.'

His relatives came to seize upon Him, for they thought He was distracted. See Mark 3: 21. Hence this seeming disregard of them.

(50.) Sister, &c. 'It may be there were present some of his kinswomen also, though they are not mentioned, or else He adds it for the comfort of those religious women, that followed Him, and ministered to Him.' Luke 8: 2 3.

CHAP. XIII.

The parable of the sower, 1-9. The reason why Jesus taught by parables 10-17. The parable explained, 18-23. The parable of the tares, 24-30; of the grain of mustard-seed, 31, 32; of the leaven, 33. The sower, 34; to fill in Christ a teaching by parables, 34, 35. That of the tares explained, 36-43. The parable of the hid treasure, 44; of the pearl of great price, 45, 46; of the net cast into the sea, 47-50, and of the householder, 51, 52. Christ's countrymen are offended in Him; his enemies hate it, and subsequent conduct, 53-58.

THE same day went Jesus out of the house, and ^asat by the sea-side.

2 And ^bgreat multitudes were gathered together unto him, ^cso that he went into a ship, and sat; and the whole multitude stood on the shore.

^a Mark 2:13. 4:1.
^b 4:25. 15:30. Gen. 49:10. Luke 8: 4-8.
^c Mark 4:1. Luke 5:3.

To whom he preached; great multitudes. We do not find that any of the scribes or Pharisees were present. They were willing to hear Him when He preached in the synagogue, (ch. 12: 9, 14.) but thought it below them to hear a sermon by the sea-side, though Christ Himself was the Preacher. Note, Sometimes there is most of the power of religion where there is less of its pomp: The poor receive the gospel. When Christ went to the sea-side, multitudes were presently gathered together to Him. Where the king is, there is the court; where Christ is, there is the church, though it be by the sea-side. Note, Those who would get good by the Word, must be willing to follow it in all its removes; when the ark shifts, shift after it. The Pharisees had been laboring, by base calumnies and suggestions, to drive the people from following Christ, but they still flocked after Him as much as ever. Note, Christ will be glorified, in spite of all opposition; He will be followed.

Where he preached. His meeting-place was the sea-side. It was pity but such a preacher should have had the most spacious, sumptuous, and convenient place to preach in, that could be devised, like one of the Roman theatres; but He was now in his state of humiliation, and in this, as in other things, denied himself the honors due to Him: as He had not a house of his own to live in, so He had no chapel of his own. By this He teaches us in the external circumstances of worship not to covet that which is stately, but to make the best of the conveniences God in his providence allots to us. When Christ was born, He was crowded into the stable, and now to the sea-side, where all persons might come to Him with freedom. He that was Truth itself sought no corners, as the pagan mysteries did. Wisdom cries without, Prov. 1: 20. John 13: 20.

His pulpit was a ship; not like Ezra's pulpit, made for the purpose, (Neh. 8: 4.) but converted to this use for want of a better. No place amiss for such a Preacher, whose presence dignified and consecrated any place: let not those who preach Christ be ashamed, though they have mean and inconvenient places to preach in. Some observe, that the people stand on dry ground while the Preacher is on the water in more hazard. Ministers are most exposed to trouble. Here was a true rostrum, a ship-pulpit.

What and how he preached. 1. He spake many things; many more, it is likely, than are here recorded, but all excellent and necessary: things that belong to our peace; things pertaining to the kingdom of heaven; not trifles, but things of everlasting consequence. It concerns care of them, provides for them, sees that they want nothing that is fit for them; when He died, He left them rich legacies, and now He is in heaven. He keeps a correspondence with them; He will have them all with Him at last, and in nothing fail to do the kinsman's part, (Ruth 3: 13.) nor ever be ashamed of his poor relations, but confess them before men, before the angels, and before his Father.

CHAP. XIII. v. 1-23. We have here Christ's preaching again, and may observe,

When He preached: it was the same day He preached the sermon in the foregoing chapter. Note, Christ was for preaching both parts of the day, and has by his example recommended that practice to his church; we must in the morning sow our seed, and in the evening not withhold our hand, Eccl. 11: 6. An afternoon sermon well heard, so far from driving out the morning sermon, will rather clench it, and fasten the nail in a sure place. Though Christ had been in the morning opposed by his enemies, and interrupted by his friends, yet He went on with his work; and in the latter part of the day, we do not find that he met with such discouragements. Those who with courage and zeal break through difficulties in God's service, will perhaps find them not so apt to recur as they fear. Resist them, and they will flee.

us to give more earnest need, when Christ has so many things to say to us, that we miss not any of them. 2. What He spake was in parables: a parable sometimes signifies any wise, weighty saying; but in the gospels generally, a continued similitude or comparison, by which spiritual and heavenly things are described in language borrowed from the things of this life.

It was a way of teaching used very much, not only by the Jewish rabbins, but by the Arabians, and other wise men of the east; a very profitable way, and the more so for its being pleasant. Our Savior used it much, and in it descended to the capacities of people. God he long used similitudes by his servants the prophets, (Hos. 12: 10.) and to little purpose; now He uses similitudes by his Son; surely they will reverence Him who speaks from heaven, and of heavenly things, and yet clothes them with expressions borrowed from things earthly. See John 3: 12. So descending in a cloud. Now,

I. We have here the general reason why Christ taught in parables. The disciples were a little surprised at it, for hitherto He had not much used it, and therefore they ask, Why speakest Thou to them in parables? They were truly desirous that the people might hear with understanding. They do not say, Why speakest Thou to us? (they knew how to get the parables explained,) but to them. Note, We ought to be concerned for the edification of others, as well as for our own, by the Word preached; and if ourselves be strong, yet to bear the infirmities of the weak.

To this question Christ answers, v. 11-17; where He tells them that He preached by parables, because thereby the things of God were made more plain and easy to them who were willing to be taught, and at the same time more difficult and obscure to those who were willingly ignorant; and thus the Gospel would be a savor of life to some, and of death to others. The same light directs the eyes of some, but dazzles others. Now,

This reason is laid down, v. 11. That is, 1. You know already something of these mysteries, and need not in this familiar way to be instructed; but the people are ignorant, and need to be taught by plain similitudes: for though they have eyes, they know not how to use them; so some. Or 2. The disciples were well inclined to the knowledge of gospel-mysteries, would search into the parables, and by them be led to a more intimate acquaintance with those mysteries; but the carnal hearers would be never the wiser, and so would justly suffer for their remissness. Note, There are mysteries in the kingdom of heaven, and without controversy, great is the mystery of godliness: Christ's incarnation, satisfaction, intercession, our justification and sanctification by union with Christ, and indeed the whole work of redemption, from first to last, are mysteries, could never have been discovered but by divine revelation, (1 Cor. 15: 51.) were at this time discovered but in part to the disciples, and will never be

NOTES.

CHAP. XIII. v. 1. 'There are eight parables recorded in this chapter, designed to represent the kingdom of heaven, the method of planting the Gospel-kingdom in the world, and its growth and success. The great truths and laws of that kingdom are in other Scriptures laid down plainly, and without parables; but some circumstances of its beginning and progress are here laid open in parables. 1. Here is the parable to show what are the great hindrances of people's profiting by the Word of the Gospel; and in how many it comes short of its end, through their own folly, and that is the parable of the four sorts of ground. 2. Here are two parables intended to show that there would be a mixture of good and bad in the Gospel-church, which would continue till the great separation between them in the judgment-day: the parable of the tares put forth, and expounded at the request of the disciples; and that of the net cast into the sea. 3. Here are two parables intended to show that the Gospel-church should be very small at first, but that in process of time it should become a considerable body: that of the grain of mustard-seed, and that of the leaven. 4. Two parables show that those who expect salvation by the Gospel must be willing to venture all, and quit all, in the prospect of it, and that they shall be no losers: that of the treasure hid in the field, and that of the pearl of great price. 5. Here is one parable intended for direction to the disciples; to make use of the instructions He had given them for the benefit of others; and that is the parable of the good householder.'

Out of the house.] 'Of Peter, see chap. 17: 24, 25. And that, the same day; for our Lord is incessant in his labors, instant in season and out of season, seldom appearing to take rest. In this He has left an example to his ministers; for, as Satan, like a roaring lion, is intent on seeking whom he may devour, the minister must be diligent to counteract his work.'

Luke relates the concluding incident in the last chapter after the parable of the sower. Our Lord went into a fisher-boat, or little ship, close to the land, that He might be less incommoded, and better heard by the people. 'If the shore were elevated,' observes Gilpin, 'as it probably might be, and formed a kind of semicircular bay, the people might range themselves round it, and hear with great advantage.'

SCOTT.

Into a ship.] 'The vessel, or boat, a particular vessel, as supposed by Wakefield, which seems to have been kept on the lake for the use of Christ and his apostles; it probably belonged to some of the fishermen.' (see chap. 1: 22.) who, he thinks, occasionally at least, followed their former occupation. See John 21: 3.

Doddridge and Rosenmüller, however, regard the expression as indicating no particular vessel.

And sat.] 'So was the manner of the nation, that the masters when they read their lectures, sat, and the scholars stood.'

3 And he spake many things unto them^d in parables, saying, Behold, a sower went forth to sow:

4 And when he sowed, some seeds fell by the way-side, and the fowls came and devoured them up:

5 Some fell upon stony places, where they had not much earth: and forthwith they sprang up, because they had no deepness of earth:

6 And when the sun was up, they were scorched; and, because they had no root, they withered away.

7 And some fell among thorns; and the thorns sprang up and choked them.

Verses 3-8.

(Note, Judg. 9: 8-15.)—Parables are a kind of pictures of spiritual things: so that, when we have got the key, we perceive more of their nature by a single glance, than we could otherwise learn by labored descriptions, or multiplied distinctions.—This parable of the sower seems to be a prophetic history of the effects produced by the Gospel, in all places to which it should be sent.

(3.) Parables. 'A parable has been justly defined to be a similitude, in which one thing is compared to another, especially spiritual things to natural, by which means those spiritual things are better understood, and make a deeper impression on an honest and attentive mind. In a parable, a resemblance in the principal incidents is all that is required; smaller matters being considered as a sort of drapery. Maimonides, in Moreh Nevochim, gives an excellent rule on this head: "Fix it as a principle to attach yourself to the grand object of the parable, without attempting to make a particular application of all the circumstances and terms which it comprehends." GREENFIELD

'The word parable sometimes signifies a sublime discourse, elevated beyond the common forms of speech, though no simile be used. (Num. 23: 7. 24: 15. Job 27: 1. 29: 1. Ps. 73: 2.) And, as short parables after grew into proverbs, or were alluded to in them, hence the word parable is sometimes used for a proverb. Mic. 2: 4. Hab. 2: 6.

Appropriately, a parable is a narration of something fictitious or imagined, to represent another or different thing, which is real and true; it is a fable. The parables set forth by Christ are of two kinds; one, to illustrate moral sentiment, including the duties of life, and the other, more or less manifestly to bring to view the nature of the divine government and future events. Of this last kind are the parables in this chapter. ROSENM.

It matters not whether the relation itself be true history or fiction. The truth of the parable lies in the justness of the application.

So frequent and so important are the instructions of our Lord by parables, and as is marked by Lightfoot, 'no scheme of Jewish rhetoric' having been more familiarly used, it is deemed of consequence to insert a view of this method, condensed from Dr. A. Clarke, and its employment, specially in the Bible. He observes: 'The method of conveying instruction by parables, or moral fictions, sometimes in the form of similitude, allegory, fable, or apologue, was very common, and in high esteem among all ancient nations: but the Asiatics used it most frequently, and brought it to a higher degree of perfection, than any other people on the earth. The despotic and tyrannical nature of their governments led them often to make use of this method. Reproof and censure, which it might not, on many occasions, be expedient or safe to deliver in explicit language, and which might exasperate, when too plainly spoken, rather than correct, could be conveyed with delicacy and success under the disguise of parable. Even to the present time, information concerning grievances, oppressive acts of government, &c. is conveyed to the despotic Asiatic rulers, under the guise of parable. An ancient instance of this we find in the reproof conveyed to the heart of David by the prophet Nathan, in the parable of the poor man's ewe lamb.

Persons thus addressed, not perceiving at first the relation, under this artificial form, to be directed, against themselves, lost sight of their self-the increase of grace, even to an abundance in glory, Prov. 4: 18. Joseph—He will add, Gen. 30: 24.

2. Here is a threatening to him that has not, that has no desire of grace, that makes no right use of the gifts and graces he has; that has, but uses not what he has; from him shall be taken away that which he has, or seems to have. His leaves shall wither, his gifts decay; the means of grace he has, and makes no use of, shall be taken from him; God will call in his talents out of their hands, that are likely to be come bankrupts.

This reason is particularly explained, with reference to the two sorts of people Christ had to do with.

1. Some were willingly ignorant; and such were amused by the parables, v. 13. They had shut their eyes against the clear light of Christ's plainer preaching, and therefore were now left in the dark. Note, There are many who see the gospel-light, and hear the gospel-sound, but it never reaches their hearts. It is just with God to take away the light from those who shut their eyes against it; and God's dealing thus with them magnifies his distinguishing grace to his disciples.

Now in this the Scripture would be fulfilled, v. 14: 15. It is quoted from Isa. 6: 9, 10, and is referred to no less than six times in the New Testament; which intimates, that in gospel-times spiritual judgments would be most common. That which was spoken of the sinners in Isaiah's time, was fulfilled in those in Christ's time, and is still fulfilling. Here is,

First, A description of sinners' wilful blindness and hardness. This people's heart is waxed gross; is fattened, so the word is; which denotes both sensuality and senselessness; (Ps. 119: 70.) Jeshurun waxed fat and kicked, Deut. 32: 15. And when the heart is thus heavy, no wonder the ears are dull of hearing; the whispers of the Spirit they hear not at all, the loud finess and prejudices, and were frequently induced, by their unexpecting replies, to acknowledge the justice of the reprehension, and to pronounce the condemnation of their conduct, from their own mouths as in the case of David above referred to.

The word has the ten following significations in Scripture:

1. A simple comparison, such as that of our Lord, between the state of the Jewish nation, and that of the world in the days of Noah, mentioned, Matt. 24: 32-33. 2. An obscure similitude, such as that mentioned, Matt. 15: 13-15. 3. A simple allegory, such as our Lord's parable concerning persons invited to a marriage supper: of the sower—tares and wheat—gran of mustard-seed—hidden treasure—precious pearl—drag-net, &c. contained in Matt. 13. 4. A maxim or wise sentence, to direct and govern a man in civil or religious life. In 1 Kings 4: 32. we are informed that Solomon spake three thousand of this kind of parables or proverbs. 5. It means a by-word, or proverb of reproach. Such God threatened to make the disobedient Jewish people. See 2 Chron. 7: 20. In this sense it is used, Ps. 44: 14. Jer. 24: 9. 6. As parables, proverbs, and useful maxims for the regulation of life, and instruction in righteousness, had, before the Babylonian captivity, lost all their power and influence among the wicked Jews; so they were generally disregarded, and those who made use of them became objects of reproach and contempt; hence, parable, at that time at least, was used to signify a frivolous, uninteresting discourse. In this sense alone, the word appears to be used, Ezek. 20: 43. 7. It means a simple proverb or usage, where neither comparison nor similitude was intended, as Luke 4: 23. 6: 39. 8. It means a type, illustration, or representation. See Heb. 7: 9. where the first tabernacle is said to have been a figure, a parable, for the time then present. 9. It means a daring exploit, an unusual and severe trial, or a case of imminent danger and jeopardy. In this sense it is used by some of the best and most correct Greek writers. I know of no place in the sacred writings, in which it has this sense, unless it be in Heb. 11: 19. where the original Greek word is translated in a figure—which, it is probable should be translated, "he being in the most imminent danger of his life," i. e. at the time when Abraham drew his knife to slay his son, Gen. 22: 10, 10. It signifies a very ancient and obscure prophecy. Ps. 49: 4. 78, and probably Prov. 1: 6. and to this very subject, the words are applied and quoted by the evangelist Matthew. (13: 35.)

This note shall be closed with the following remarks on the subject from Dr. Townson: 'Although our Lord followed the example of other eastern teachers in the use of parables, He did it with a moderation and dignity becoming his character. He never introduces beasts of the field, or trees of the forest, debating and conversing together with the reason and faculties of man; nor does He bring forward emblematical persons, as influencing the counsels and actions of men. All is built upon nature and life, and the reality of things, and composed of circumstances which every one perceived might probably happen. Once only, in the parable of the rich man and Lazarus, the scene is laid beyond this visible world.'

(4.) Way-side. There were ways and paths, as well common as more private, along the sown fields; see chap. 12: 1. And it is stated by travellers, that the fields are in general without fences.

8 But other fell into good ground, and brought forth fruit, some an hundred-fold, some sixty-fold, some thirty-fold.

9 Who hath ears to hear, let him hear.

10 ¶ And the disciples came, and said unto him, Why speakest thou unto them in parables?

11 He answered and said unto them, Because it is given unto you to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, but to them it is not given.

12 For whosoever hath, to him shall be given, and he shall have more abundance: but whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken away even that he hath.

calls of the Word, they regard not at all: They stop their ears; (Ps. 58: 4, 5.) they shut both the learning senses; for their eyes also have been closed, resolved that they would not see light come into the world, when the Sun of righteousness arose, because they loved darkness rather than light, John 3:19. 2 Pet. 3:5.

Secondly, A description of that judicial blindness, which is the just punishment of this; v. 14. 'what means of grace you have, shall be to no purpose to you; though, in mercy to others, they are continued, yet, in judgment to you, the blessing on them is denied.' The saddest condition a man can be in on this side hell, is to sit under the most lively ordinances with a dead, stupid, untouched heart. To hear God's word, and see his providences, and yet not to understand and perceive his will, is the greatest sin and the greatest judgment. Observe it is God's work to give an understanding heart, and He often, in a way of righteous judgment, denies it to those to whom He has given the hearing ear, and the seeing eye, in vain. Thus does God choose sinners' delusions, (Isa. 66:4.) and bind them over to the greatest ruin, by giving them up to their own hearts' lusts; (Ps. 81:11, 12.) Let them alone; (Hos. 4:17.) My Spirit shall not always strive, Gen. 6:3.

Thirdly, The woful effect and consequence of this; v. 15. They will not see, because they will not turn; and God says that they shall not see, because they shall not turn; Let them alone be converted, and He shall heal them.

Note, Seeing, hearing, and understanding are necessary to conversion; for God, in working grace, deals with men as men, as rational agents; He draws with the cords of a man, changes the heart by opening the eyes, and turns from the power of Satan unto God, by turning first from darkness to light, Acts 26:18. All those who are truly converted to God, shall certainly be healed by Him: so that, if sinners perish, it is not to be imputed to God, but to themselves; they foolishly expected to be healed, without being converted. It is just with God to deny his grace to those who have long and often refused and resisted it. Pharaoh, for a good while, hardened his own heart, (Exod. 8: 15, 32,) and afterwards God hardened it, ch. 9: 12.—10: 20.

Let us therefore fear, lest, by sinning against the divine grace, we sin it away.

2. Others were effectually called, and truly desirous to be taught; and they were instructed, v. 16, 17. They saw the glory of God in Christ's person; they heard the mind of God in Christ's doctrine; they saw much, and were desirous to see more, and thereby were prepared to receive further instruction; they had opportunity for it, by being constant attendants on Christ, and should have it from day to day, and grace with it. Now this Christ speaks of,

As a blessing; (v. 16.) 'It is your happiness, and a happiness for which you are indebted to the peculiar favor and blessing of God.' It is a promised blessing, that in the days of the Messiah, the eyes of them that see shall not be dim, Isa. 32: 3. The eyes of the meaneest believer, that knows experimentally the grace of Christ, are more blessed than those of the greatest scholars, that are strangers to God, who have eyes, and see not. Blessed are your eyes. Note, True blessedness is entailed on the right understanding and due improvement of the mysteries of the kingdom of God. The hearing ear and the seeing eye are God's work in those who are sanctified; (Prov. 20:12.) and they are a blessed work, which shall be fulfilled with power, when those who now see through a glass darkly, shall see face to face. It was to illustrate this blessedness, that Christ said so much of the misery of those who are left in ignorance; they have eyes, and see not; but blessed are your eyes. Note, The knowledge of Christ is a distinguishing favor to those who have it, and on that account lays under the greater obligations: see John 14:22. The apostles were to teach others, and therefore were themselves blessed with the clearest discoveries of divine truth: The watchmen shall see eye to eye, Isa. 52:8.

He speaks of it as a transcendent blessing, desired by, but not granted to, many prophets and righteous men, v. 17. The Old-Testament saints coveted earnestly further discoveries. They had the types, shadows, and prophecies, but longed to see the Substance. They desired to see the great Salvation, the Consolation of Israel; but did not see it, because the fullness of time was not yet come. Note, First, Those

Verse 9.

This address was suited to call the attention of all present to the parable; and to show them, that some peculiarly interesting instruction was intended by it.

This simple expression, which is often repeated, seems to imply no less than—Let nothing but absolute incapacity of hearing, or destitution of the necessary organs, be suffered to preclude attention to what I declare.

Verse 10, 11.

The multitudes, who heard this parable in public, did not understand it, and probably few at that time inquired further about it. But the disciples came to our Lord in private, desiring to be informed, why He thus taught the people, and what was the meaning of the parable. He had doubtless several reasons: this method of instruction is peculiarly suited to assist the memory, and engage the attention; and it communicates information and conviction to the teachable, in the most simple and compendious way. (Notes, Prov. 1: 1-5.) The reason, however, which our Lord here assigns, is to replete with instruction, warning, and encouragement. 'It was given to the disciples' to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, but not to others; (that is, not at that time, for it might afterwards be given to them also.) This happened after Christ had upbraided and threatened the neighboring places, whence doubtless the greatest part of the multitude came: (11: 20-24.) and it is not improbable, that the Pharisees, who had so vilely blasphemed Him this very morning night with an ill purpose have gathered a company of their associates...about Christ to ensnare Him; which, if it were the case, will fully account for such a reserve. Doddridge. A mystery, in the scriptural use of the term, signifies, a subject in religion, of which we can know little or nothing, except by revelation, and nothing more than is revealed. This knowledge is received by faith only, and must be used as a principle in all our other reasonings; but itself must not be disputed, as if it were the subject of reason and argument. There are many mysteries respecting the kingdom of heaven: and it is given to Christ's true disciples to know or understand them, as far as it is needful; and to them alone. Those who in humble faith take Him for their Teacher, by attending to the instructions of his Word, and seeking the teaching of his Spirit, attain to this knowledge; but the proud, unteachable, and unbelieving do not: for no man can know them, except from the great Proprietor of the church.—But his special choice and effectual calling made those persons his disciples, rather than others of their countrymen, and this brought them to learn of Him.

(11.) He said to them in reply, I thus express myself in parables, because though it is granted, through Divine goodness, to you, whose hearts receive the truth, to know and understand the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, which have been long concealed; yet it is not granted to others, who are prejudiced against them; but they are just suffered to continue unacquainted with them: and therefore to those who are strangers, through their own neglect and folly, to what they might before have learned, all these things are now involved in parables and figures; which, though they affect the mind of the attentive hearer, and promote his edification, are regarded by the rest as an empty amusement.

Compare 1 Cor. 13: 2. A "mystery," in the usual scripture sense of the word, is a doctrine, or fact, unknown, or obscurely intimated, which Christ, or his apostles discovered, or made fully known. As 1 Cor. 15: 51, and Eph. 3: 3-6. Thus, in this chapter, verse 31-33; 47-50, contained 'mysteries.'

Verse 12.

'Whosoever hath, to him shall be given, and he shall have abundance': that is, say many expositors, 'he who is left with what he has.' Yet if our Lord meant so, why did he not thus express Himself, either here or in other places? There is no doubt a truth in his way of stating it; for no man improves either natural or external advantages, without the special grace of God; yet it is a truth often misunderstood and perverted. The obvious meaning is, that one special gift of God to his people is an earnest of others: so that he who has faith and grace, shall receive further communications of knowledge, wisdom, holiness, and every blessing of salvation, till he has a great abundance; whereas he, who has not faith and grace, shall at last be deprived of all his other attainments and advantages, in which he trusted and gloried. The plain inferences from which are, that he who desires these blessings must seek them from Christ, or he never can have them; and he that has received them, must bless the Lord for making him to differ, and trust Him to perfect his own good work. Scott. He that hath not, 'the poor man'; 'He that hath,' 'the rich man'; 'he that hath not,' 'the poor man'; an expression common to both sacred and profane writers.

Dr. A. CLARKE. 'So, those who devote not the light and power which God has given to the purposes for which He granted these gifts, from them shall be taken away these unemployed or prostituted blessings.'

HARMER. 'The spiritual truth couched under this adage is this: He who hath considerable religious knowledge, and takes that care to improve it which men are observed to do with their wealth, will find it increase: while those who have but little, and manage it as the poor are often observed to do, will find it come to nothing.' The little he had intended, will slip out of his memory; he will be deprived of it, and in that sense it will be taken from him. Jesus, therefore, involves the doctrine of the Gospel in parables, that his hearers might be thus excited to attention, and not by inattention be deprived of all knowledge, but make as great a proficiency as possible.—It was never the intention of God that men should attain heavenly knowledge, any more than earthly, without labor, pains, and attention.

13 Therefore speak [to them in parables: because they seeing see not; and hearing they hear not, neither do they understand.

15 For this people's heart is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes they have closed, lest at any time they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and should understand with their heart, and should be converted, and I should heal them.

who know something of Christ, cannot but covet to know more. Secondly, The discoveries of divine grace are made, even to prophets and righteous men, but according to the dispensation they are under. Though they were the favorites of Heaven, with whom was God's secret, yet they saw not the things which they desired to see, because God had determined not to bring them to light yet; and his favors shall not anticipate his counsels. There was then, as there is still, a glory to be revealed; something in reserve, that they without us should not be made perfect, Heb. 11:40. Thirdly, To excite our thankfulness, and quicken our diligence, it is good for us to consider what means we enjoy, and what discoveries are made to us, above what they had, who lived under the Old-Testament dispensation, especially in the revelation of the atonement for sin; (2 Cor. 3: 7, &c. Heb. 12:13.) and our improvements should be proportionable to our advantages.

II. We have, in these verses, the parable of the Sower and the seed. Christ drew his parables from common, ordinary things, not from philosophical notions or speculations, or the unusual phenomena of nature; many of them are from the husbandman's calling, as this of the sower, and that of the tares. Christ chose to do thus, 1. That spiritual things might hereby be made more plain, and easy to slide into our understandings. 2. That common actions might hereby be spiritualized, and we take occasion from those things which fall so often under our view, to meditate with delight on the things of God; and thus when our hands are busiest about the world, be led to have our hearts in heaven. Thus the Word of God shall talk with us, Prov. 6:22.

The parable of the Sower is plain enough, v. 3-9. The exposition of it we have from Christ Himself. The disciples, when they asked, Why speakest Thou to them in parables? (v. 10,) intimated a desire to have the parable ex-

Our Lord spake in parables to the people, because they refused to improve their faculties and advantages: for they hated the truth through love of sin, and closed their eyes to the light by proud and carnal prejudices. They saw his miracles, but could not see that He was the Messiah; and heard his doctrine, without acknowledging that it was the voice of God; and it was his sovereign will to leave many of them to final obduracy and unbelief. (Notes, 16, 17. Deut. 29: 4. Is. 42:18-20.)

Saying, they see not. Inasmuch as they do not honestly use the faculties which have been given them, but are like persons that have eyes and ears, and yet will neither see nor hear; it is in just displeasure I preach to them in this obscure language, that what has been their crime may be their punishment: that, seeing my miracles, they may see indeed the outward act, but not perceive the evidence arising from them: and hearing my discourses, they may indeed hear the sound of them, but not understand their true intent and meaning; lest at any time they should be converted, and their sins be forgiven them, which to many of these people shall never be.

DODDRIIDGE.

Verse 14, 15.

The prophecy referred to seems to have had a peculiar respect to the times and persons here spoken of. They would have the fullest opportunity of learning the way of salvation; yet they should not understand it, nor perceive in Jesus the fulfilment of the ancient prophecies. God judiciously left them to be blinded; so that it became impossible for them to understand or believe the doctrine of salvation, or to be converted, that their souls might be healed: for had they been converted, they must have been pardoned and healed; or, saved, and renewed unto holiness.—There seems throughout to be a special reference to the malevolent Pharisees and their adherents. "The prophets are in other places said to perform the thing which they only foretold." By Louth. But we might not suspect this grossness of heart and heaviness of ears was the effect of nature, and not of choice. He subjoins the fault of the will, "their eyes have they closed." Jerome.

By hearing, &c. The quotation is made almost exactly in the words of the LXX. The meaning is, indeed, the same with the Hebrew, as to the substance; but both the evangelist and the Septuagint render that, as relating the fact, which the Hebrew gives imperatively, Make this people's heart fat, &c. It is observable, that the passage is not once quoted imperatively in the New Testament.—In John it is quoted, "He hath blinded," &c. In Romans, "God hath given them," &c. SCOTT. (14.) On the latest review of this passage, both in Isaiah and in the several places where it occurs in the New Testament, I cannot apprehend that it was spoken merely by way of complaint, but think it plain that it was intended also as a prediction; (compare Mark 4: 12. Luke 8: 10. John 12: 40. Acts 23: 26, 27. Rom. 11: 8.) Now in predictions we generally render the future form, "such or such a thing shall happen," though we only mean to express the certainty of the event, without denying the freedom of the moral agents concerned in it, or detracting from it in any degree.

plained for the sake of the people. Our Lord Jesus kindly took the hint, and gave the sense directing his discourse to the disciples, but not the hearing of the multitude; for we have not the account of his dismissing them till p. 36.

Hear ye therefore the parable of the Sower (v. 18.) you have heard it, but let us go over again. Note, It would contribute much to our understanding of the Word, and profiting by it, to hear again what we have heard; (Phil. 3: 1.) it is no hearing at all, if it be not with understanding, Neh. 8: 2. It is God's grace indeed that gives the understanding, but it is our duty to give our minds to understand.

Let us therefore compare the parable and the exposition.

The seed sown is the word of God, here called the Word of the kingdom, (v. 19.) the kingdom of heaven; the kingdoms of the world, compared with that, are not to be called kingdoms: the word of the Gospel is the word of the kingdom; it is the word of the King, a law, by which we must be ruled and governed. This Word is the seed sown. It is incorruptible seed; (1 Pet. 1:23.) it is the Gospel that brings forth fruit in souls, Col. 1: 5, 6.

The Sower that scatters the seed is our Lord Jesus Christ; see v. 37. The people are God's husbandry, his tillage, so the word is; and ministers are laborers together with God, 1 Cor. 3: 9. The sowing of the Word is the sowing of a people for God's field, the corn of his floor, Isa. 21: 10.

The ground in which this seed is sown is the hearts of the children of men. Note, Man's heart is like soil, capable of improvement, of bearing good fruit; it is pity it should lie fallow, or be like the field of the slothful, Prov. 24: 30. The soul is the proper place for the Word of God to dwell, and work, and rule in; its operation is upon conscience; it is to light that candle of the Lord. Now, according as we are, so the Word is to us:—The reception depends on

Are fulfilled. The original means again fulfilled, i. e. once in the time of the prophet Isaiah, and again in these posterity. These awful words may be again fulfilled in us, if we take not warning.

DR. A. CLARKE.

(15.) Gross. Or "fat." The ancients had an idea that the fat of the body was insensible. Hence a "fat heart" denoted stupidity and want of feeling—we find such a use of the word fat in the Latin authors.

HEWITT.

For, like a wretch who has besotted and stupefied himself with riot, the heart, or intellectual faculty, of this people is, as it were, grown stiff with fatness, and they hear with heavy ears, and draw up their eyes as if they were more than half asleep; so that one would imagine they were afraid lest at any time they should happen to be roused, so as to see with their eyes, &c. I therefore justly leave them to their own obstinacy.

DODDRIIDGE.

HARMER notices, in reference to this passage, and that of the prophet to which it alludes, that, in the East, the sealing of the eyes, with gum, or otherwise, was both a part of the marriage ceremony, and a punishment of state. In the latter case, of which he gives instances, it was of longer or shorter duration, in proportion to the criminality of the offender; and he adds, "how beautiful, in this view, do these words appear, which have been so difficult."

ED.

Christ had very wise reasons for using the mode of instruction which He adopted. It is clear from history, that the Jews expected the Messiah to be a splendid monarch. If therefore they had heard from Jesus that the kingdom of God was to be nothing but a religious society, (i. e. ecclesia.) and that to be a member of the divine kingdom was to be nothing but to be a worshipper of God, they would altogether have despised Him, nor lent an ear to his discourses. Yet did Jesus intend to be entirely silent on the true nature of his divine kingdom.

KESENI.

Verse 16, 17.

(Marg. Ref.) The disciples, notwithstanding remaining ignorant, mistakes, and prejudices, had already been taught of God, to see and hear many things relative to his kingdom; and further light and instruction would continually be added. Their advantages also were peculiarly valuable: for many prophets and righteous persons, from the beginning of the world, had desired to see the times in which they lived, and the miracles which they witnessed, and to hear the Messiah's instructions which they daily heard: but this was reserved as a peculiar blessing for the apostles, whose light was proportionally more distinct and clear.

SCOTT.

Many of the prophets desired to understand more fully, than was possible for them, the nature of the Messiah's kingdom which they were intended to foretell: and righteous men may have anxiously waited for the consolation of Israel, to whom it was not given, as it was to Simeon, to "see the salvation of God."

the receiver. As it is with the earth; one sort of ground, take ever so much pains with it, and throw ever so good seed into it, brings forth no fruit to any purpose; while the good soil brings forth plentifully: so it is with the hearts of men, whose different characters are here represented by four sorts of ground, of which three are bad, and but one good. Note, The number of fruitless hearers is very great, and was even of those who heard Christ Himself preach. Who has believed our report? Many are called with the common call, but in few is the eternal choice evidenced by the efficacy of that call, ch. 20: 16.

Now observe the characters of these four sorts of ground.

The highway ground, v. 4-19. They had pathways through their corn-fields, (ch. 12: 1.) and the seed that fell on them never entered, and so the birds picked it up. Observe, First, What kind of hearers are compared to the highway ground; such as hear the word, and understand it not; and it is their own fault that they do not. They take no heed to it, nor hold of it; they do not come with any design to get good, as the highway was never intended to be sown. They come before God as his people come, and sit before Him as his people sit; but it is merely for fashion's sake, to see and be seen; they mind not what is said, it enters at one ear and goes out at the other, and makes no impression.

Secondly, How they come to be unprofitable hearers. The wicked one, that is, the devil, cometh and catcheth away that which was sown.

—Such mindless, careless, trifling hearers, are an easy prey to Satan; who, as he is the great murderer of souls, is the great thief of sermons, and will be sure to rob us of the Word, if we take not care to keep it; as the birds pick up the seed that falls on the ground which is never ploughed before, nor harrowed after. If we break not up the fallow ground, by bringing our hearts for the Word, and humbling them to it, and engaging our own attention; and if we cover not the seed afterwards, by meditation and prayer; if we give not a more earnest heed to the things which we have heard, we are as the highway ground. Note, The devil is a sworn enemy to our profiting by the Word of God; and none more befriending his design than heedless hearers, who are thinking of something else, when they should be thinking of the things that belong to their peace.

The stony ground. Some fell upon stony places, (v. 6, 7.) which represents the case of hearers, who receive some good impressions of the Word, but not lasting, v. 20, 21. Note, We may be a great deal better than some others, and yet not be so good as we should be; may go beyond our neighbors, and yet come short of heaven. Now, observe concerning these hearers that are represented by the stony ground,

First, How far they went. 1. They hear the word; they turn neither their backs on it, nor a deaf ear to it. Note, Hearing the Word, though ever so frequently, ever so gravely, if we rest in that, will never bring us to heaven.

2. They are quick in hearing, swift to hear, he anon receiveth it, he is ready to receive it, forthwith it sprung up, (v. 5.) it sooner appeared above ground than that which was sown in the good soil. Note, Hypocrites often get the start of true Christians in the shows of profession, and are often too hot to hold. He receiveth it straightway, without trying it; swallows it without chewing, and then there can never be a good digestion. Those are most likely to hold fast that which is good, that prove all things, 1 Thess. 5: 21. 3. They receive it with joy. Note, There are many that are very glad to hear a good sermon, that yet do not profit by it; they

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-17. Our divine Teacher orders every thing to the edification of the humble, teachable, and attentive disciple; but leaves occasions of falling, in the way of the careless, the captious, the self-sufficient, and presumptuous.—We not only have his word, but are required to call on Him for the teaching of his Holy Spirit: and to those, who thus wait on Him, 'it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven,' which are concealed from all others under an impenetrable veil. We should therefore fear above all things an unteachable disposition. To persons of this temper, the things of the Spirit of God appear foolishness; and by deriding, reviling, and opposing them, they provoke the Lord to leave them under the power of strong delusions, to their final perdition. Such men may have excellent abilities, profound erudition, and many valuable advantages; but not having humble faith and love, all else will soon be taken from them, or turn to their unspeakable detriment. But the meanest and most illiterate believer is happy: his senses and faculties are blessed, they are employed to good purpose, and are 'instruments of righteousness unto God.' Under the Christian dispensation, we all enjoy what 'prophets and righteous men' of old desired to see and hear, and were not able; and if we have grace to make a proper use of our advantages, more will be given us, and we shall have abundance. But do any desire these blessings, who cannot ascertain that they have received them? Let them wait on the Lord for his teaching, and search the Scriptures with prayer: let them not close their own eyes and ears, and then God will not close them; and let them remember that the purposes and promises of God are perfectly consistent, and that 'every one that asketh, receiveth.' As for those who harder themselves against the truth, they can have no reason to complain, if God leave them to their perverse choice; till they be so blinded, that they can neither see, nor hear, nor be converted and healed.

SCOTT.

Verses 18, 19.

Every kind of preaching is by no means sowing this seed: if men teach mere morality, metaphysical speculations, enthusiastic delusions, human traditions, false doctrines; as the seed is congenial to the soil of fallen human nature, an increase may be expected; but it must be of the same kind with the seed: for the good fruit of repentance, faith, piety, and holiness can be produced from 'the Word of the kingdom' alone. This word, by those discoveries which it makes to us of God and ourselves, of sin and holiness, of Christ and eternity, is as properly in the heart, as seed of all true goodness, as the grain which we sow in the fruitful soil of the future crop of wheat. Many hearers of the Gospel, where most scripturally preached, are like 'the way-side.' They are worldly, proud and prejudiced. They attend from curiosity, or custom, or worse motives; out of the midst of secular engagements and conversation: whilst the word is sounding in their ears, they are often employed in thoughts about their diversions, pursuits, or schemes, the persons and objects around them, or the appointments which are to succeed the tedious hour; or they come in order to object, deride, or revile; but without expectation or desire of profiting. They therefore understand nothing of the true meaning, excellence, or importance of what they hear: and those evil spirits, who are sure to form an adverse part of every congregation, where the Gospel is truly preached, (having more employment there, and being more in danger of losing their servants, than at the places of dissipation or debauchery) are ready immediately to catch away the word out of the mind of each hearer, by suggesting more pleasing ideas, by engaging them in vain speculations or frivolous conversation, or by exciting pride and evil passions; or to excite disgust at the plain truths of God's word, or against something in the style and manner of the preacher. This industry of Satan to snatch the word out of our hearts, as it discovers his enmity against the progress of the Gospel, so doth it highly commend its excellence and efficacy: for were it not of great importance to preserve it there, he would not be so industrious to snatch it thence; and were it not, when there, a powerful instrument to work within us 'that "faith which purifies the heart;" why loth he do this, lest we 'should believe? Why is it then that men do call this quick and powerful word of life, a dead letter? And when they daily by 'experience see, that the persuasions of themselves and others are 'often prevalent, why do they think that God's can be of no effect, 'without a miracle? Whitby.—No man can persuade another to that which his heart is totally set against; and before regeneration, the heart is totally set against the Gospel. If regeneration be called a miracle in the concluding clause, our Lord's words answer the question. Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God. But if the learner write me something else, that regeneration, let those who expect miracles answer him.—The quotation, this excepted, which seemed to require notice, is of great importance. SCOTT.

(19.) The word of the kingdom. That is, the preaching of the Gospel of Christ.

Understandeth it not. 'Mindeth, or regardeth it not. See Ps. 41: 1. 106: 7. Prov. 21: 12. Rom. 3: 11. In two of these passages, the common translation has considered; and though understand is used in the other two, the context makes it manifest, that the meaning is the same.'

Jesus teaches them by this parable. As Rosenmüller has observed, "that He is the author of a new and better religion, whose seed He had then scattered, and which the apostles were to propagate. The comparison of truth to seed was not unusual with the ancients." BLOOMFIELD.

The wicked one. 'Signifying, from its derivation, he who distresses and torments the soul. Mark (ch. 4: 15.) calls him the adversary, or opposer, because he resists men in all their purposes of amendment, and opposes, to the utmost of his power, in order to frustrate the influences of divine grace upon the heart. In the parallel place in Luke, (ch. 8: 12.) he is called the devil, from a word signifying to shoot, or dart through. In allusion to this, St. Paul speaks of the fiery darts of the wicked one. It is worthy of remark, that these evangelists should use each a different appellation of this mortal enemy of mankind; probably to show, that the devil, with all his powers and perversities, opposes every thing that tends to the salvation of the soul.

may be pleased with the Word and yet not changed and ruled by it. 4. They endure for a while, like a violent motion which continues as long as the impression of the force remains, but ceases when that has spent itself. Note, Many endure for a while, that endure not to the end, and so come short of the happiness which is promised to them only that persevere: (ch. 10: 22.) they did run well, but something hindered them, Gal. 5: 7.

Secondly, How they fell away, so that no fruit was brought to perfection; as corn, that, having no depth of earth from which to draw moisture, is scorched and withered by the heat of the sun. And the reason is,

1. They have no root in themselves, no settled, fixed principles in their judgments; no firm resolution in their wills, no rooted habits in their affections; nothing firm that will be either the sap or the strength of their profession. Note, There may be the green blade of a profession, where there is yet no root of grace in the heart, and what there is of soil and softness is only in the surface; inwardly they are no more affected than a stone; they have no root, they are not by faith united to Christ, who is our Root; they derive not from Him, they depend not on Him. Where there is no principle, though there be a profession, we cannot expect perseverance. Those who have no root will endure but a while. A ship without ballast, though she may at first outlast the laden vessel, yet will certainly fail in stress of weather, and never make her port.

2. Times of trial come, and then they come to nothing; p. 21. It is a stumbling-block which one of this character cannot get over, and so he flies off, and this is all his profession comes to. Note, 1. After a fair gale of opportunity, usually follows a storm of persecution, to try who have received the Word in sincerity, and who have not. When the word of Christ's kingdom comes to be the word of Christ's patience, (Rev. 3: 10), then is the trial, who keeps it, and who does not, Rev. 1: 9. It is wisdom to prepare for such a day. 2. When trying times come, those who have no root are soon offended; they first quarrel with their profession, and then quit it; first find fault with it, and then throw it off. Hence we read of the offence of the cross, Gal. 5: 11. Observe, Persecution is represented in the parable by the scorching sun; (p. 6.) the same sun which warms and cherishes that which was well rooted, withers and burns up that which wanted root. As the word, so the cross of Christ, is to some a savor of life unto life, to others a savor of death unto death: the same tribulation which drives some to apostasy and ruin, works for others a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. Trials which shake some, confirm others, Phil. 1: 12. Observe how soon they fall away, by and by; as soon rotten as ripe; a profession taken up without consideration is commonly let fall without it; 'Light come, light go.'

The thorny ground, p. 7. This represents the condition of those who do not quite cast off their profession, and yet come short of any saving benefit by it; the good they gain by the Word, being insensibly overcome by the things of this world. Prosperity destroys the Word in the heart, as much as persecution does; and more dangerously, because more silently: the stones spoiled the root, the thorns spoil the fruit of the plant.

Now what are these choking thorns?

First, The cares of this world. Worldly cares are fitly compared to thorns, for they came in with sin, and are a fruit of the curse; they are good in their place to stop a gap, but a man must be well armed that deals much in them; (2 Sam. 23: 6, 7.) they are entangling, vexing, scratching, and their end is to be burned, Heb. 6: 8. These thorns choke the good seed. Note, Worldly cares are great hinderances to our profiting by the word of God, and our proficiency in religion: those who are careful and cumbered about many things, commonly neglect the one thing needful.

Secondly, The deceitfulness of riches. Those who have raised estates, and so have passed the danger from care to get riches; though they continue hearers of the word, yet are still in a snare; (Jer. 5: 4, 5.) it is hard for them to enter into the kingdom of heaven; they are apt to promise themselves that in riches which is not in them; to rely on them, and to make an inordinate complacency in them; and thus choke the Word as much as care did. Observe, It is not so much riches, as the deceitfulness of riches, that does the mischief:

The good ground; (p. 8.) it is pure, but that good seed should always meet with good soil, and then there is no loss; such are good hearers of the word, p. 23. Note, Though there are many that receive the grace of God, and the word of his grace, in vain, yet God has a remnant by whom it is received to good purpose; for God's word shall not return empty, Isa. 55: 10, 11.

Now, that which distinguished this good ground from the rest, was, in one word, fruitfulness. By this, true Christians are distinguished from hypocrites, that they bring forth the fruits of righteousness, John 15: 8. He does not say that this good ground has no stones in it, or no thorns; but there were none that prevailed to hinder its fruitfulness. Saints, in this world, are not perfectly free from the remains of sin; but happily freed from the reign of it.

The hearers represented by the good ground are, First, Intelligent hearers; they hear the Word and understand it; they understand not only the sense and meaning of the words, but their own concern in them; they understand it as a man of business understands his business. God in his Word deals with men as men, in a rational way, and gains possession of the will and affections by opening the understanding; whereas Satan, who is a thief and a robber, comes not in by that door, but climbeth up another way.

But they aim to serve two masters: their great concern is about the world; while religion is only a secondary concern to quiet conscience, to exclude the fear of hell, to keep up the hope of heaven, or to maintain the good opinion of Christians and ministers; whose approbation, or tacit connivance, often confirms them in this delusion. If in lower circumstances, their chief care is about a present and future provision for themselves and their families. Or perhaps being of another turn of mind, the pleasures of the world, and the desire of pomp, luxury, or authority, predominate. In this soil the seed seems to grow; but it is smothered by 'the cares of this world and the deceitfulness of riches;' for wealth seems to promise many advantages; and men of some seriousness often pursue it, under the self-flattering idea, that they shall by means of it be enabled to do the more good; and in both respects they find in the event, that they have been deceived. The love of wealth imposes on their judgments, and deludes them into multiplied methods of increasing it, some of which are fraudulent; it induces them to prostrate their intended earnestness about religion; and allures them into endless incumbrances, infectious connections, sinful compliances, and conformity to the world. These are the thorns, which grow up and choke the word; so that it becomes unfruitful, or brings nothing to perfection. This is the most unsuspected and fatal danger in great commercial cities, and in times of outward peace and prosperity; and it is to be feared, that very many are thus deceived, and lose their own souls, in attempting to gain more of this present world.

The deceitfulness of riches. 'The artful delusion of riches.' This phrase is very elegant, and admirably expresses the various artifices by which people in the pursuit of riches excuse themselves from day to day, in putting off religious cares, and the confounding disappointment which often mingles itself with their labors, and often with their success. Compare Prov. 11: 23. Luke 19: 24. 1 Tim. 6: 9, 10, 17. 2 Tim. 2: 4. and 4: 10.

Secondly, Fruitful hearers, which is an evidence of their good understanding, which also beareth fruit. We then hear fruit, when we practise according to the Word; when the temper of our minds and the tenor of our lives are conformable to the Gospel we have received, and we do as we are taught.

Thirdly, Not all alike fruitful; some an hundred-fold, some sixty, some thirty: some being more fruitful than others: where there is true grace, yet there are degrees of it; all Christ's scholars are not in the same form. We should aim at the highest degree, to bring forth an hundred-fold, as Isaac's ground did, (Gen. 23: 12,) abounding in the work of the Lord, John 15: 8. But if the ground be good, and the fruit right, the heart honest, and the life of a piece with it, those who bring forth but thirty-fold shall be graciously accepted of God; and it will be fruit abounding to their account, for we are under grace, and not under the law.

Lastly, He closes the parable with a solemn call to attention, (p. 9.) Note, The sense of hearing cannot be better employed than in hearing the word of God. Some are for hearing sweet melody, their ears are only the daughters of music; (Eccl. 12: 4.) there is no melody like that of the word of God: others are for hearing new things; (Acts 10: 21.) no news like that.

V. 24-43. In these verses, we have, I. Another reason given why Christ preached by parables, (p. 34, 35.)—the time was not yet come, for the more clear and plain discoveries of the mysteries of the kingdom: and without a parable spake He not unto them; namely, at this time, and in this sermon. Note, Christ tries all ways to do good to souls; if men will not be instructed and influenced by plain preaching, He will try them with parables; and the reason here given is, That the Scripture might be fulfilled. The passage quoted, is part of the preface to that historical Psalm, (78: 2.) I will open my mouth in a parable. What David, or Asaph, says there, is accommodated to Christ's sermons; and that great precedent would serve to vindicate this way of preaching from the offence some took at it. Here is, 1. The matter of Christ's preaching; He preached things which had been kept secret from the foundation of the world. The mystery of the Gospel had been hid in God, in his councils and decrees, from the beginning of the world, Eph. 3: 9. Compare Rom. 16: 25. 1 Cor. 2: 7. Col. 1: 26

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 18-23. The good seed should be sown all over the world; though it can bear fruit only on the good ground. But let all who presume to sow it be careful to keep it free from every intermixture: let them sow it liberally, and 'be instant in season, out of season,' whether men will hear or forbear.' For these things they are accountable; but not for success, except as they prevent it by their own misconduct: nor should they be surprised or discouraged, if many hear in vain, or to bad purpose: for this was the case, when our Lord Himself condescended to preach the Gospel.—We should, however, especially look to ourselves, that we may ascertain what sort of hearers we are. We ought to heg of God to prepare our hearts to teach us the value of his Word; to deliver our minds from pride and prejudice; to preserve us from wandering thoughts and vain imaginations; and to impress us with a serious and earnest desire to learn of Him all those things which pertain to salvation. For want of this 'giving earnest heed,' many hearers of the pure Gospel 'receive the seed by the wayside': thus Satan immediately catches it out of their hearts, and no good effect can follow. (Note, Heb. 2: 1-4.) Though this may not be altogether the case with us, yet we should be humbled by the recollection, that it too often is, and has been so. Having therefore gone to hear the word, with a mind prepared by recollection and devotion; and having attended on it with serious and humble reverence; we should seek to preserve it in our hearts, by retirement, meditation, prayer, or pious conversation.—But there are more plausible paths to ruin, than those of the careless, the infidel, or the profligate; numbers of those who are greatly affected, and who are led to make a high profession of the Gospel, are found by the event to have 'had no root in themselves': for without deep humiliation, reverential fear of God, and a solemn sense of eternal things, the evil of sin, and the lost estate of our souls: high affections resemble the joy of a madman, who deems all the magnificent edifices which he sees to be his own. Nothing can so grow in an unhumiliated heart, as to stand the noon-day sun of tribulation and persecution: many, when thus tried, go out from among God's people, because not of them; whilst some upright Christians are ready to stumble at the truths of God, because such men seem to be exceptions to them. But if this superficial religion will not stand present trials, how will it endure in the day of judgment?—Let us, however, beware of the thorns, as well as of the rock; many a man has 'a name to live,' whom God sees to be dead in sin; many deep convictions, and serious purposes are choked by 'the love of the world, and the things that are in the world.' (Note, 1 John 2: 15-17.) thus no fruit is brought to perfection. Such professed Christians often draw their hope of heaven from the Gospel; but their present comfort is derived from the world. The kingdom of God and his righteousness are placed last: (Note, 6: 32, 33.) and the getting, keeping, and spending of deceitful riches, or anxiety about secular affairs, rob them of their time, and at last, of their souls; for unless the Gospel render us fruitful, it will never bring us to glory. Let us then continually watch and pray against these fatal delusions; and keep at a distance from every degree of this pernicious attachment to worldly objects. Let us be instant in prayer for that 'honest and good heart,' which is the only soil in which the good seed will spring up, and grow, and ripen with a rich increase. This is the grand distinction betwixt the Christian and all other men: and the preachers of the Gospel do as much towards ensuring success to their labors, when employed in earnest prayer to the Lord thus to prepare the people's hearts for the seed, as when faithfully dispensing the Word of life; and in this part of the work, all that love the souls of men may afford them effectual assistance. Nor let it be forgotten, that there are different degrees of fruitfulness among true Christians, to which their own present comfort and future glory will be proportioned: we should therefore 'abide in Christ, that we may bring forth much fruit,' even 'an hundred fold,' that God may be glorified, and that all may know whose disciples we are. (Note, John 15: 6-8.)

SCOTT.

Verse 23.

All this precious seed is not thrown away, nor will 'return void,' or fall to 'prosper in that for which it is sent.' (Note, Is. 55: 10, 11.) 'Some of it falls on good ground, even in an 'honest and good heart,' sincerely desirous of learning, 'be 'truth and will of God, in order to believe and obey. This 'preparation of heart is from the Lord,' and the want of the honest and good heart is the only reason, why the Gospel occasions the condemnation of any who hear it. When the heart is influenced by the fear of God, and a desire of his favor; when it is humble and contrite; when forgiveness and grace are valued more than worldly objects; when sin is hated and dreaded, and deliverance from it earnestly desired; when a man is thus disposed to 'buy the truth' at any price, and to become Christ's disciple at all adventures; then the ground is prepared for the good seed, and nothing can prevent its growth and increase: when it springs up, it will strike deep root, so that persecutions and afflictions, which scorch and wither the seed sown upon the rock, will serve to ripen this for the harvest. He, whose heart is thus prepared, will hear the word of God with earnest prayer to be taught by the Holy Spirit, and to be delivered from prejudice and error; the cares, interests, and pleasures of the world will be subordinated and moderated, with reference to the welfare of the soul; and when they seem ready to injure the believer, or to mar his fruitfulness, he will bestow pains to root them up, as thorns and weeds, lest they should deprive him of his expected increase. Thus the seed will produce a plentiful crop, and he, in whose heart it grows, will 'bring forth fruit with patience,' and 'perseverance in well-doing, even to the end. All, who thus receive the good seed, will manifest their holiness of heart by holy actions. They will not all be alike fruitful; but all will yield a rich increase of those 'fruits of the Spirit,' which are the effects and evidence of repentance and faith in Christ. These alone are valued by the Sower of the seed, and the Giver of the increase.

'By this parable, Christ teaches the various results of his religion, chiefly among the Jews; what would be the principal impediments to it, and what those should avoid or perform, who might desire to share in the felicity promised to the friends and followers of the Messiah.'

ROSENMULLER.

Hundred fold.] 'The land in the East generally yields ten fold, rarely twenty or thirty; but Gen. 26: 12. an hundred fold. Herodotus, Strabo and Pliny mentioned the increase of crops at the rate of one hundred and fifty, two hundred, and even three hundred fold. This great increase is owing to the circumstance of the kernels being put into the soil at a distance from each other, so as to send out several stalks (Gen. 41: 5, 47.) some of which, (according to Pliny) have from three to four hundred ears; and in Africa at the present time, they bear at least ten and fifteen.'

JAHN.

In all congregations, where the true Word of God has been preached hitherto, there have been these four sorts of hearers; and no others are conceivable. So that we may consider the parable as a remarkable prophecy, the accomplishment of which continually proves the truth of the sacred Scripture.

Verses 24-30.

It is not certainly known what is meant by the word rendered tares; but it is evident, that the pulse at present called tares, or weeds, was not intended; otherwise the tares might early and certainly have been known, and eradicated without danger; and if permitted to grow up them, saying, ^bThe kingdom of heaven is likened unto a man which sowed ^cgood seed in his field:

25 But while ^dmen slept, his ^eenemy came and sowed ^ftares among the wheat, and went his way.

26 But ^gwhen the blade was sprung up, and brought forth fruit, then appeared the tares also.

27 So ^hthe servants of the householder came, and said unto him, Sir, didst not thou sow good seed in thy field? from ⁱwhence then hath it tares?

28 He said unto them, An enemy hath done this. The servants said unto him, ^jWilt thou then that we go and gather them up?

29 But he said, Nay; lest while ye gather up the tares, ye root up also the wheat with them.

30 Let ^kboth grow together until the harvest: and in the time of harvest I will say ^lto the reapers, Gather ye together first the tares, ^mand bind them

If we delight in the records of ancient things, and in the revelation of secret things, how welcome should the Gospel be to us, which has in it such antiquity and such mystery! It was from the foundation of the world wrapt up in types and shadows, which are now done away; and those secret things are now become such things revealed, as belong to us and to our children, Deut. 29: 29. 2. The manner of Christ's preaching by parables; wise sayings, but figurative, and which help to engage attention and a diligent search. Solomon's sententious dictates, which are full of similitudes, are called Proverbs or parables; the same word; but in this, as in other things, Behold a greater than Solomon is here, in whom are hid treasures of wisdom!

II. The parable of the tares, and the exposition of it; the exposition explains the parable, and the parable the exposition.

Observe, 1. The disciples' request to have this parable expounded; (v. 36.) Jesus sent the multitude away; and it is to be feared many went away no wiser than they came. It is sad to think how many go away from sermons with the word of grace in their ears, but not the work of grace in their hearts. Christ went into the house, not so much for his own repose, as for particular converse with his disciples, whose instruction He chiefly intended in all his preaching; the disciples laid hold on the opportunity, and came to Him. Note, Those who would be wise, must be wise to discern and improve their opportunities of converse with Christ, of converse with Him alone, in secret meditation and prayer. It is very good to talk over what we have heard, and by familiar discourse to help one another understand and remember it, and be affected with it; we lose the benefit of many a sermon by vain and unprofitable discourse after it. See Luke 24: 32. Deut. 6: 6, 7. It is especially good to ask of ministers the meaning of the Word, for their tips should keep knowledge, Mal. 2: 7. Private conference would contribute much to our profiting by public preaching. Nathan's Thou art the man, was that which touched David to the heart.

The disciples' request was, Declare unto us the parable of the tares. It is probable they apprehended the general scope of the parable, but desired to understand it more particularly, and to be assured that they took it right. Note, Those who are rightly disposed for Christ's teaching, are sensible of their ignorance, and sincerely desirous to be taught. He will teach the humble, (Ps. 25: 8, 9,) but will for this be inquired of. If any man lack instruction, let him ask it of God. Christ had expounded the foregoing parable unasked. Note, The mercies we have received must be improved, both for direction what to pray for, and for our encouragement in prayer. The first light and the first grace are given in a preventing or anticipating way; further degrees of both which must be daily prayed for.

2. The exposition Christ gave; the drift of the parable is, to represent to us the present and future state of the kingdom of heaven, the gospel-church; Christ's care of it, the devil's enmity against it, the mixture that there is in it of good and bad in this world, and the separation between them in the other world. Note The visible church is the kingdom of heaven; though there be many hypocrites in it, Christ rules in it as a King; and there is a remnant in it, that are the subjects and heirs of heaven, from whom, as the better part, it is denominated: the church is the kingdom of heaven on earth.

Let us go over the particulars of the exposition.

He that sows the good seed is the Son of man. Note, Whatever good seed there is in the world it all comes from the hand of Christ, and is of his sowing: truths preached, graces planted, souls sanctified, are good seed, and all owing to Christ. Ministers are instruments in Christ's hand to sow good seed; are employed by Him and under Him, and the success of their labors depends purely on his blessing; so that it may well be said, It is Christ, and no other, that sows the good seed; He is the Son of man, one of us, that his terror might not make us afraid; the Son of man, the Mediator, that has authority.

The field is the world; a large field, capable of bringing forth good fruit; the more is it to be lamented that it brings forth so much bad fruit: the world here is the visible church, scattered all the world over, not confined to one nation. Observe, In the parable it is called his field; the world is Christ's field, for all things are delivered unto Him of the Father: whatever power and interest the devil has in the world, it is usurped and unjust; when Christ comes to take possession, He comes whose right it is; it is his field, and because it is his, He took care to sow it with good seed.

The good seed are the children of the kingdom, true saints. They are, 1. The children of the kingdom; not in profession only, as the Jews were, (ch. 8: 12,) but in sincerity; incorporated in faith and obedience to Jesus Christ, the great King of the church. 2. They are the good seed, precious as seed; (Ps. 126: 6,) the holy seed, Isa. 6: 13. The seed is that from which fruit is expected; what fruit of honor and service God has from this world, He has from the saints, whom He has sowed unto Himself in the earth, Hos. 2: 23.

The tares are the children of the wicked one. Here is the character of sinners, hypocrites, and all profane and wicked people. They are the children of the devil, as a wicked one; they bear his image, do his lusts; he rules over them, he works in them, Eph. 2: 2. John 8: 44. They are tares; but unprofitable in themselves, and hurtful to the good seed: they are weeds in the garden, have the same rain, and sunshine, and soil, with the good plants, but are good for nothing: the tares are among the wheat. Note, God has so ordered it, that good and bad should be mixed together in this world, that the good may be exercised, the bad left inexcusable, and a difference made between earth and heaven.

harvest, they would have been too valuable to be burnt. Some useless noxious weed must therefore be signified, which could not so easily be distinguished from the blade of the wheat.

(25.) Tares. 'A kind of bad and hurtful plant, which spoiled the corn in Palestine, and is unknown in these days.' Quot. in Leigh.—A kind of plant very well known in Palestine; the seed of which was not unlike wheat, and the plant growing from it had the same greenness and stalk as wheat; but it brought forth no fruit, or certainly not good fruit.' (24.) Kingdom of heaven. 'The success of the Gospel's dispensation.' (See ch. 3: 2.)

While men slept. JAHN understands it of a 'nap at noon,' it being common with orientals to sleep in the middle of the day.

Tares. 'Doubtless durnel, a noxious weed which bears a strong resemblance to wheat. "It is well known," says Mr. Forskal, "to the people of Aleppo. It grows among corn. If the seeds remain mixed with the meal, they occasion dizziness to those who eat of the meal." The reapers do not separate the plant; but, after the threshing, they reject the seeds by means of a van or sieve.' Other travellers say, that, in some parts of Syria, it is drawn up by the hand in harvest.

And went his way. 'There is something very expressive in this. He knew the soil; he knew how the seed would take root, and grow. He had only to sow the seed, and let it alone. So Satan knows the soil, which he sows his doctrine. He knows that in the human heart it will take deep and rapid root. It needs but little culture. Grace needs constant attendance and care. Error, and sin, and hypocrisy, are the native products of the human heart; and, when left alone, start up with deadly luxury.

BARNES. (28.) An enemy. 'The envious man.' GENEVAY VERSION. 'It is the interest of Satan to introduce hypocrites and wicked persons into religious societies, in order to discredit the work of God, and favor his own designs.' But in removing them, 'a zeal which is rash and precipitate, is as much to be feared, as the total lack of strict discipline.'

Dr. A. CLARK. (29.) But He said, Nay. 'God judges otherwise than men of the mixture of good and evil in the world: He knows the good which He intends to produce from it, and how to extend his patience with the wicked, in order to their conversion, or the further sanctification of the righteous. Men often persecute a true Christian, intending only to persecute an impious person. "A zeal for the extirpation of heretics and wicked men," said a pious papist, "not regulated by these words of our blessed Savior, allows no time for the one to grow in goodness, or to the other to forsake their evil courses. They are of a spirit very opposite to his, who care not if they root up wheat, provided they can but gather up tares." That zeal which tends to persecute others for religious opinions, is not less a seed of the devil, than is a bad opinion of itself.'

(30.) 'Hersey Christ would not take away the office of the magistrate, in punishing the wicked, (Rom. 13: 4.) nor of the church, in the exercise of discipline, (1 Cor. 5: 7,) but gives to understand that men and discern between the sincere and the hypocrite; then you may say, This is wheat, and that tares.

4. The servants, when they were aware of it, complained to their master; (v. 27.) Sir, didst thou not sow good seed in thy field? No doubt he did; whatever is amiss in the church, we are sure it is not of Christ: considering the seed which Christ sows, we may well ask, with wonder, Whence should these tares come? Note, The rise of errors, the breaking out of scandals, must use prudence therein: and that the hypocrite and wicked cannot be wholly removed; since sometimes they cannot well be distinguished from true believers, as the blasted corn can hardly be distinguished from the good when it first comes up.

Verses 31, 32.

A grain of mustard-seed is one of the least seeds men sow in the fields; yet in deep and rich soils it will produce a plant of very great size; so large, that they who have not seen it, have seldom an adequate conception of the propriety of the similitude. 'There was a stock of mustard-seed in Sichin, from which sprang out three boughs, of which one was broke off, and covered the tent of a potter, and produced three calks of mustard.' R. Simon.—'A stock of mustard-seed was in my field, into which was used to climb, and men do into a fig-tree.' R. Calippa in Whittier.—The author has seen plants of mustard, in the deep and rich soil of some low lands in Lincolnshire, [England,] larger than most shrubs, and almost like a small tree. Probably in the eastern countries, it is the largest plant from the smallest seed, which has yet been noticed. This rendered it peculiarly fit to represent the Gospel-dispensation; which, from very small beginnings, when its poor, unlearned, unarmed, and despised preachers had all the power, wealth, learning, wickedness, and false religion in the world against them, soon grew so large as to overspread whole nations, subvert the deep-rooted foundations of ancient idolatry, and take the place of the Mosaic dispensation; and which are long to fill the whole earth. It also illustrates the effect of the Gospel in any place where it is fully and faithfully dispensed. It begins in 'a day of small things'; but, as one after another is converted, the examples, prayers, and endeavors of this company render it prevalent, and it diffuses its influence all around.

'The kingdom of heaven is like to a grain of mustard-seed.' [This parable is the representation of the progress of the Gospel in the world, and of the growth of grace in the soul. That grace which leads the soul to the fulness of glory, may begin, and often does, in a single good desire—a wish to escape hell, or a desire to enjoy God in heaven.]

(32.) The least:—That is, one of the least, and so small, that it

The enemy that sowed the tares is the devil; a sworn enemy to Christ and all that is good, an enemy to the field of the world, which he endeavors to make his own, by sowing his tares in it. Ever since he became a wicked spirit himself, he has been industrious to promote wickedness, and made it his business therein to counterwork Christ.

Now concerning the sowing of the tares, observe in the parable,

1. That they were sown while men slept. Magistrates, ministers slept, who should have prevented this mischief. Note, Satan watches all opportunities, to propagate vice and profaneness. The prejudice he does to particular persons is when reason and conscience sleep; we have therefore need to be sober, and vigilant. It was in the night. Note, Satan rules in the darkness of this world; that gives him an opportunity to sow tares, Ps. 104:20. It was while men slept; and there is no remedy, for men must have some sleeping time. Note, It is as impossible for us to prevent hypocrites being in the church, as it is for the husbandman, when he is asleep, to hinder an enemy from spoiling his field.

2. The enemy, when he had sown the tares, went his way, (v. 25.) that it might not be known who did it. Note, When Satan is doing the greatest mischief, he studies most to conceal himself; for his design is in danger of being spoiled if he be seen in it; therefore when he comes to sow tares, he transforms himself into an angel of light, 2 Cor. 11:13, 14. He went his way, as if he had done no harm; such is the way of the adulterous woman, Prov. 30:20. Observe, So prone is fallen man to sin, that if the enemy sow the tares, he may even go his way, they will spring up of themselves and do hurt; whereas, when good seed is sown, it must be tended, watered, and fenced, or it will come to nothing.

3. The tares appeared not, till the blades sprung up, and brought forth fruit, v. 26. There is a great deal of wickedness in the hearts of men, which is long hid under the cloak of a plausible profession, but breaks out at last. When a trying time comes, when fruit is to be brought forth, when good is to be done that has difficulty and hazard attending it, then you will return to nothing.

Greatest among herbs. 'Since Jesus had ignorant auditors, whom He nevertheless wished to admonish, on the one hand, of the slow progress of his doctrine, and on the other, of very numerous multitudes of followers, which might be certainly expected: and yet could not always express this without circumlocution; lest by the former He should damp their good-will, and by the latter should seem a boaster, and be thought to utter incredibilities: He therefore propounded certain similitudes, which, when hereafter recalled to their memory, would make them perceive that there was no wonder the thing should be so; for He had predicted it. Such discourses were at length perfectly comprehended by those who knew the event, and saw the vicissitudes of the Christian Church. These too, when they perceived events correspond to the words of Jesus, might easily be convinced of the authority and divine legation of Him, who had so exactly adumbrated all these things.'

Verses 33.

(Luke 13:20, 21.) Leaven is generally used in Scripture, as the emblem of corrupt doctrine, or wickedness; (16:15-12. 1 Cor. 5:6-8. Gal. 5:7-12, &c.) yet here it represents the truth at a grain of God. This circumstance should warn men not to overstrain the emblems and parables of Scripture, or apply them without careful discrimination. The word of God, when received into the heart by the teaching of the Holy Spirit, gradually changes the judgment, affections, conduct, and conversation. Though these were before carnal, sensual, proud, selfish, envious, and ungodly; they now receive a heavenly savor: the thoughts, desires, pursuits, and discourse gradually become humble, and holy, and spiritual: the Christian learns to attend to his worldly affairs, possessions, comforts, and relative duties after a heavenly manner; and this change is progressive, till perfected in heaven.—The former parable represents the kingdom of heaven as set up in the world, this shews us the nature of it as it is set up in the heart.

36 ¶ Then Jesus sent the multitude away, and went into the house: and his disciples came unto him, saying, "Declare unto us the parable of the tares of the field."

38 The field is the world; the good seed are the children of the kingdom; but the tares are the children of the wicked one;

39 The enemy that sowed them is the devil; the harvest is the end of the world; and the reapers are the angels.

(Ps. 49: 1-4. 78: 2.) What the Psalmist spake of himself, when instructing the people under the influence of the Holy Spirit, was also fulfilled, when Christ taught the people by parables: for under these He set before them those deep mysteries, which had been kept secret from the beginning; which neither prophets nor patriarchs had fully understood: and which many would afterwards remember to have heard from Him, when the event had in part developed their meaning. (Morg. Ref.)

(34.) All these things spake Jesus in parables.] "Divine things cannot be taught to man but through the medium of earthly things." "I could speak to us in that language which is peculiar to heaven, clothing those ideas which angelic minds form, how little should we comprehend of the things so described! How great is our privilege in seeing thus taught! Heavenly things in the parables of Christ assume to themselves a body, and thus render themselves palpable."

As the parable of the sower represents what is wrong in the visible church (even where the true Gospel is faithfully preached,) through cd; every man's ground, and seed, and skill, and industry, will be manifested: see Gal. 6: 7, 8. Then they who sowed precious seed, will come again with rejoicing, (Ps. 126: 5, 6.) with the joy of harvest; (Isa. 9: 3.) when the sluggard, who would not plough by reason of cold, shall beg, and have nothing; (Prov. 20: 4.) shall cry, Lord, Lord, but in vain; when the harvest of those who sowed to the flesh, shall be a day of grief and desperate sorrow, Isa. 17: 11.

The reapers are the angels; they shall be employed, in the great day, in executing Christ's righteous sentences, both of approbation and condemnation, ch. 25: 31. The angels are skilful, strong, and swift, obedient servants to Christ, holy enemies to the wicked, and faithful friends to all the saints; therefore fit to be thus employed. He that reapeth receiveth wages, and the angels will not be unpaid for their attendance; for he that soweth, and he that reapeth, shall rejoice together; (John 4: 36.) that is joy in heaven, in the presence of the angels of God.

Hell torments are the fire, into which the tares shall then be cast, and in which they shall be burned. At the great day a distinction will be made, and with it a vast difference; it will be a notable day indeed.

1. The tares will then be gathered out: The reapers shall be charged first to gather out the tares. Though good and bad are together in this world undistinguished, yet at the great day no tares shall be among the wheat; no sinners among the saints: then shall you plainly discern between the righteous and the wicked, Mal. 3: 18. 4: 1. Christ will not bear always, Ps. 50: 1, &c. They shall gather out of his kingdom all wicked things that offend, and all wicked persons that do iniquity: when He begins, He will make a full end. All those corrupt doctrines, worships, and practices, which have offended, shall be condemned by the righteous Judge in that day, and consumed by the brightness of his coming; all the wood, hay, and stubble; (1 Cor. 3: 12.) and then woe to them that do iniquity, that make a trade of it, and persist in it. Perhaps here is an allusion to Zeph. 1: 3. I will consume the stumbling-blocks with the wicked.

2. They will then be bound in bundles, v. 30. Sinners of the same sort will be put together. Those who have been associates in sin, will be so in shame and sorrow; and it will be an aggravation of their misery, as the society of glorified saints will add to their bliss. Let us pray, as David, Lord, gather not my soul with sinners, (Ps. 26: 9.) but let it be bound in the bundle of life with the Lord our God, 1 Sam. 25: 29.

3. They will be cast into a furnace of fire; such will be the end of the wicked; they are fit for nothing but fire; to it they must go. Note, Hell is a furnace of fire, kindled by the wrath of God; and the tares cast into it will be ever in the consuming, but never consumed. But He slides out of the metaphor into a description of those torments that are designed to be set forth by it: There shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth; comfortless sorrow, and an incurable indignation at God, themselves, and one another, will be the endless torture of damned souls. Let us therefore, knowing these terrors of the Lord, be persuaded not to do iniquity.

Heaven is the barn into which all God's wheat shall be gathered in that harvest-day v. 39. Old-Testament saints, and New-Testament saints, not one missing; Gather my saints! (Ps. 50: 5.) particular souls are housed at death as a shock of corn, (Job 5: 26.) but the general-gathering will be at the end of time: God's wheat will then be put together; there will be sheaves of corn, as well as bundles of tares: they will then be secured, and no longer exposed: no longer at a distance, in the field, but near, in the barn. Nay, heaven is a garner (ch. 3: 12.) in which the wheat will not only be separated from the tares of ill companions, but sifted from the chaff of their own corruptions.

In the explanation of th parable, this is gloriously represented; v. 43. First, It is their present honor, that God is their Father. Now are we the sons of God; (1 John 3: 2.) our Father in heaven is King there. Christ, when He went to heaven, went to his Father, and our Father, John 20: 17. It is our Father's house, nay, it is our Father's palace, his throne, Rev. 3: 21. Secondly, The honor in reserve for them is, that they shall shine forth as the sun in that kingdom. Here they are obscure and hidden; (Col. 3: 3.) their weaknesses and infirmities, and the reproach and disgrace cast on them, cloud them; but then they shall shine forth as the sun from behind a dark cloud: their bodies will be made like Christ's glorious body; their sanctification will be perfected, and their justification published; God will own them for his children, and will produce the record of all their services and sufferings for his name: they shall shine as the sun, the most glorious of all visible objects. Those who shine as lights in this world, that God may be glorified, shall shine as the sun in the other world, that they may be glorified. Our Savior concludes as before, with a demand of attention; Who hath ears to hear, let him hear. These are things which it is our happiness to hear of, and our duty to hearken to.

III. The parable of the grain of mustard-seed, v. 31, 32. The scope of this parable is to show that the beginnings of the Gospel would be small, but that its latter end would greatly increase. In this way the gospel-church, the kingdom of God among us, would be set up in the world; in this way the work of grace in the heart, the kingdom of God within us, would be carried on in particular persons.

Now concerning the work of the Gospel, observe,

1. It is commonly very weak and small at first, like a grain of mustard-seed, which is one of the least of all seeds. The kingdom of the Messiah was now but small; Christ only and the apostles. In particular places, the first breaking out of the gospel-light is but as the dawning of the day; and in particular souls, it is at first the day of small things, like a bruised reed. Young converts are like lambs that must be carried in the arms, Isa. 40: 11. There is a little faith, but there is much lacking in it, (1 Thess. 3: 10.) and the groanings such as cannot be uttered, they are so small; a principle of spiritual life, and some motion, but scarcely discernible.

2. Yet it is growing. Christ's kingdom strangely got ground; great accessions were the subtlety of Satan, and the depravity of the human heart; so that of the tares represents the fatal effects of false teachers and doctrine, drawing men off from the truth, or prejudicing them against it.—The counterfeit characters, mentioned, are the genuine produce of false doctrine and distorted views of Christianity, which Satan propagates in the world: even as true believers are the produce of the real Gospel, attended by the influence of the Holy Spirit. The truths contained in these parables are universally interesting, and infinitely important: and every man in the world is concerned to attend to them, as he values the salvation of his soul.

(36.) "Some learned men are of opinion, that the whole of this parable refers to the Jewish state and people: and that the words which are commonly translated the end of the world, should be rendered the end of the age, viz. the end of the Jewish polity. That the words have this meaning in other places, there can be no doubt; and this may be their primary meaning here: but there are other matters in the parable which agree far better with the consummation of all things, than with the end of the Jewish dispensation and polity. See on Mark 1: 29."

Dr. A. CLARKE.

40 As therefore the tares are gathered and burned in the fire: so shall it be in the end of this world.

41 The Son of man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them which do iniquity;

42 And shall cast them into a furnace of fire: there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth.

43 Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father. Who hath ears to hear, let him hear.

[Practical Observations.]

44 ¶ Again, the kingdom of heaven is like made to it: nations born at once, in spite of all opposition. In the soul where grace is true, it will grow really, though perhaps insensibly. A grain of mustard-seed is small, but, however, it is seed, and has in it a disposition to grow. Grace will be getting ground, shining more and more, Prov. 4: 18. Gracious habits confirmed, actions quickened, and knowledge more clear, faith more confirmed, love more inflamed; here is the seed growing.

3. It will at last come to a great degree of strength and usefulness: when it is grown, it becomes a tree, much larger in those countries than in ours. The church, like the vine brought out of Egypt, has taken root, and filled the earth; (Ps. 80: 9-11.) it is like a great tree, in which the fowls of the air lodge; God's people have recourse to it for food and rest, shade and shelter. In particular persons, the principle of grace, if true, will persevere and be perfected at last: growing grace will be strong grace, and bring much to pass. Grown Christians must covet to be useful to others, that those who dwell near or under their shadow, may be the better for them, Hos. 14: 7.

IV. The parable of the leaven, v. 33. The scope of this is much the same with that of the foregoing, to show that the Gospel should prevail and be successful by degrees, but silently and insensibly: the preaching of the Gospel is like leaven, and works like leaven in the hearts of those who receive it.

A woman took this leaven, it was her work. The woman is the weaker vessel, and we have this treasure in such vessels.

The leaven was hid in three measures of meal: leaven among corn unground does not work, nor does the gospel in souls unhumiliated and unbroken for sin: the law grinds the heart, and then the gospel leavens it. It is three measures of meal, a great quantity, for a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump. Our hearts must be broken, and pains taken with them to prepare them for the Word, that they may receive the impressions of it. This leaven must be hid in the heart, (Ps. 119: 11.) not so much for secrecy (for it will show itself) as for safety: our inward thought must be upon it, we must lay it up, as Mary laid up the sayings of Christ, Luke 2: 51. When the woman hides the leaven in the meal, it is with an intention that it should communicate its power to it; so we must treasure up the word in our souls, that we may be sanctified by it, John 17: 17.

The leaven thus hid in the dough, works there, it ferments; the Word is quick and powerful, Heb. 4: 12. The leaven works speedily, so does the Word, and yet gradually. What a sudden change did Elijah's mantle make on Elisha! 1 Kings 19: 20. It works silently and insensibly, (Mark 4: 26.) yet strongly and irresistibly: it does its work without noise, for so is the way of the Spirit, but does it without fail. Hide but the leaven in the dough, and all the world cannot hinder it from communicating its power to it, and yet none sees how it is done, but by degrees the whole is leavened.

Thus it was in the world. The apostles by their preaching, hid a handful of leaven in the great mass of mankind, and it had a strange effect; it put the world into a ferment, in a sense turned it upside down, (Acts 17: 6.) and by degrees made a wonderful change in the condition of it: the savor of the Gospel was manifested in every place, 2 Cor. 2: 14. Rom. 15: 19. It was thus effectual, not by outward force, and therefore not by any such force resistible and conquerable, but by the Spirit of the Lord of hosts, who works and none can hinder.

Thus it is in the heart. When the Gospel comes into the soul, 1. It works a change, not in the substance, the dough is the same, but in the quality; it makes us to savor otherwise than we have done, and other things to savor with us otherwise than they used to do, Rom. 8: 5. 2. It works a universal change; it diffuses itself into all the powers and faculties of the soul, and alters the property even of the members of the body, Rom. 6: 13. 3. This change is such as makes the soul to partake of the nature of the Word, as the dough does of the leaven. We are delivered into it as into a mould, (Rom. 6: 17.) changed into the same image, (2 Cor. 3: 18.) like the impression of the seal on the wax. The gospel savors of God, and Christ, and free grace, and another world, and these things now relish with the soul. It is a word of faith and repentance, holiness and love, and these are wrought in the soul by it. This savor is communicated insensibly, for our life is hid; but inseparably, for grace is a good part that shall never be taken away from those who have it. When dough is leavened, then to the oven; trials and afflictions commonly attend this change; but thus saints are fitted to be bread for our Master's table.

V. 44-52. We have four short parables in these verses:

I. That of the treasure hid in the field. Hitherto He had compared the kingdom of heaven to small things, because its beginning was small; but, lest any should thence take occasion to think meanly of it, in this parable and the

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 24-30, 36-43. Besides the dangers to which men are exposed, even where the good seed is sown, there is also another set of dangers, from the bad seed, which the enemy is continually endeavoring to sow in the same field. Though the servants be watchful, this enemy will find time to work. In the very place where the truth is preached, and while the hearts of people are open to receive it, by false but plausible teachers, Satan takes care to inculcate false sentiments. Often it is one of his arts, in a revival of religion, to spread secretly dangerous notions respecting true piety. Multitudes are persuaded that they are Christians, and are deceived. They are awakened, convicted, and alarmed. They take this for conversion. Or, they find their burden gone; or hear a voice; or a text of Scripture is brought to them, saying their sins are forgiven; or they see Christ, in vision, on the cross; or dream their sins are forgiven—and suppose they are Christians. But none of these things are a conclusive evidence of possessing real religion. All these may be, without true love of God, or Christ, and no real hatred of sin, and change of heart. An enemy may have done it, to deceive them, and to bring dishonor on religion. BARNES.—The devil has often succeeded, in bringing in furious controversies and accursed persecutions, under pretence of opposing and eradicating heresies; and perfect purity must not be expected till we come to heaven. At length, however, an awful separation will be made: and then the angels of our glorious Judge will gather out of his kingdom all that offend and work iniquity, and cast them into a furnace of fire, where shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth. What a dreadful event will this be to the hypocrite and the deceiver, who will perish miserably with all those, who have been stumbled, prejudiced, deceived, and hardened by them! But, what a blessed event will this be for the true believer, who will then shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of his Father! May this be our happy case, and may increasing numbers consider these things for their good!

SCOTT.

(41.) His angels.] The reader will observe the high idea our Lord here gives them of Himself, when He speaks of the angels as his attendants, who were at the last day to wait on Him, and at his order to assemble the whole world before Him.

[That offend.] Properly stumbling-blocks, or impediments; also, metaphorically, whatever makes any one stumble or fall in his Christian principles. Here it plainly signifies not things but persons. Campbell renders it seducers. It denotes false teachers, such as are censured by Peter and Jude, who, under the semblance of Christian liberty, inculcated doctrines repugnant to natural virtue, and held it among things indifferent.

(42.) Furnace of fire.] An allusion to the oriental custom of burning alive, mentioned by Daniel 3: 10, where Theodotus translates the Hebrew into the same Greek words used here, as does also the Septuagint, at v. 11. These expressions, however, are not to be taken literally. For the wicked will have no longer flesh and blood; they can neither be burned, nor gnash with the teeth, &c. We are to in-derstand the words metaphorically. Euthymius judiciously points out that it denotes misery not to be expressed by human language. Punishments are meant, as exquisite in degree, as burning is to our present bodies.

Verse 44. The nature of the 'kingdom of heaven,' as it is set up in the world and in the heart, and as it is counteracted by human depravity and by false doctrine, has been shown: here, its privileges and blessings, and the way in which we obtain admission into it, are illustrated. In this view, 'the kingdom of heaven' is like an immense 'treasure, concealed in a field.' This represents the invaluable blessings of the Gospel, which suffice to render us rich and happy to all eternity: these are contained in the sacred Scriptures; yet multitudes have access to them, without being aware of the unsearchable riches they contain. But when a man is brought to a proper sense of his own character, state, and wants, and becomes in earnest about eternal life, he begins to search the word of God with greater diligence and care; and thus dis-unto treasure hid in a field; the which when a man hath found he hideth, and, for joy thereof, goeth and sell-eth all that he hath, and buyeth that field.

5:19.) have discovered such a treasure in this field, as makes it infinitely more valuable.

Those who discern this treasure in the field, and value it aright, will never be easy till they have made it their own. He that has found this treasure, hides it, which denotes a holy jealousy, lest we come short, (Heb. 4:1.) looking diligently, (Heb. 12:15.) lest Satan come between us and it. He rejoices in it, that he is in a fair way to have an interest in Christ; that the matter is in treaty: their hearts may rejoice, who are yet but seeking the Lord, Ps. 105:3. He resolves to buy this field for the sake of the unseen treasure in it. And so intent he is on it, that he sells all to buy this field: they who would have saving benefit by Christ, must be willing to part with all, that they may make it sure to themselves; must count every thing but loss, that they may win Christ, and be found in him.

II. That of the pearl of price, (v. 45, 46.) which is to the same purport with the former, of the treasure. The dream is thus doubled, for the thing is certain.

Note, 1. All men are busy, seeking goodly pearls: one would be rich, another honorable, another learned; but most are imposed on, and take up with counterfeits for pearls.

2. Jesus Christ is a Pearl of great price, a Jewel of inestimable value, which will make those who have it rich, truly rich, rich toward God: in having next He represents it as of great value in itself, and of great advantage to those who embrace it; it is here likened to a treasure hid in the field, which, if we will, we may make our own.

Jesus Christ is the true Treasure; in Him is all fulness; (Col. 1:19. John 1:16.) treasures of wisdom and knowledge, (Col. 2:3.) of righteousness, grace, and peace; these are laid up for us in Christ; and, if we have an interest in Him, it is all our own.

The gospel is the field in which this treasure is hid. In gospel-ordinances it is hid as the milk in the breast, the marrow in the bone, the manna in the dew; as the water in the well; (Isa. 12:3.) as the honey in the honey-comb. It is hid, not in a garden inclosed, or a spring shut up, but in a field, an open field; whoever will, let him come, and search the Scriptures; let him dig in this field, Prov. 2:4.

It is a great thing to discover the treasure hid in this field, and the unspeakable value of it; the richest mines are often in grounds that appear most barren; and therefore many will not so much as go for the field, much less come up to the price. What is thy beloved more than another beloved? What is the Bible more than other good books? The gospel of Christ more than Plato's philosophy, or Confucius' morals? But those who have searched the Scriptures, so as in them to find Christ and eternal life, (John

Him, we have enough to make us happy here and forever.

3. A true Christian is a spiritual merchant, that does not take up with any thing short of an interest in Christ, and, as one that is resolved to be spiritually rich, trades high: He went and bought that pearl; did not only bid for it, but purchased it. What will it avail us to know Christ, if we do not know Him as ours, made to us Wisdom? 1 Cor. 1:30.

4. Those who would have a saving interest in Christ, must be willing to part with all for Him. Whatever stands in opposition to Christ, or in competition with Him, we must cheerfully quit, though ever so dear to us. A man may buy gold too dear, but not this Pearl of price.

III. That of the net cast into the sea, v. 47-49. The parable itself. Where note, The world is a vast sea, and the children of men are things creeping innumerable, both small and great, in that sea, Ps. 104:25. Men in their natural state are like the fishes of the sea that have no ruler over them, Hab. 1:14. The preaching of the gospel is the casting of a net into this sea, to catch something. Ministers are fishers of men, employed in casting and drawing this net; and then they speed, when at Christ's word they let down the net; otherwise, they toil and catch nothing. This net gathers of every kind, trash and rubbish, as well as fish. There is a time coming when this net will be full, and drawn to the shore; a set time when the Gospel shall have fulfilled that for which it was sent, and we are sure it shall not return void, Isa. 65:10, 11. The net is now filling, and will be drawn to shore, when the mystery of God shall be finished. When the net is full, and drawn to the shore, there shall be a separation between the good and bad that were gathered in it. Hypocrites and true Christians shall then be parted; the good shall be gathered, but the bad cast away; and miserable is the condition of those who are cast away in that day. While the net is in the sea, it is not known what is in it, the fishermen themselves cannot distinguish; but they carefully draw it, and all that is in it, to the shore, for the sake of the good that is in it. Such is God's care for the visible church, and such should ministers' concern be for those under their charge, though they are mixed.

covering the treasure, resolves at any rate to obtain it. He renounces all hopes, claims, pursuits, interests, or pleasures, which are incompatible with salvation. Nothing indeed can be given as the price of this salvation, yet much must be given up for the sake of it. This is implied by purchasing the field. The person who is thus decided, does not conclude that salvation belongs to him, because he has heard and assented to the Gospel. He rejoices, that he has found such a treasure, even before he can call it his own; but he knows that he must go to the price of the whole religion of the Scriptures, and receive it with all its aspects, if he would be saved and enriched by Him.—Thus he enters the kingdom, and obtains possession of its privileges; and when he has purchased the field, and begins to examine the treasure, he finds it is like a mine of gold, which is more and more rich, the longer it is wrought, and the more deeply it is penetrated. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Prov. 2:3-5. 23:23.)

Kingdom of heaven.) 'The blessings of religion.' ROSENMULLER. Treasure hid.) 'That is, hidden treasure, a gold or silver mine, which he who found out, could not get at, or work, without turning up the field, and for this purpose bought it.' HIDEIT. 'He kept it secret, till the discovery to no person till he had justly the field.' 'Our Lord's meaning seems to be this: The kingdom of heaven—the salvation provided by the Gospel—is like a treasure—something of inestimable worth—hidden in a field; it is a rich mine, the veins of which run in all directions in the sacred Scriptures; therefore the field must be dug up, the records of salvation diligently and carefully turned over, and searched: which, when a man hath found, he keeps secret—ponders the matter deeply in his heart; examines the preciousness of the treasure, and counts the cost of purchase: for joy thereof—finding that this salvation is just what his needy soul requires, and what will make him presently and eternally happy, he goes and sells all that he hath—renounces his sins, abandons his evil companions, and relinquishes all hope of salvation, through his own righteousness; and purchases that field—not merely buys the book for the sake of the salvation it describes, but, by the blood of the covenant, buys gold tried in the fire, white raiment, &c.; in a word, pardon and purity, which he receives from God, for the sake of Jesus. We should consider the salvation of God, 1. As our only treasure, and value it above all the riches in the world. 2. Search for it in the Scriptures, till we fully understand its worth and excellence. 3. Deeply ponder it in the secret of our souls. 4. Part with all we have in order to get it. 5. Place our whole joy and deliverance in it; and, 6. Be always convinced that it must be bought, and that no price is accepted for it out the blood of the covenant; the sufferings and death of our only Lord and Savior, Jesus Christ.'

'In the under parts of our Savior's parables, there is sometimes the appearance of immoral tendency; as in the commendation bestowed on the unjust steward. Here, it seems against the principles of equity for a man to conceal from the possessor the unknown value of a field, accidentally discovered, that he might purchase it himself at an under-price.—But, with common sense only as a commentator on such passages, we perceive, that the instruction is not meant to be conveyed in under-parts, and trivial circumstances: but in the general scope only of the whole parable.'

GILPIN. On this passage, however, Wetstein observes, that 'the savorious were accustomed to bury their treasure in the earth, when they feared the invasion of an enemy.' And it is remarked by Bloomfield, from Rosenmuller, that 'the right of "treasure trove" is doubtful. Nevertheless, we learn from this passage, as from rabbinic authority also, that the Jewish law adjudged the treasure to the buyer of a field, not the seller.'

Verses 45, 46.

This parable is nearly of the same import as the preceding; but the former represents all spiritual blessings, as they are communicated to us through the Scriptures; this exhibits them, as they are laid up in Christ, to whom the Scriptures direct us for them.—Every man is 'a merchant seeking goodly pearls': all men seek happiness, and each deems his favorite object a precious jewel. But when the convinced sinner discovers the glory and preciousness of Christ, as the all-gracious Savior of the lost, he sees Him to be indeed 'the Pearl of great price,' and all things else comparatively worthless. Whatever it may cost him, he is determined to purchase this invaluable Pearl, which will surely enrich the possessor to all eternity: and if he obtain not this prize, he sees that eternal misery is his portion. He therefore counts all things but loss, that he may win Christ; and being determined rather to part with riches, reputation, liberty, or even life, than deny the Savior; and giving up all other pleasures and hopes, but those that arise from his person, undertaking sufferings, and mediation; he obtains admission into the kingdom, and to the participation of all its blessings.

SCOTT. (46.) 'In this, as in the preceding parable, (v. 45.) Jesus commends the excellence of his religion and the happiness connected with it, as being so great, that he who has once tasted it, will henceforth despise all the perishable interests and pleasures of this life, and pursue it most studiously.'

ROSENMULLER. 'The original word translated merchant, means a travelling trader. Such persons took long journeys for the purpose of buying, selling, or exchanging goods. These petty "merchants," was very supple, were not dissimilar to our pedlars; and by them much of the traffic of ancient times was carried on.'

ROSENMULLER.

47 ¶ Again, the kingdom of heaven is like unto a net that was cast into the sea, and gathered of every kind;

48 Which, when it was full, they drew to shore, and sat down, and gathered the good into vessels but cast the bad away.

49 So shall it be at the end of the world: the angels shall come forth, and sever the wicked from among the just;

2. The explanation of the latter part of the parable: the latter part refers to that which is yet to come, and is therefore more particularly explained, v. 49, 50. So shall it be at the end of the world: then, and not till then, will the dividing, discovering lay be. We must not look for the net full of all good fish. See here, 1. The distinguishing of the wicked from the righteous. The angels of heaven shall come forth to sever the wicked from among the just; 2. The doom of the wicked when they are thus severed. They shall be cast into the furnace. Note, Everlasting misery and sorrow will certainly be the portion of those who live among sanctified ones, but themselves die unsanctified. This is the same with what we had before, v. 42. Note, Christ Himself preached often of hell-torments, as the everlasting punishment of hypocrites; and it is good for us to be often reminded of this awakening, quickening truth.

IV. That of the good-householder, which is intended to rivet all the rest.

The occasion of it was the proficiency the disciples had made in learning, and their profiting by this sermon in particular. 1. He asked them, Have ye understood all these things? intimating, that He was ready to explain what they did not understand. Note, It is the will of Christ, that all those who read and hear the Word should understand it. It is therefore good for us, when we have read or heard the Word, to examine ourselves, or to be examined, whether we have understood it or not. It is no disparagement to the disciples of Christ to be catechized. Christ invites us to seek to Him for instruction, and ministers should proffer their service to those who have any good question to ask concerning what they have heard. 2. They answered Him, Yea, Lord: and we have reason to believe they said true, because, when they did not understand, they asked for an explication, v. 36. And the exposition of that parable was a key to the rest. Note, The right understanding of one good sermon, will help us to understand another; for good truths mutually explain and illustrate one another; and knowledge is easy to him that understandeth.

The scope of the parable itself was to give his approbation and commendation of their proficiency. Note, Christ is ready to encourage willing learners in his school, though they are but weak.

He commends them as scribes instructed unto the kingdom of heaven. They were now learning that they might teach, and the teachers among the Jews were the scribes. Ezra, who prepared his heart to teach in Israel, is called a ready scribe. Ezra 7: 6, 10. Now a skilful faithful minister of the Gospel is a scribe too; but for distinction, he is called a scribe instructed unto the kingdom of heaven, well versed in the things of the Gospel, and well able to teach those things. Note, 1. Those who are to instruct others, have need to be well instructed themselves. If the priest's lips must keep knowledge, his head must first have knowledge. 2. The instruction of a gospel minister must be in the kingdom of heaven, as that about which his business lies. A man may be a great philosopher and politician, and yet, if not instructed to the kingdom of heaven, he will make but a bad minister.

He compares them to a good householder, who brings forth out of his treasure things new and old; fruits of last year's growth and this year's gathering, abundance and variety, for the entertainment of his friends, Cant. 7: 13. See here, 1. What should be a minister's furniture, a treasure of things new and old. Those who have so many and various occasions, need to stock themselves well in their gathering-days, that the man of God may be thoroughly furnished; (2 Tim. 3: 16, 17.) and we must not content ourselves with old discoveries, but must be adding new. Live and learn. 2. What we should make of this furniture; he should bring forth: laying up is in order to laying out. You are to lay up, but not for yourselves. Many are full, but have no vent; (Job 32: 19.) have a talent, but bury it: such are unprofitable servants; Christ himself received; that He might give; so must we, and we shall have more. In bringing forth things, new and old do best together; old truths, but new methods and expressions, especially new affections.

V. 53-58. We have here Christ in his own country. His own countrymen had rejected Him once, yet He came to them again. Note, Christ does not take refusers at their first word, but repeats his offers to those who have often repulsed them. In this, as in other things, Christ was like his brethren; He had a natural affection to his own country; Every one loves his country, observes Seneca, not because it is beautiful, but because it is his own. His treatment this time was much the same as before, scornful and spiteful.

Observe,

I. How they expressed their contempt of Him. When he taught them in their synagogue, they were astonished; looking on Him as unlikely to be such a teacher. Two things they upbraided Him with:

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 31-35, 44-50. In attempting to do good by scriptural means, and in dependence on the grace of our Lord, we have firm ground of hope, that from small beginnings a large increase will arise, perhaps after our decease. We ought not, therefore, in respect of individuals or ourselves, to despise the day of small things. As eternal life is set before us in the Scripture, may we highly prize and diligently search that sacred book, that we may become acquainted with its invaluable contents, and do what we can to communicate the blessing to all others likewise. Let us also, be very circumspect, that we do not come short of the felicity to which it directs us. And as all the salvation of God is laid up in Christ, our great Prophet, Priest, and King, let us fix our attention on Him, as the great subject of the sacred Word; and determine by the grace of God, to part with all that we have, that we may be made possessors of this inestimable treasure. He who is willing to do this, will never come short of salvation, though he may often fear it; but he that prefers any thing to Christ, will not obtain his 'unsearchable riches,' though he may often be confident that he shall. Numbers of this description, besides those multitudes of professed Christians, concerning whose character no competent judge can be deceived, will find themselves mistaken, when the grand discrimination shall be made. Yet ministers have abundant encouragement to go on with patience and diligence in their work: for 'he that winneth souls is wise,' and in this respect, they will also find at last, that 'their labor was not in vain in the Lord.'

SCOTT.

Verses 47-50.

This parable seems to comprise the meaning of the parables of the sower and the tares, under an allusion to those things, about which several of the apostles had been most conversant.

SCOTT.

(50.) Gnashing of teeth. 'Since what is here spoken of is supposed to pass in a furnace of fire, it is strange any should have imagined, that the original phrase signifies the knocking, or as we commonly say, gnashing of teeth, through excess of cold. Yet from this, some have been weak enough to argue, that, (according to the Malabarian notion) the alternate extremities of heat and cold should constitute 'the torment of the damned.' See Abp. Dawes' sermons on hell. Sermon. liii. p. 14.

Verses 51, 52.

Our Lord seems to have spoken these latter parables to his disciples, apart from the multitude; and He demanded of them, whether they understood the things intended by them. To which they answered, (perhaps too confidently) that they did: yet probably they had a general apprehension of his meaning, as there was no immediate reference to his sufferings and death; for they were far more ignorant and prejudiced in favor of his priestly office, than about any other subject. He therefore concluded the whole with another parable, immediately relating to their office in the church. The apostles and other ministers, were to be the teachers. Every one of them, therefore, ought to be 'a scribe well instructed' in all things pertaining to 'the kingdom of heaven.' This He represented to them under the similitude of a householder, who has a large family to provide for, who will take care to have a stock of provisions in hand for their supply, to which he will be adding continually what he judges to be useful or useful. They in like manner should carefully treasure up all that they had learned, and add to their fund of knowledge continually, deriving fresh instruction from all they heard, saw or experienced. Then they would be able to lead the people forward in knowledge, as they made progress themselves. Some reference may also be had to the old and new dispensations. They ought to be different, who have not only to be wise for themselves, but to dispense the wisdom of God to others.' Ezra dom of heaven, is like unto a man that is an householder, which bringeth forth out of his treasure things new and old.

53 ¶ And it came to pass, that when Jesus had finished these parables, he departed thence.

54 And when he was come into his own country, he taught them in their synagogue, inasmuch that they were astonished, and said, Whence hath this man this wisdom, and these mighty works?

55 Is not this the carpenter's son? is not his mother called Mary? and his brethren, James, and Joses, and Simon, and Judas?

1. His want of a technical education. They owned that he had wisdom, and did mighty works; but the question was, Whence He had it. For they knew He was not brought up at the feet of their rabbins; had never been at the university, nor taken his degree, nor was called of men, Rabbi, Rabbi. Note, Mean and prejudiced spirits are apt to judge of men by their education, and to inquire more into their rise than into their reasons. 'Whence has this man these mighty works?' Thus they turned that against Him, which was really for Him; for if they had not been wilfully blind, they must have concluded Him to be divinely assisted and commissioned, who, without the help of education, gave such proofs of extraordinary wisdom and power.

2. The meanness and poverty of his relations, v. 55, 56.

They upbraided Him with his father. Is not this the carpenter's son? Yes, it is true He was reputed so: and what harm in that? No disparagement to Him to be the son of an honest tradesman. They remember not (though they might have known it) that this carpenter was of the house of David, (Luke 1: 27.) a son of David; (ch. 1: 20.) though a carpenter, yet a person of honor. Those who are willing to pick quarrels will overlook what is worthy and deserving, and fasten on that only which seems mean. Some sordid spirits regard no branch, no, not the Branch from the stem of Jesse, (Isa. 11: 1.) if it be not the top-branch.

They upbraided Him with his mother; and what quarrel have they with her? Why, truly, his mother is called Mary, and that was a very own country, and in his own house.

58 And he did not many mighty works there, because of their unbelief.

common name, and they all knew her, and knew her to be an ordinary person; she was called Mary, not Queen Mary, nor Lady Mary, but plain Mary; and this is turned to his reproach, as if men had nothing to be valued by but foreign extraction, noble birth, or splendid titles; poor things to measure worth by.

They upbraided him with his brethren, whose names they knew, and had them ready enough to serve this turn; James, and Joses, and Simon, and Judas, good men but poor men, and therefore despised; and Christ for their sakes. These brethren, it is probable, were Joseph's children by a former wife; or whatever their relation was to Him, they seem to have been brought up with Him in the same family. And therefore of the calling of three of these, who were of the twelve, to that honor (James Simon, and Jude, the same with Thaddæus) we read not particularly, because they need not such an express call to acquaintance with Christ, who had been the companions of his youth.

His sisters too are all with us; they should therefore have loved Him and respected Him the more, because He was one of themselves, but therefore they despised Him. They were offended in him: they stumbled at these stumbling-stones, for He was set for a Sign that should be spoken against, Luke 2: 34. Isa. 8: 14.

Things new and old.] 'New things and old.' CAMPBELL. 'These words are spoken according to the dialect of the schools, where the question was not seldom started,—what wine, what corn, or fruits, were to be used in the holy things, and in some rites new or more old, namely of the present year, or the years past? But now, a thrifty man, provident of his own affairs, was stored both with the one and the other; prepared for either, as should be required. So it becomes a simile of the Gospel, to have all things in readiness, to bring forth according to the nature of the thing, of the place, and of the hearers.' LIGHTFOOT.

On another occasion, Jesus went to Nazareth, (called his own country, because he was there brought up,) and taught in the synagogue; thus giving the inhabitants an additional opportunity of hearing his doctrine, and seeking the benefit of those miracles, concerning which they must have heard many surprising accounts. (Luke 4: 16-30.) And indeed the authority and wisdom, with which He spake, astonished his former neighbors, and led them to inquire, where He had obtained this wisdom and miraculous power. Probably, they did not know, that He was born at Bethlehem, and of the family of David.—By comparing several passages in the gospels, (Marg. Ref. v. a.) it appears, that Mary, the wife of Cleophas, was the sister of Mary, the mother of Jesus; and that James and Joses were her sons. According to the common way of speaking, being such near relations, they are called brethren, especially as they seem to have lived much together; and it is probable, that the others here mentioned were either the children of Cleophas and Mary, or some others standing in the same near relation to our Lord. But some think that they were Joseph's children by a former wife. They were, however, well known at Nazareth, as persons in a low and poor condition, who were nearly related to Jesus; and this proved an occasion of stumbling to the proud and prejudiced inhabitants.—On this occasion our Lord observed, that 'a prophet was not without honor, except in his own country, and among his own relations.' Those, who have most known and conversed with the man, are least disposed to respect the prophet. He is thought to take too much upon him, in authoritatively addressing their consciences; they are displeased with his pretensions, and the credit which he acquires; and various circumstances of no importance, respecting his former occupations and appearance, recur to their memory, and prejudice them against all he says.—The unbelief of the Nazarenes, however, precluded them from sharing the benefit of our Lord's power and grace: few came to Him for healing, and He did not think it consistent with his wisdom and dignity, to perform his miracles and presence upon them: so He retired, and left them to their prejudices; and, as far as we can tell, went among them no more. (Mark 8: 1-6.) SCOTT.

(54.) His own country.] 'No doubt, Nazareth is to be understood. For, though He had two other homes, namely, Bethlehem, where He was born, and Capernaum, where He dwelt, He is never said to have come to Bethlehem. It follows therefore that this must be understood of Nazareth.'

'They considered Him as guilty of an usurpation, in assuming the character of a prophet, much more in aspiring to the title of the Messiah, to whom the people were accustomed to look up.'

Whence hath this man this wisdom? A question we may well ask, as did the Jews, but with another spirit. What education had Jesus, what patterns to form Himself upon, to become the man He was? By what train of thinking could He conceive, by what prospects be moved to undertake, by what power accomplish the unparalleled things He did? To imagine that such a person could have existed by accident, is monstrously unreasonable. But to have also fallen by accident into just that country, where was a system of religion He could build on, with predictions applicable to Himself; and at a period when He was so pointed out, as to raise an universal expectation; that under all disadvantages of condition, He could make and maintain the highest claims, interpret the ancient oracles in a sublimer, juster sense than the most learned instructors of the people, and have the self-will to prefer, in consequence, persecution and crucifixion before the splendor of offered dominion, or the safety of a private station; that all these things (and others equally strange) should meet in the same person, without the special appointment of heaven, exceeds all power of chance. Considered but as a man, He appears the greatest and best of men. His reasonable doctrines, cool temper, composed and familiar conversation, prove He was no enthusiast. The unvaried goodness of his life, and willing suffering of death, with no worldly advantage to attain by the course He took, fully prove He was no impostor. What must He then have been? And from his whole behavior what can we gather, but what the spectators did from the finishing scene on the cross, 'Truly this was the Son of God!' Matt. 28: 54.

V. 51-58. If we would be 'scribes instructed unto the kingdom of heaven,' we must be always learners. Our place is at Christ's feet; we must daily learn the old lessons over again, and new lessons also: and we must seek to have an increasing fund of knowledge and wisdom, the result of study, experience, and observation, that we may render old subjects attractive and interesting, by new elucidations and applications.

Let none wonder if faithful and able ministers are regarded with contempt and enmity, even where they labor most to do the affront, or expressing an offence at it, He mildly imputes it to the common humor of the children of men, to undervalue excellences that are cheap, and common, and home-bred. It is usually so, v. 57. Note, 1. Prophets should have honor paid them, and commonly have; men of God are great men, men of honor, and challenge respect. It is strange indeed if prophets have not honor. 2. Notwithstanding this, they are commonly least regarded and revered in their own country, nay, and sometimes most envied. Familiarity breeds contempt.

2. It did for the present, (to speak with reverence,) in effect, tie his hands; He did not many mighty works there because of their unbelief. Note, Unbelief is the great obstruction to Christ's favors. All things are in general possible to God, (ch. 19: 26.) but it is to him that believes as to the particulars, Mark 9: 23. The gospel is the power of God unto salvation, but it is to every one that believes, Rom. 1: 16. So that if mighty works be not wrought in us, it is not for want of power or grace in Christ, but for want of faith in us. By grace ye are saved, and that is a mighty work, but it is through faith, Eph. 2: 8.

CHAP. XIV. v. 1-12. We have here the story of John's martyrdom. Observe,

1. The occasion of relating it here, v. 1, 2. 1. The account brought to Herod of the miracles Christ wrought. At that time, when his countrymen slighted Him, He began to be famous at court. Note, God will honor those that are despised for his sake. Christ had now been preaching and working miracles above two years; yet it should seem, Herod had not heard of Him till now, and now only heard the fame of Him. Note, It is the unhappiness of the great ones of the world, that they are most out of the way of hearing the best things, (1 Cor. 2:

8.) which none of the princes of this world knew 1 Cor. 1: 25.

2. The construction he puts on this; (v. 2.) He said to his servants, As sure as we are here, this is John the Baptist, he is risen from the dead. Either the leaven of Herod was not Sadducism; (Acts 23: 8.) or else Herod's guilty conscience (as is usual with atheists) got at this time the mastery of his opinion; and now he concluded, whether there be a general resurrection or no, that John Baptist is certainly risen, and therefore mighty works do shew forth themselves in him. John, while he lived, did no miracle; (John 10: 41.) but Herod concludes, that, being risen from the dead, he is clothed with a greater power than he had while living. Observe here concerning Herod,

How he was disappointed in what he intended by beheading John. He thought, if he could get that troublesome fellow out of the way, he might go on in his sins, undisturbed and uncontrolled; yet no sooner is that effected, than he hears of Jesus and his disciples preaching the same pure doctrine John preached; and, which is more, even the disciples confirming it by miracles in their Master's name. Note, Ministers may be silenced, and imprisoned, and banished, and slain, but the Word of God cannot be run down. The prophets live not forever, but the Word takes hold, Zech. 1: 5, 6. See 2 Tim. 2: 9. Sometimes God raises up many faithful ministers out of the ashes of one. This hope there is of God's trees, though they be cut down, Job 14: 7-9.

How he was filled with causeless fears, merely from the guilt of his own conscience. Thus blood cries, from the heart of him that shed it and makes him a terror to himself. Thus the wicked flee when none pursue; (Prov. 28: 1.) and are in great fears, where no fear is, Ps. 14: 5. Herod, by a little inquiry, might have found, that this Jesus was in being long before John good, or where they might be supposed to possess the greatest influence. It is a general case, that the truths spoken are at first disregarded, in proportion as the speaker is known, even where there is no reason for it in his character and conduct for the carnal heart is glad of any pretence for rejecting the spiritual Word of God. Thus, whilst the servant of the Lord loses his labor, and is treated with contempt, men lose the benefit of the Gospel, yea, lose their own souls, and the power and grace of the Savior are of no avail as to them, 'because of their unbelief.'

NOTES.

CHAP. XIV. John the Baptist had said concerning Christ, He must increase, but I must decrease, John 3: 30. The morning-star is here disappearing, and the Sun of righteousness rising to his meridian lustre. Thus He went forth, thus He went on, conquering and to conquer, or rather, curing and to cure.

Verses 1, 2.

(Marg. Ref.) John was not cast into prison, till some considerable time after Jesus had entered on his public ministry. (John 3: 22-36. 4: 1-4.) It is supposed, that John lay above a year in prison; and some time must have passed after his death, before Herod could conclude that he was risen again. We may therefore suppose that more years had elapsed after Christ's baptism, than harmonizers in general make out.—Herod is called 'the tetrarch,' and afterwards 'the king.' (9.) He was the son of Herod the Great, whose dominions were divided into four parts among his sons after his decease; as the word tetrarch implies: Judea, one fourth in this division, soon fell under the rule of a Roman governor as a province of that empire, and other alterations shortly took place. Herod, however, who was surnamed Antipas, was allowed to hold his tetrarchy; in which he was as much a king, as his father had been, only his dominions were smaller. Some think, that he was a Sadducee, because what is called the leaven of the Sadducees, is elsewhere called the leaven of Herod. (16: 6. Mark 8: 15.) It is most wonderful, that Herod and his courtiers should not have known of our Lord's preaching and miracles, at an earlier period, especially as He spent most of his time in Galilee. Some think, that Herod had been absent at Rome, during the former part of our Lord's ministry; but if this were so, his nobles and counsellors had not all been absent likewise. Others think, that he at this time attended to the report, because Christ had just sent forth his disciples, to work miracles in his name. But the supposition, that Jesus was John the Baptist risen from the dead, implies that Herod never heard of Him before, or known that such a person existed; for how could He, who had lived about thirty years in Galilee, be John the Baptist, who a short time before had been put to death? In fact, nothing can solve the difficulty, but the consideration of the general depravity which persons in high rank show to the concerns of religion, and the astonishing ignorance in which most of them remain, of what goes forward in that respect. Thus circumstanced, neither his immoral character, nor his Sadducean principles, could preserve him from delusion, on recollecting his conduct in beheading John the Baptist; and, without much examination, he was led to concur with those, who said it was John risen from the dead. Nor could this haughty prince conceal from his own servants, his terrors and convictions; fearing probably that John, thus risen, would soon come and avenge his death on his murderers. Herod, as a Sadducee, under the momentary impression, lost sight of his principles, that there was no resurrection, nor angel, nor spirit, into whatever agency he ultimately resolved the powers, which wrought the effects.

ED.

(2.) 'The words of Luke, (9: 9.) admit the following meaning: 'I know not what to think: some say it is John the Baptist; but John, whom I beheaded, can it then be he?' This state of hesitation and demur is quite reconcilable with the words of Matthew, when properly interpreted. These words, though they appear to contain an assertion, yet (I think) were not meant to assert, but imply doubt. Herod was only a follower of the political, not the religious dogmas of the Sadducees. He probably thought and cared very little about religion; yet his mind was by no means made up. As far as Herod believed the re-appearance, he supposed it a reviviscence of John's body.'

offspring by this woman; and it was an aggravation of the wrong, that he was his brother, his half-brother by the father, but not by the mother. See Ps. 50: 20. For this sin John reproved him in plain terms, It is not lawful for thee to have her. He charges it on him as a sin. Note, 1. That which is unlawful to other people, is unlawful to the greatest of men. They who rule over men must not forget that they are themselves but men, and subject to God. There is no prerogative, for the most arbitrary kings, to break the laws of God. 2. If princes and great men break the law of God, it is very fit they should be told of it. As they are not above the commands of God's word, so they are not above the reproofs of his ministers. It is not fit indeed to say to a king, Thou art Belial, (Job 34: 18.) any more than to call a brother Raca, or Thou fool. But it is fit that, by those whose office it is, they should be told what is unlawful, and told with application. Thou art the man; for God accepteth not the persons of princes, nor regardeth the rich more than the poor.

2. The imprisonment of John for his faithfulness, v. 3. Note, Faithful reproofs, if they do not profit, usually provoke, and are resented as affronts; they that will not bow to the reproof, will fly in the face of the reprover and hate him, as Ahab hated Micaiah, 1 Kings 22: 8. See Prov. 9: 8. 15: 10. 12. Truth produces hatred. It is no new thing for God's ministers to suffer ill for doing well. Troubles abide those most that are most diligent and faithful in doing their duty. Acts 20: 20, 23. It was so with the Old-Testament prophets, see 2 Chron. 16: 10. 24: 20, 21. Perhaps some of John's friends would blame him as indiscreet in reproving Herod, and tell him he had better be silent than provoke Herod, whose character he knew very Baptist's death, and therefore could not be John, restored to life, and so might have undeceived himself; but God justly left him to this infatuation.

How, notwithstanding this, he was hardened in his wickedness; for though convinced that John was a prophet, and owned of God, yet he expresses not the least remorse or sorrow for his sin in putting him to death. The devils believe and tremble, but they never believe and repent. Note, There may be the terror of strong convictions, where there is not the truth of a saving conversion.

II. The story itself. As the first Old-Testament saint, so the first New-Testament minister, died a martyr. And if Christ's forerunner was thus treated, let not his followers expect to be caressed by the world. Observe here,

1. John's faithfulness in reproving Herod, v. 3, 4. Herod was one of John's hearers, (Mark 6: 20.) and therefore John might be the more bold with him. Note, Ministers, who are reprovers by office, are especially obliged to reprove those that are under their charge; they have the fairest opportunity of dealing with them, and with them may expect the most favorable acceptance.

The particular sin he reproved him for, was, marrying his brother Philip's wife. Here was a complication of wickedness, adultery, and incest, beside the wrong done to Philip, who had well: but away with that discretion that would hinder men from doing their duty as magistrates, ministers, or Christian friends; I believe John's own heart did not reproach him for it, but this testimony of his conscience made his bonds easy, that he suffered for well-doing, and not as a busy-body in other men's matters, 1 Pet. 4: 15.

3. The restraint Herod lay under from venting his rage against John, v. 5.

(1.) He would have put him to death. Perhaps that was not intended at first, but his revenge by degrees boiled up to that height. Note, The way of sin, especially the sin of persecution, is down-hill; and when once a respect to Christ's ministers is cast off and broken, though in one instance, that is at length done, which the man would sooner have thought himself a dog than to have been guilty of, 2 Kings 8: 13.

(2.) That which hindered him, v. 5. It was not because he feared God, or John, though formerly he had had a reverence for him, but because he feared the people; he was afraid for his own safety, and the safety of his government. Note, 1. Tyrants fear their fears. Those who are, and affect to be, the terror of the mighty, are many times the greatest terror of all to themselves; and when they are most ambitious to be feared by the people, are most afraid of them. 2. Wicked men are restrained from the most wicked practices, merely by their secular interest, and not by any regard to God. A concern for their ease, credit, wealth, and safety, being their reigning principle, as it keeps them from many duties, so it keeps them from many sins, which otherwise they would not be restrained from; and this is one mean by which sinners are kept from being overmuch wicked, Eccl. 7: 12. The danger of sin that appears to sense, or fancy only, influences men more than that which appears to faith. Herod feared that the putting of John to death might raise a mutiny among the people, which it did not; but he never feared it might raise a mutiny in his own conscience, which it did, v. 2. Men fear being hanged for that, which they do not fear being damned for.

4. The contrivance of bringing John to his death. Long he lay in prison; and, against the liberty of the subject, might neither be tried nor bailed. It is computed that he lay a year and a half a close prisoner, which was about as much time as he had spent in his public ministry. Now here we have an account of his release, not by any other discharge than death, the period of all a good man's troubles, that

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5. Reproaches of conscience are both the demonstration of future judgment, and an anticipation of future misery. Those who rebel against the light of the sacred Oracles, and that of their own convictions; and who quarrel with religion and its ministers, contrary to their own better judgment, are frequently given up to judicial hardness of heart; and companions in licentiousness often tempt each other to revenge and murder.— When the servants of Christ, by faithful reproofs, interfere with the sensual, interested, or ambitious schemes of abandoned transgressors; their resentment sometimes proves more powerful even than their other most domineering passions; not only merit, but women, may be wrought up to such a pitch of fury and vengeance, as to thirst for blood, more than for any of those objects, to which they would otherwise be most addicted. Yet 'the man of God' must rebuke with all authority. In doubtful matters, indeed, tenderness and caution, as well as prudence, are requisite; but when men in the most exalted stations live in evident violations of the divine law, we must fairly discharge our consciences, by declaring their conduct to be absolutely unlawful and inconsistent with all religion. They must be clearly warned, that this is 'the right hand, which they are required to cut off,' if they would save their souls from hell. Indeed, the servants of God will thus incur the reproach of rudeness and bigotry; and even, from the more timid Christian, the censure of imprudence and want of courtesy; and if those, whom they thus counsel and reprove in love, do not profit by their faithful admonitions, they will certainly be offended, and perhaps exasperated to persecution. Yet the Lord will honor them and bear them out: nor can their most powerful or enraged enemies proceed any further than He sees good; and even the fear of man, though it in many cases 'bringeth a snare,' often restrains wicked men from acting out all the evil that is conceived in their hearts. SCOTT.

from a parallel passage (Mark 6: 14—29.) that Herod had taken much notice of John, and attended to his instructions with apparent satisfaction, and 'done many things' at his instance, regarding him as a holy man of God: but this did not satisfy John, so long as he retained Herodias, his brother's wife. Josephus says, that Herodias was granddaughter to Herod the Great; and consequently, she was niece both to her former husband Philip, and to Herod with whom she at this time lived. Herod had divorced his own wife in order to take her; and her husband Philip was still living, as well as the daughter whom he had by her. So that no connection could be more contrary to the law of God, and to all decorum, than this was. It is probable, many would think, that John should for a time, at least, have connived at this irregularity; as kings and princes generally deem themselves privileged in those respects. But he knew nothing of reserves or exceptions, being an Elijah in integrity and faithfulness. For an account of the Herod family, see Note on Matt. 2: 1.

part of his purchase; He was himself clothed with a body, that He might encourage us to depend on Him for the supply of our bodily wants. But He takes a particular care of the body, when it is employed to serve the soul in his more immediate service. If we seek first the kingdom of God, and make that our chief care, we may depend on God to add other things to us, as far as He sees fit, and cast all our care of them on Him. These followed Christ but for a trial, and yet He took this care of them; much more will He provide for those who follow Him fully.

IV. The slender provision made for this great multitude; compare the number of guests invited with the bill of fare.

The number of the guests was five thousand men, beside women and children; and it is probable the women and children might be as many as the men, if not more. This was a vast, and we have reason to think an attentive auditory; and yet, it should seem, far the greater part, notwithstanding all this seeming zeal and forwardness, came to nothing; they went off and followed Him no more; for many are called, but few chosen. We would rather perceive the acceptableness of the Word by the conversations, than by the crowds of its hearers; though that also is a good sight, and a good sign.

The bill of fare was very disproportionate to the number of the guests; but five loaves, and two fishes. This provision the disciples carried about with them for the use of the family, now they were retired into the desert. To set us an example of providing for those of our own household, Christ will have their own camp virtualled in an ordinary way. Here is neither plenty, nor variety, nor dainty; but food convenient for the twelve; two fishes for their supper, and bread to serve them perhaps for a day or two: here was no wine or strong drink, but water from the rivers in the desert was the best they had to drink with their meat; and yet out of this Christ will have the multitude fed. Note, Those who have but a little, yet when the necessity is urgent, must relieve others out of that little, and that is the way to make it more. Can God furnish a table in the wilderness? Yes, when He pleases, a plentiful table.

V. The liberal distribution of this provision among the multitude, (v. 18, 19.) Bring them hither to Me. Note, The way to creature-comforts comforts indeed, is to bring them to Christ; for every thing is sanctified by his Word, and by prayer to Him. What we give in charity, we should bring to Christ first, that He may graciously accept it from us, and graciously bless it to those to whom it is given; this is doing it as unto the Lord. Now at this miraculous meal we may observe,

1. The seating of the guests; (v. 19.) which intimates, that while He was preaching to them, they were standing. But what shall we do for chairs for them all? Let them sit down on the grass. When Ahasuerus would show the riches of his glorious kingdom, and the honor of his excellent majesty, in a royal feast for the great men of all his provinces, the beds or couches they sat on were of gold and silver, on a pavement of red, and blue, and white, and black marble, Esther 1: 6. Our Lord Jesus now showed the riches of a more glorious kingdom, and the honor of a more excellent majesty, even a dominion over nature itself; but here is not so much as a cloth spread, no plates or napkins laid, no knives or forks, not so much as a bench to sit down on; but, as if Christ intended indeed to reduce the world to the plainness and simplicity, and so to the innocency and happiness of Adam in paradise, He commanded them to sit down on the grass. By doing every thing thus, without any pomp or splendor, He plainly showed that his kingdom was not of this world, nor cometh with observation.

2. The craving of a blessing. He himself looked up to heaven, and blessed, and gave thanks. In this prayer and thanksgiving, we may suppose, He had special reference to the multiplying of this food, but herein has taught us that good duty of craving a blessing and giving thanks at our meals: God's good creatures must be received with thanksgiving, 1 Tim. 4: 4. Samuel blessed the feast, 1 Sam. 9: 13. Acts 2: 46, 47. 27: 34, 35. This is eating and drinking to the glory of God; (1 Cor. 10: 31.) giving God thanks, (Rom. 14: 6.) eating before God, as Moses, and his father-in-law, Exod. 18: 12, 15. When Christ blessed, He looked up to heaven, to teach us, in prayer, to eye God as a Father in heaven: and when we receive our creature-comforts to look thitherward, as taking them from God's hand, and depending on Him for a blessing.

3. The carving of the meat. He brake, and gave the loaves to the disciples, and the disciples to the multitude. Christ intended hereby to put honor on his disciples, that they might be respected as workers together with Him: as also to signify in what way the spiritual food of the Word should be dispensed to the world; from Christ, as the original Author, by his ministers. What Christ designed for the churches, He signified to his servant John; (Rev. 1: 1, 4.) they delivered all that, and that only, which they received of the Father of a family, among the Jews, to take the bread into his hands and render thanks to God, before any of the family was permitted to taste it. Dr. A. CLARKE.

(20.) Basket.] 'Flag-basket. Juvenal calls a bundle of straw and a flag-basket the whole household furniture of the Jew.' BLOOMFIELD.

The simple reason why the Jews carried baskets with them appears to be this: in Gentile countries, they carried their own provisions, for fear of pollution, from partaking the meat of heathens. This probably obliged them to carry hay also to sleep on. Dr. A. CLARKE.

one basket for each apostle: thus what they gave they had again, and a great deal more with it; and they were so far from being niggard, that they could make this broken meat serve another time, and be thankful. This was to manifest and magnify the miracle, and to show that the provision Christ makes for those who are his, is not bare and scanty, but rich and plentiful; Luke 15: 17. Elisha's multiplying the loaves was somewhat like his, but far short of it; and then it was said, They shall eat and leave, 2 Kings 4: 43.

It is the same divine power, though exerted in an ordinary way, which multiplies the seed sown in the ground every year, and makes the earth yield her increase; so that what was brought out by handfuls, is brought home in sheaves: This is the Lord's doing; it is by Christ that all natural things consist, and by the word of his power that they are upheld.

We have here the story of another miracle which Christ wrought for the relief of his friends and followers. his walking on the water to his disciples. In the foregoing miracle, he acted as the Lord of nature, improving its powers for the supply of those who were in want; in this, He acted as the Lord of nature, correcting and controlling its powers for the succor of those who were in danger and distress. Observe,

I. Christ's dismissing his disciples and the multitude, after He had fed them miraculously, v. 22. John gives a particular reason for the hasty breaking up of this assembly, John 6: 15.

When they had sat down to eat and drink, they did not rise up to play, but each went to his business.

1. Christ sent the people away. It intimates somewhat of solemnity in dismissing them; He sent them away with a blessing, some parting words of caution, counsel, and comfort.

V. 13-21. In promoting the welfare of souls, we should have consideration and compassion for the bodies of men also; and a little, properly managed, and brought to Christ for his blessing, will go further than it is commonly supposed: it increases in our hands, and we are rather enriched, than impoverished by liberality. And whilst the rich recollect how He and his disciples fared, they should learn to spare from their own expenses to feed his poor; and the poor should learn to be contented with their mean food, which is seldom less luxurious, than that with which the Savior of the world was pleased to satisfy his hunger.—We should all learn to thank God, and to rejoice, from the Lord, 1 Cor. 11: 23. Ministers can never fill the people's hearts, unless Christ first fill their hands: and what He has given to the disciples, they must give to the multitude; they are stewards, to give to every one their portion of meat, ch. 24: 45. And, blessed be God, by the multitude ever so great, there is enough for all, enough for each.

4. The increase of the meat. This is taken notice of only in the effect; here is no mention of any word that Christ spoke, by which the food was multiplied; the purposes and intentions of his mind and will shall take effect, though they be not spoken out: but this is observable, that the meat was multiplied, not in the heap, but in the distribution of it. As the widow's oil increased in the pouring out, so here the bread in the breaking. Thus grace grows by being acted, and, while other things perish in the using, spiritual gifts increase. God ministers seed to the sower, and multiplies not the seed hoarded up, but the seed sown, 2 Cor. 9: 10. Thus there is that scattereth, and yet increaseth; that scattereth, and so increaseth.

VI. The plentiful satisfaction of all the guests with this provision. Though the disproportion was so great, yet there was enough and to spare.

There was enough; They did all eat and were filled. Note, Those whom Christ feeds, He fills; (Psal. 37: 19.) They shall be satisfied; though there was but a little, there was enough, and that is as good as a feast. Note, The blessing of God can make a little go a great way; as, if God blasts what we have, we eat, and have not enough, Hag. 1: 9.

There was to spare; They took up of the fragments that remained, twelve baskets full,

one basket for each apostle: thus what they gave they had again, and a great deal more with it; and they were so far from being niggard, that they could make this broken meat serve another time, and be thankful. This was to manifest and magnify the miracle, and to show that the provision Christ makes for those who are his, is not bare and scanty, but rich and plentiful; Luke 15: 17. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 13-21. In promoting the welfare of souls, we should have consideration and compassion for the bodies of men also; and a little, properly managed, and brought to Christ for his blessing, will go further than it is commonly supposed: it increases in our hands, and we are rather enriched, than impoverished by liberality. And whilst the rich recollect how He and his disciples fared, they should learn to spare from their own expenses to feed his poor; and the poor should learn to be contented with their mean food, which is seldom less luxurious, than that with which the Savior of the world was pleased to satisfy his hunger.—We should all learn to thank God, and to crave his blessing, at our meals, and to avoid all profusion and waste: remembering that our Lord would not suffer the fragments of this miraculous provision to be lost; and considering that frugality is the proper source of liberality.—But we see also, in this miracle, an emblem of 'the Bread of life, which came down from heaven,' to sustain our perishing souls: the provisions of his Gospel appear to the carnal eye mean and scanty; yet they suffice for the whole multitude, who 'feed on Him, in their hearts, by faith, with thanksgiving,' and his ministers may go forth in confidence, assured that whilst they feed others, they will also be fed themselves. Scott.

Verses 22-24.

(Marg. R.) The multitudes, concluding Jesus to be the promised Messiah, purpose to make him their King (John 6: 15.) and as the apostles might be distressed to concur, our Lord constrained them to put to sea without Him: He then dismissed the people, who retired quietly to their own homes. Instead, however, of resting after his fatigues, He Himself retired to a mountain to pray. (Marg. Ref. n.) He had no sins to be pardoned or subdued: but He had manifold and tremendous desires, temptations, and sufferings before Him, through which He was to pass as man, in dependence on the power, truth, and love of God: He and the cause of his disciples and that of his church to plead; his debt was in communion with the Father; and He acted as our Surety and Example. Scott.

Ship.] Rather bark or small vessel. (John 6: 22.) as noticed heretofore.

(23.) The original phrase here translated, 'and when the evening was come,' is the same with that translated 'and the time is now past.' The evening, says John, was divided into two parts, the first of which commenced, according to the rabbins, just before sunset, the second precisely at sunset. Before the captivity, the Hebrews appear to have made the first part of the evening to commence at sunset, and the second, when it began to grow dark.

tures. We need not inquire how this was done, whether by condensing the surface of the water, (when God pleases, the depths are congealed in the heart of the sea, Exod. 15: 8.) or by suspending the gravitation of his body, which was transfigured as He pleased; it is sufficient that it proves his divine power, for it is God's prerogative to tread upon the waves of the sea, (Job 9: 8.) as it is to ride upon the wings of the wind. He that made the waters of the sea a wall for the redeemed of the Lord, (Isa. 51: 10.) here makes them a walk for the Redeemer Himself, who, as Lord of all, appears with one foot on the sea and the other on dry land, Rev. 10: 2. The same power that made iron to swim, (2 Kgs 6: 6.) did this. What ailed thee, O thou sea? Ps. 114: 5. It was at the presence of the Lord. Thy way, O God, is in the sea, Ps. 67: 19. Note, Christ can take what way He pleases to save his people.

V. An account of what passed between Christ and his distressed friends on his approach.

1. Between Him and all the disciples. We are here told, How their fears were raised; v. 26. It seems, the existence and appearance of spirits was generally believed by all except the Sadducees; yet, doubtless, many supposed apparitions have been merely the creatures of men's own fear and fancy. These disciples said, It is a spirit; an apparition: so it might much better be rendered; when they should have said, It is the Lord; it can be no other. Note, [1] Even the appearances and approaches of deliverance are sometimes occasions of trouble and perplexity, Luke 1: 29. Exod. 3: 6, 7. The comforts of the Spirit of adoption are introduced by the terrors of the spirit of bondage, Rom. 8: 15. [2.] The appearance of a spirit, or the fancy of it, cannot but strike us with terror, because of our ignorance of the world of spirits, the just quarrel good spirits have with us, and the inveterate enmity evil spirits have against us: see Job 4: 14, 15. The more acquaintance we have with God, the Father of spirits, and the more careful we are to keep ourselves in his love, the better able we shall be to deal with these fears. [3.] The fears of good people arise from their mistakes and misapprehensions concerning Christ, his person, offices, and undertaking; the more clearly and fully we know his name, with the more assurance we shall trust in Him, Ps. 9: 10. [4.] A little thing frightens us in a storm. When without are fightings, no marvel that within are fears. Note, Most of our danger from outward troubles arises from the occasion they give for inward troubles.

How these fears were silenced, v. 27. He straightway relieved them, by showing them their mistake; when they were wrestling with the waves, He delayed his succor for some time, but hastened it against their fright; He straightway laid the storm with his word, Be of good cheer, it is I; be not afraid.

[1.] He rectified their mistake, by making Himself known to them, as Joseph to his brethren; It is I. He does not name Himself as He did to Peter, I am Jesus; for Paul as yet knew Him not: to these disciples it was enough to say, It is I; they knew his voice, as his sheep, (John 10: 4.) as Mary Magdalene, John 20: 16. They could say with the spouse, It is the voice of my Beloved, Cant. 2: 8. 5: 2. True believers know it by a good token. It was enough to make them easy, to understand who it was they saw. Note, A right knowledge opens the door to true comfort, especially the knowledge of Christ.

[2.] He encouraged them against their fright; It is I, and therefore, First, Be of good cheer; Be courageous; pluck up your spirits.' If Christ's disciples be not cheerful in a storm, it is their own fault. Secondly, Be not afraid; 'I 'Be not afraid of Me, now that you know it is I.' Note, Christ will not be a terror to those to whom He manifests Himself; when they trains them up by degrees to live by faith, and not by sense.

4. Though the wind was contrary, and they were tossed with waves, yet being ordered by their Master to the other side, they did not tuck about and come back again, but made the best of their way forward. Note, Though troubles and difficulties may disturb us in our duty, they must not drive us from it; but through the midst of them we must press forward.

IV. Christ's approach to them in this condition; (v. 25.) in this we have an instance,

1. Of his goodness; He went to them, as one that took cognizance of their case, and was concerned for them, as a father for his children. Note, The church's extremity is Christ's opportunity; but He came not till the fourth watch, toward three o'clock in the morning. It was in the morning-watch that the Lord appeared for Israel in the Red sea, (Exod. 14: 24.) so was this. He that keepeth Israel neither slumbers nor sleeps, but, when there is occasion, walks in darkness for their succor; helps, and that right early.

2. Of his power: He went unto them, walking on the sea. This is a great instance of Christ's sovereign dominion over all the creature to understand Him right, the terror will be over 2. Be not afraid of the tempest, though noisy and very threatening. I am He that concerns himself for you, and will not see you perish.' Note, Nothing is a terror to those that have Christ near them, and know He is theirs; no, not death itself.

2. Between him and Peter, (v. 28-31.) where observe.

(1.) Peter's courage, and Christ's countenancing that.

It was very bold in Peter, that he would venture to come to Christ on the water; v. 23. Courage was Peter's master-grace; and that made him so forward above the rest to express his love to Christ, though others perhaps loved Him as well.

First, It is an instance of Peter's affection to Christ, that he desired to come to Him. He does not say, Bid me walk on the waters, as desiring it for the miracle-sake; but, Bid me come to Thee, as desiring it for Christ's sake. Christ was coming to succor and deliver them. Note, When Christ is coming towards us in a way of mercy, we must go forth to meet Him in a way of duty. Those that would have benefit by Christ as a Savior, must thus by faith come to Him. Christ had been now, for some time, absent, and hereby it appears why He absented Himself; it was to endear Himself so much the more to his disciples at his return, to make it highly seasonable and doubly acceptable. Note, When, for a small moment, Christ has forsaken his people, his returns are welcome, and most affectionately embraced; when gracious souls, after long seeking, find their Beloved at last, they hold him, and will not let him go, Cant. 3: 4.

Secondly, It is an instance of Peter's caution, and due observance of the will of Christ, that he would not come without a warrant. Not, 'If it be Thou, I will come,' but, If it be Thou, bid me come. Note, The holdest spirits must wait for a call to hazardous enterprises. Such extraordinary warrants as this to Peter were are not now to expect, but must have recourse to the general rules of the Word, in the application of which to particular cases, with the help of providential hints, wisdom is profitable to direct.

Thirdly, It is an instance of Peter's faith and resolution, that he ventured on the water when Christ bid him. To quit the safety of the ship, and throw himself into the jaws of death, to despise the threatening waves he so lately dreaded, argued a very strong dependence on the power and word of Christ. What difficulty or danger could stand before such faith and such zeal?

It was very kind and condescending in Christ, that He was pleased to own him in it, v. 29. He might have condemned the proposal as foolish and rash; nay, as proud and assuming. But Christ knew that it came from a sincere and zealous affection to Him, and graciously accepted it. Note, Christ is well pleased with the expressions of his people's love, though mixed with manifold infirmities.

First, He bid him come. When the Pharisees asked a sign, they had not only a repulse, but a reproof, because they did it with a design to tempt Christ; when Peter asked a sign, he had it, because he did it with a resolution to trust Christ. The gospel-call is, 'Come, come to Christ; venture all in his hand, and commit the keeping of your souls to Him; venture through a stormy sea, a troublesome world, to Jesus Christ.'

Secondly, He bore him out when he did come. Peter walked on the water. Now, methinks, the communion of the true believer with Christ is represented by this; Through the strength of Christ we are borne above the world, enabled to

Verses 25-27.

Th. fourth watch of the night began three hours before sunrise; and during these three hours Jesus came to the disciples; perhaps after day-break. 'The picture of two feet, walking on the sea, was an Egyptian hieroglyphic for an impossible thing.' Doddridge. It was, no doubt, an attestation, that He was the God of nature, the Lord of the creation; and also an exhibition of his power over the troubles and persecutions which he brought the church. That the Jews had then an opinion of 'holy spirits walking in the night,' is evident from the Seventy, who [116].

28 And Peter answered him and said, Lord, if it be thou, bid me come unto thee on the water.

29 And he said, Come. And when Peter was come down out of the ship, he walked on the water, to go to Jesus.

30 But when he saw the wind boisterous, he was afraid; and beginning to sink, he cried, saying, Lord, save me.

31 And immediately Jesus stretched forth his hand, and caught him, and said unto him, O thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt?

32 And when they were come into the ship, the wind ceased.

he took notice of the danger he was in, and observed how the floods lifted up their waves, then he feared. Note, Looking at difficulties with an eye of sense, more than at precepts and promises with an eye of faith, is at the bottom of all our inordinate fears, both as to public and personal concerns. Abraham was strong in faith, because he considered not his own body; (Rom. 4:19.) he minded not the discouraging improbabilities which the promise lay under, but kept his eye on God's power; and so, against hope, believed in hope, v. 18. Peter, when he saw the wind boisterous, should have remembered what he had seen, (ch. 8:27.) when the winds and the sea obeyed Christ; but therefore we fear continually every day, because we forget the Lord our Maker, Isa. 51:12, 13.

Secondly, The effect of this fear; He began to sink. While faith kept up, he kept above water; but when faith staggered, he began to sink. Note, The sinking of our spirits is owing to the weakness of our faith; we are upheld as we are saved, through faith; (1 Pet. 1:5.) and, therefore, when our souls are cast down and disquieted, the sovereign remedy is, to hope in God, Ps. 43:5. It is probable that Peter, being bred a fisherman, could swim very well; (John 21:7.) and perhaps he trusted in part to that, when he cast himself into the sea; if he could not walk, he could swim; but Christ let him begin to sink, to show him that it was Christ's right hand and his holy arm, not any skill of his own, that was his security. It was Christ's great mercy to him, that, on the failing of his faith, He did not leave him to sink outright as a stone, (Exod. 15:5.) but gave him time to cry, Lord, save me. Such is Christ's care of true believers. Peter walked as he believed; to him, as to others, the rule held good, According to your faith be it unto you.

Thirdly, The remedy he had recourse to in this distress, the old, tried, approved remedy of prayer; he cried, Lord, save me. Observe, 1. The manner of his praying; it is fervent and importunate; He cried. Note, When faith is weak, prayer should be strong. Our Lord Jesus has taught us on the day of our fear to offer up strong cries, Heb. 5:7. Sense of danger trample on it, kept from sinking into it, from being overwhelmed by it, obtain a victory over it, (1 John 3:4.) by faith in Christ's victory, (John 16:33.) and with Him are crucified to it, Gal. 6:14. See blessed Paul walking on the water with Jesus, more than a conqueror through Him, and treading on all the threatening waves, as not able to separate him from the love of Christ, Rom. 8:35, &c. Thus the sea of the world is become like a sea of glass, congealed so as to bear; and they that have gotten the victory, stand on it and sing, Rev. 15:2, 3. When our souls are following hard after God, then it is that his right hand upholds us; it was David's experience, Ps. 63:8. Special supports are promised, and are to be expected, only in spiritual pursuits. When God bears his Israel on eagles' wings, it is to bring them to Himself; (Exod. 19:4.) nor can we ever come to Jesus, unless we be upheld by his power; it is in his own strength that we wrestle with Him, that we reach after Him, that we press forward toward the mark, being kept by the power of God, which power we must depend on, as Peter when he walked on the water; and there is no danger of sinking while underneath are the everlasting arms.

2. Peter's cowardice, and Christ's reproving and succoring him. Christ bid him come, not only that he might walk on the water, and so know Christ's power, but that he might sink, and so know his own weakness; for as He would encourage his faith, so He would check his confidence, and make him ashamed of it. Observe then,

[1.] Peter's great fear; v. 30. The strongest faith and the greatest courage have a mixture of fear. Those that can say, Lord, I believe, must say, Lord, help my unbelief. Nothing but perfect love will quite cast out fear. Good men often fail in those graces which they are most diligent for, and which they have then in exercise, to show that they have not yet attained. Peter was very stout at first, but afterwards his heart failed him. The lengthening out of a trial discovers the weakness of faith.

Here is, First, The cause of this fear; He saw the wind boisterous. While Peter kept his eye fixed on Christ, and his word and power, he walked on the water well enough; but when he looked at the waves, he was in, and observed how the floods lifted up their waves, then he feared. Note, Looking at difficulties with an eye of sense, more than at precepts and promises with an eye of faith, is at the bottom of all our inordinate fears, both as to public and personal concerns. Abraham was strong in faith, because he considered not his own body; (Rom. 4:19.) he minded not the discouraging improbabilities which the promise lay under, but kept his eye on God's power; and so, against hope, believed in hope, v. 18. Peter, when he saw the wind boisterous, should have remembered what he had seen, (ch. 8:27.) when the winds and the sea obeyed Christ; but therefore we fear continually every day, because we forget the Lord our Maker, Isa. 51:12, 13.

Secondly, The effect of this fear; He began to sink. While faith kept up, he kept above water; but when faith staggered, he began to sink. Note, The sinking of our spirits is owing to the weakness of our faith; we are upheld as we are saved, through faith; (1 Pet. 1:5.) and, therefore, when our souls are cast down and disquieted, the sovereign remedy is, to hope in God, Ps. 43:5. It is probable that Peter, being bred a fisherman, could swim very well; (John 21:7.) and perhaps he trusted in part to that, when he cast himself into the sea; if he could not walk, he could swim; but Christ let him begin to sink, to show him that it was Christ's right hand and his holy arm, not any skill of his own, that was his security. It was Christ's great mercy to him, that, on the failing of his faith, He did not leave him to sink outright as a stone, (Exod. 15:5.) but gave him time to cry, Lord, save me. Such is Christ's care of true believers. Peter walked as he believed; to him, as to others, the rule held good, According to your faith be it unto you.

Thirdly, The remedy he had recourse to in this distress, the old, tried, approved remedy of prayer; he cried, Lord, save me. Observe, 1. The manner of his praying; it is fervent and importunate; He cried. Note, When faith is weak, prayer should be strong. Our Lord Jesus has taught us on the day of our fear to offer up strong cries, Heb. 5:7. Sense of danger will make us cry, sense of duty and dependence on God should make us cry to Him. 2. The matter of his prayer was pertinent and to the purpose; He cried, Lord, save me. Christ is the great Savior, He came to save; those that would be saved, must not only come to Him, but cry to Him, for salvation; but we are never brought to this, till we find ourselves sinking; sense of need will drive us to Him.

[2.] Christ's great favor to Peter, in this fright. Though there was a mixture of presumption with Peter's faith in his first adventure, and of unbelief with his faith in his after-fainting, yet Christ did not cast him off; for,

First, He saved him: Christ's time to save is, when we sink, Ps. 15:4—7. Christ's hand is still stretched out to all believers, to keep them from sinking. Though He may seem to have left his hold, He doth but seem to do so, for they shall never perish, neither shall any man pluck them out of his hand, John 10:29.

Secondly, He rebuked him; for as many as He loves and saves, He reproves and chides. Note, 1. Faith may be true, and yet weak; as first, like a grain of mustard-seed. Peter had faith enough to bring him upon the water, yet because not enough to carry him through Christ tells him he had but little. 2. Our discouraging doubts and fears are all owing to the weakness of our faith: therefore, we doubt, because we are but of little faith. Could we but believe more, we should doubt less. 3. The weakness of our faith, and the prevalence of our doubts, are very displeasing to our Lord Jesus. There is no good reason why Christ's disciples should be of a doubtful mind, no, not in a stormy day, because He is ready to help them, a very present Help.

VI. The ceasing of the storm, v. 32. When Christ was come into the ship, they were presently at the shore. Christ walked on the water till He came to the ship, and then went into that, when He could as easily have walked to the shore; but when ordinary means are to be had, miracles are not to be expected. Though Christ needs not instruments to do his work, He is pleased to use them. Observe, When Christ came into the ship, Peter came in with Him. Companions with Christ in his patience, shall be companions in his kingdom, Rev. 1:9. Those that walk with Him, shall reign with Him; those that are exposed, and that suffer with Him, shall triumph with Him.

When they were come into the ship, immediately the storm ceased, for it had done its work, its trying work. He that has gathered the wind into his fists, and bound the waters in a garment, is the same that ascended and descended; and his word even stormy winds fulfil, Ps. 148:8. When Christ comes into a soul, He makes winds and storms to cease there, and commands peace. Welcome Christ, and the noise of her waves will soon be quelled. The way to be still is, to know that He is God, that He is the Lord with us.

VII. The adoration paid to Christ hereupon; (v. 33.) They that were in the ship came and worshipped Him, and said, Of a truth, Thou art the Son of God. Two good uses they made of this distress, and this deliverance.

It was a confirmation of their faith in Christ, and abundantly convinced them that the fulness of the Godhead dwelt in Him; for none but the world's Creator could multiply the loaves, none but its Governor could tread on the waters of the sea; they therefore yield to the evidence, and make confession of their faith; Thou truly art the Son of God. They knew before that He was the Son of God, but now they know it better. Faith, after a conflict with unbelief, is sometimes the more active, and gets to greater

Verses 23—32.

Peter, from the first appears a man of integrity, who had very exalted thoughts of Jesus, and a cordial affection to Him; but of a sanguine temper, and not deeply acquainted with his own heart: he was therefore always most forward to speak, to propose, to object, and attempt. When he saw Jesus walking on the sea, he found himself excited to a very high confidence, and he desired permission to come to Him on the water. Probably he expected a commendation of the greatness of his faith; but our Lord, to show him his weakness, and to teach all his disciples many useful lessons, bade him come; and Peter without hesitation attempted to walk on the unstable waves! Peter's doubting did not relate to his own acceptance, or final salvation, but to the power of Christ to preserve him from sinking amidst the violence of the storm. (Note, 8:23—27.)

had knowledge of Him. Probably the report of his miraculous passage over the sea, might help to make way for his entertainment in those parts; and perhaps it was one thing Christ intended in it, for He has great reaches in what He does. This they had knowledge of, and of the other miracles He had wrought, and therefore flocked to Him. Note, They that know Christ's name, will make their application to Him: if Christ were better known, He would not be neglected as He is; He is trusted as far as He is known.

They had knowledge of Him, that is, that He was among them, and would be a while among them. Note, To discern the day of our opportunities is a good step toward the improvement of it. This was the condemnation of the world, that Christ was in the world, and the world knew Him not; John 1:10. Jerusalem knew Him not, (Luke 19:42.) but there were some, who, degrees of strength by being exercised. Now they know it of a truth. Note, It is good for us to know more and more of the certainty of those things wherein we have been instructed, Luke 1:4. Faith then grows, when it arrives at a full assurance, when it sees clearly, and saith, Of a truth.

They took occasion from it to give Him the glory due unto his name. They not only owned that great truth, but were suitably affected by it; they worshipped Christ. Note, When Christ manifests his glory for us, we ought to return it to Him; (Ps. 50:15.) I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify Me. Their worship and adoration of Christ were thus expressed, Of a truth Thou art the Son of God. Note, The matter of our creed may and must be made the matter of our praise. Faith is the proper principle of worship, and worship the genuine product of faith. He that comes to God must believe; and he that believes in God, will come, Heb. 11:6.

V. 34-36. We have here an account of miracles Christ wrought on the other side the water, in the land of Gennesaret. Whithersoever He went, He was doing good. Gennesaret was a tract of land that lay between Bethsaida and Capernaum, and either gave the name to, or took the name from, this sea, which is called, (Luke 5:1.) The Lake of Gennesaret; it signifies the valley of branches. Observe here,

1. The forwardness and faith of the men of that place. These were more noble than the Gergesenes, their neighbors, who were borderers on the same lake. Those besought Christ to depart from them, they had no occasion for Him; these besought Him to help them, they had need of Him. Christ reckons it the greatest honor we can do Him, to make use of Him. We are told,

1. How they were brought to Christ; they

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 22-36. Even in those places to which the Lord has evidently appointed us, we may expect storms and difficulties; but in due time He will come to our relief. We should enjoy far more comfort, did we more zealously copy his example, and were we more careful not to omit fervent, constant prayer.—We are, sometimes, troubled at those incidents, which denote our deliverance; but our Lord beholds our fears, and considering that all power is in our Redeemer's hands, and all events are ordered by his appointment, we may comfortably hear Him say to us in every one of them, 'It is I, be not afraid.'—We find it hard to be very humble without dejection, or animated without self-complacency: but our faith is irregular, when it leads us to desire or attempt difficult or perilous services, without a proper call. The Lord, however, often lets his servants have their choice, in order to humble and prove them, and to show the greatness of his power and grace. In the most perilous situation to which He calls us, if our faith be steadfastly fixed on his infinite power, truth, and love, we may proceed with safety and confidence. But He will rebuke the weak believer, though He will not leave him to perish.—We ought indeed to doubt, and to examine ourselves, whether we be true disciples or not: but we never should doubt the power of Christ to save and help all those, who call upon Him.—The dangers, trials, and humiliations of the believer, will eventually render the Savior more glorious in his eyes; and precious to his heart.—Were men more acquainted with Him, and with the destituted state of their souls, they would flock to Him, that they might experience his healing influence; for all who touch Him, though with a feeble, trembling faith, shall in due season be made perfectly whole: and, whilst we consider all these wonders of his divine power and love, shall we refuse to adore Him, or to acknowledge, that 'of a truth He is the Son of God?' Or shall we neglect to do what we can, to bring others to Him for the healing and saving of their souls? SCOTT.

Verse 33.

The apostles seem to have been more impressed with this, than any of our Lord's preceding miracles; nor did He in the least decline the honor which they rendered to Him. It does not appear, that any, except the apostles and those who belonged to the vessel, were present. To suppose additional mariners, heathen mariners, on board this fisher-boat, the property of fishermen, on an inland lake in Galilee, in order to explain away this confession to Christ, as if it only meant a son of a god, according to pagan notions, and as made by the Gentiles alone, strikingly shows, how unwilling many learned men are to admit the obvious conclusion; but even on this supposition, the words cannot admit that construction. See Bp. Middleton on the Greek Article, p. 263-271. (Note, Mark 15:39.) SCOTT.

The Son of God. That this was the name commonly given to the Messiah, is manifest from John 1:50, and from those passages in which He is now called the Christ, and now, the Son of God; especially from the second Psalm, which also the ancient Hebrews interpreted of the Messiah.

of spirits instructing them; as & concerned for the bodies of his people, providing for them.

Here is, I. The cavil of the scribes and Pharisees at Christ's disciples: The scribes and Pharisees were the great men of the Jewish church, men whose gain was godliness; great enemies to the Gospel of Christ, but colored their opposiover the place of persons diseased, as Naaman did; (2 Kings 5:11.) but were sure that there was in Him such an overflowing fulness of healing virtue, that they could not fail of a cure, who were but admitted near Him. It was in this country and neighborhood that the woman with the bloody issue was cured by touching the hem of his garment, and was commended for her faith; (Ch. 9:20-22.) and thence, probably, they took occasion to ask this. Note, The experiences of others in their attendance on Christ may be of use both to direct and to encourage us in our attendance on Him. It is good to use those means and methods which others before us have used with success.

II. The fruit and success of their application to Christ. It was not in vain that these seed of Jacob sought Him, v. 36. Note, 1. Christ's cures are perfect cures. Those that He heals, He heals perfectly. He doeth not his work by halves. Though spiritual healing be not perfected at first, yet, doubtless, He that has begun the good work, will perform it, Phil. 1:6. 2. There is abundance of healing virtue in Christ for all that apply to Him, be they ever so many. That precious ointment which was poured on his head, ran down to the skirts of his garment, Ps. 133:2. 3. The healing virtue that is in Christ, is put forth for the benefit of those that by a true and lively faith touch Him. Christ is in heaven, but his Word is high us, and Himself in that Word. When we mix faith with the Word, apply it to ourselves, depend on it, and submit to its influences and commands, then we touch the hem of Christ's garment. It is but thus touching, and we are made whole. On such easy terms are spiritual cures offered by Him that He may truly be said to heal freely; so that if our souls die of their wounds, it is not owing to our Physician, but to ourselves. He could, He would have healed us, but we would not be healed; so that our blood will lie on our own heads.

CHAP. XV. v. 1-9. In this chapter, we have our Lord Jesus, as the great Prophet teaching, as the great Physician healing, and as the great Shepherd of the sheep feeding; as the Father of spirits instructing them; as the Conqueror of Satan dispossessing him; as & concerned for the bodies of his people, providing for them.

NOTES.

CHAP. XV. v. 1, 2. The report of our Lord's miracles seems to have given great uneasiness to the scribes and Pharisees at Jerusalem; and some of them had come in order to watch his conduct, and to seek for matter of accusation against Him. But not finding that He, or his disciples, neglected any part of the divine law, they objected to Him his disregard of 'the tradition of the elders.' It was pretended by them, and still is by modern Jews, that these traditions were originally received from God, by immediate revelation, and were of equal authority with the written law; and that they had been delivered down, by word of mouth from one to another, through successive generations. Thus the scribes, who were the supposed repositories and interpreters of them, had the power of altering them, and imposing them on the people according to their convenience; in the same manner as the church of Rome long maintained its usurped authority, by dictating to the whole western church under similar pretensions; and as it still maintains that usurpation, through many populous regions. SCOTT.

(2.) Tradition.] Besides the laws of Moses, as recorded in the Pentateuch, the rabbins pretend that he left a variety of oral traditions, delivered to him by the voice of God at Sinai, and handed down from generation to generation, by word of mouth, to the time of our Lord, and even lower; for it does not appear that any complete digest of them was put into writing till the latter part of the second century, by Rabbi Judas, surnamed the holy. This work (which makes six volumes folio) is called the Mishna, or second law, as containing a variety of additions to, and explanations of, the written law: these were pretended to be explicatory, but many of them were evasive, and some even subversive of the laws of Moses, as in the text. WILLIAMS.

To explain the Mishna, mentioned above, were written the two Talmuds, called the Jerusalem and Babylonish, which are named Gemara, or complement, as Dr. A. Clarke has observed, 'because by these the oral law is fully explained.' The former was completed about A. D. 300; the latter after A. D. 500.

[Elders.] 'Not the members of the sanhedrim, but all those who had obtained among the people a distinguished name for wisdom.'

Wash hands.] 'It is plain that other nations commonly used to wash before their meals.'

Eat bread.] 'Every attentive reader [of the Bible] must have observed, that food in general is called bread, in a multitude of places; and bread is sometimes put even for the provisions of a royal table. 2 Sam. 9:7, 10, and 12:20.'

tion with a pretence of zeal for the law & Moses, when really nothing was intended but the support of their own tyranny over the consciences of men. They were men of learning and of business. These here introduced were of Jerusalem, the holy, the head-city; the should therefore have been better than others, but they were worse. Note, External privileges, not duly improved, commonly swell men up with pride and malignity. Jerusalem, which should have been a pure spring, was now become a poisoned sink. How is the faith of Jerusalem become a harlot!

Now if these great men be the accusers, pray what is the accusation? Why, truly, non-conformity to the canons of their church; v. 2. This charge they make good in a particular instance; They wash not their hands when they eat bread. A very high misdemeanor! It was a sign that Christ's disciples conducted themselves offensively, when this was the worst thing they could charge them with.

Observe, 1. What was the tradition of the elders—that people should often wash their hands, and always at meat. This they placed a great deal of religion in, supposing that the meat they touched with unwashed hands would defile them. The Pharisees practised it themselves, and with a great deal of strictness imposed it on others, making it a sin against God if they did not do it. Rabbi Jose determined, 'that to eat with unwashed hands is as great a sin as adultery.' And Rabbi Akiba being kept a close prisoner, having water sent him both to wash his hands with, and to drink with his meat, the greatest part being accidentally shed, washed his hands with the remainder, though he left himself none to drink, saying he would rather die than transgress the tradition of the elders. Nay, they would not eat meat with one that did not wash before meat. This mighty zeal in so small a matter would appear very strange, if we did not still see it incident to church-oppressors, not only to be fond of practising their own inventions, but furious in pressing their own impositions.

2. What was the transgression of this tradition by the disciples; it seems, they did not wash their hands when they ate bread. The custom was innocent enough, and had a decency in it; but when it came to be practised and imposed as a religious rite, and such a stress laid on it, the disciples, though weak in knowledge, yet were so well taught as not to observe it.

Verses 3-6.

(Note, Deut. 4:2.) All additions to the laws of God are an infringement of his legislative authority; and a presumptuous imputation on his wisdom; and in one way or other, they always clash with the divine precepts: so that an attachment to human traditions necessarily leads men to disobey God; and it is evident that our Lord had expressly taught his disciples to disregard them. Doubtless they, at this time, observed the ceremonial distinction of meats, and other divine appointments. 'Honor thy father and thy mother.' 'By honor is meant all kind of duty, which children owe to their parents.' Beza in SCOTT.

(4.) Curseth.] 'Revileth.' The proper import of the [original] word, is to give abusive language, to revile, to calumniate. The application, in the present instance, is evidently to reproachful words, quite different from cursing.

CAMPBELL. 'If a man can answer his parents, when they need any relief, and tell them, I have bound myself with an oath, that I will not do any thing to the relief of my father or mother: or, as some understand it, 'O father, that by which thou shouldst be relieved by me, is a gift already devoted to God, and cannot without impiety be otherwise employed; and by this piety to God I may be as profitable to thee: for God will repay it to me and thee in our needs: he is under obligation not to give it to his father: and the Pharisees approve of this practice, that he may thus evacuate his duty to his parent.' Hornwald. The pretence of devoting to God the property thus withheld from the parent, as the occasion of the oath, seems implied. 'A man may be so bound by them, (that is, by vows,) that he cannot, without great sin, do what God had by his law required to be done. So that if he made a vow, which laid him under a necessity to violate God's law that he might observe it, his vow must stand, and the law be abrogated.' Jewish canon from Pococke.—This specimen is sufficient to lead any reflecting person to conclude, that human traditions and the law of God cannot subsist together; but the prevalence of the former must inevitably lead to make void the latter, and this consideration shows the reason of our Lord's most decided opposition to the system of tradition.

Honor.] This word was taken in great latitude of meaning among the Jews: it not only meant respect and submission, but also to take care of a person, to nourish and support him, to enrich. See Num. 22:17. Judg. 13:17. 1 Tim. 5:17. And that this was the sense of the law, as it respected parents, see Deut. 27:16.

Note, Those who are most zealous of their own impositions, are commonly most careless of God's commands. Though the Pharisees, in this command of washing before meat, did not intrench on any command of God; yet, because in other instances they did, He justifies his disciples' disobedience to this.

The proof of this charge is in a particular instance, that of their transgressing the fifth commandment.

[1.] Let us see what the command of God is, v. 4.

The precept is enjoined by the common Father of mankind, and by paying respect to them whom Providence has made the instruments of our being, we give honor to Him who is the Author of it. The whole of children's duty to their parents is included in this of honoring them, which is the spring and foundation of all the rest. If I be a Father, where is my honor? Our Savior here means by it the duty of children's maintaining their parents, and ministering to their wants, if there be occasion, and being every way serviceable to their comfort. Honor widows, that is, maintain them, 1 Tim. 5: 3.

The sanction is a promise, that thy days may be long; but our Savior waves that, and insists on the penalty in another scripture, which denotes the duty to be highly and indispensably necessary; He that curseth father or mother, let him die the death: this law we have, Exod. 21: 17. The sin of cursing parents is here opposed to the duty of honoring them. Those who speak ill of their parents, or wish ill to them, who mock at them, or give them insulting and opprobrious language, break this law. If to call a brother Raca be so penal, what is it to call a father so? By our Savior's application of this law, it appears, that denying service or relief to parents is included in cursing them. Though the language be respectful, yet what will that avail, if the deeds be not agreeable? It is but like him that said, I go, sir, and went not, ch. 21: 30.

[2.] Let us see what was the contradiction which the tradition of the elders gave to this command. It was not direct and downright, but implicit; their casuists gave them such rules as furnished them with an evasion from the obligation of this command, v. 5, 6. You hear what God saith, but ye say so and so. Note, That which men say, even great and learned men, and men in authority, must be examined by that which God saith; and if found either contrary or inconsistent, it may and must be rejected, Acts 4: 19. Observe,

First, What their tradition was; That a man could not bestow his worldly estate better than to devote it to the service of the temple: and that, when any thing was so devoted, it was not only unlawful to alienate it, but all other

They had already learned Paul's lesson, All things are lawful for me; but I will not be brought under the power of any; especially not of those who said to their souls, Bow down, that we may go over, 1 Cor. 6: 12.

3. What was the complaint of the scribes and Pharisees against them. They quarrel with Christ about it, supposing that He allowed them in it, as He did, no doubt, by his own example. It was well that the complaint was made to Christ; for the disciples themselves, though they knew their duty in this case, were perhaps not well able to give a reason for what they did.

II. Christ's answer to this cavil, and his justification of the disciples. Note, While we stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ has made us free, He will be sure to bear us out.

Two ways Christ replies to them:

I. By way of recrimination, v. 3-6. They were spying notes in the eyes of his disciples, but Christ shows them a beam in their own. What He charges on them is, not barely a recrimination, but such a censure of their tradition as makes not only a non-compliance lawful, but opposition a duty. That human authority must never be submitted to, which sets up in competition with divine authority.

The charge is general, v. 3. They called it the tradition of the elders, laying stress on the antiquity of the usage, and the authority of them that imposed it, as the church of Rome does on fathers and councils; but Christ calls it their tradition. Note, Illegal impositions will be laid to the charge of those who support and maintain them, as well as of those who first invented and enjoined them; Mic. 6: 16.

You transgress the commandment of God.

obligations, though ever so just and sacred were thereby superseded; what was given to the temple they were gainers by; thus their covetousness was, in truth, at the bottom of this tradition.

Secondly, How they allowed the application of this to the case of children. When their parents' necessities called for their assistance, they pleaded, that all they could spare, they had devoted to the treasury of the temple; It is a gift, by whatsoever thou mightest be profited by me, and therefore their parents must expect nothing from them; suggesting what, that the spiritual advantage of what was so devoted would redound to the parents, who must live on that. This, they taught, was a valid plea, and many unthinking, unnatural children they justified in it, and said, He shall be free; so we supply the sense. Some go further, and supply it thus, 'He doth a will, his days shall be long in the land, as having only observed the fifth commandment. The practice of religion would make his refusal to provide for his parents plausible. But the absurdity and impiety of this tradition were evident; for revealed religion was intended to improve, not to overthrow, natural religion; one of the fundamental laws of which is this of honoring our parents; and had they known what that meant, I will have justice and mercy, and not sacrifice, they had not thus made the most arbitrary rituals destructive of the most necessary morals. This was making the command of God of no effect. Note, Whatever leads to, or countenances, disobedience, makes void the command; and they that take on them to dispense with God's law, do, in Christ's account, repeal and annul it. To break the law is bad, but to teach men so, as the scribes and Pharisees did, is much worse, ch. 5: 19. To what purpose is the command given, if it be not obeyed? The rule is, as to us, of no effect, if we be not ruled by it. It is time for Thee, Lord, to work; for they have made void thy law; Ps. 119: 126. But, thanks be to God, in spite of them and their traditions, the command stands in full force, power, and virtue.

2. By way of reprehension; v. 7. Note, It is the prerogative of Him who searcheth the heart, and knows what is in man, to pronounce who are hypocrites. The eye of man can perceive open profaneness, but only the eye of Christ can discern hypocrisy, Luke 16: 15. And as it is a sin which his eye discovers, so it is a sin which of all others his soul hates.

He fetches his reproof from Isa. 29: 13. Well did Esaias prophesy of you. Esaias spoke it of the generation to which he prophesied, yet Christ applies it to these scribes and Pharisees. Note, The reproofs of sin and sinners, which we find in Scripture, were designed to reach the like persons and practices to the end of the world; for they are not of private interpretation, 2 Pet. 1: 20. The sinners of the latter days are prophesied of, 1 Tim. 4: 1. 2 Tim. 3: 1. 2 Pet. 3: 3. Threatenings directed against others, belong to us, if we be guilty of the same sins. The prophecies of Scripture are every day fulfilling.

This prophecy exactly deciphers a hypocritical nation, Isa. 9: 17. 10: 6. Here is,

(1.) The description of hypocrites, in two things.

[1.] In their own performances of religious worship, v. 8. Observe,

First, How far a hypocrite goes; he is, in profession, a worshipper of God. The Pharisees went up to the temple, to pray; he does not

(5.) It is a gift. At Mark 7: 11. it is expressed, "It is Corban" It means probably some person or thing declared, by vow or otherwise, to be given to God, and therefore so sacred, as not to be applied to any other purpose.

Allusion is made to a method of rendering void the precept to relieve parents, practised by the Jews at this time. It was held by the traditions of the elders, that, if a son made a formal devotion to sacred purposes, of those goods which he could afford for the relief of a parent, it was their no, lawful for him to succor his parent. And, what was most strange, he was not held to be bound by his words to devote his estate to sacred uses; but, not to relieve the parent he was involuntarily bound.

(8.) Made the commandment of God of none effect, &c. At 1 Tim. 5: 8.

what respects the duties of religion we ought ever to regard the authority of God. Mere human institutions ought ever to be considered as without authority to bind the conscience. For what right has one man to impose his own invention on another? "To the law and to the testimony" should be our appeal; and if any thing is not divinely appointed, we may neglect it without sin. Hypocrites have ever been more zealous for forms of human appointment, the tradition of man than the law of God.

Hypocrites sow the wind and reap the whirlwind;

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-9. How thankful ought we to be for the written word, when oral traditions are so liable to error, perversion and uncertainty!—Never let us for a moment imagine, that the religion of the Bible can be improved by any possible additions, doctrinal or practical: but common sense will teach a candid inquirer, to distinguish between those circumstances of worship, which each society must order for itself, though none have a right to impose on others, and those inventions, which corrupt the purity, destroy the simplicity, and deform the spiritual beauty, of religious worship.—We should peculiarly advert to our Lord's marked attention to the due performance of relative duties, especially that of children to their parents. No forms, no names, subscription to charities or any thing else, which looks like faith, zeal, or piety, can prove that a true

Christian, who neglects to 'honor his father and mother,' or to supply their wants according to his ability. Temporal death indeed is not now inflicted on him, who curses his parents; yet a far more dreadful punishment will be awarded hereafter to all disobedient children, if they continue impenitent, and they must expect no comfort or blessing from God even in this present world.—Alas! too many 'draw near to God with their mouth, and honor Him with their lips, whilst their hearts are far from Him,' and thus prove that they worship Him in vain. And this is the case, not only among those who 'teach for doctrines the commandments of men,' but even with many who profess evangelical religion, yet neglect relative duties, and evidently commit iniquity, and are fraudulent in their dealings, and oppressive to their dependents. BLOOMFIELD.

'By the traditions of the elders, not only was the Word of God perverted, but his worship also corrupted greatly. Not Jews alone however, have done this: whole Christian churches, as well as sects and parties, have acted in the same way. Men must not mould the worship of God according to their fancy—it is not what they think will do, is proper, or innocent, &c. but what God Himself has prescribed, that He will acknowledge as his worship. However sincere a man may be in a worship of his own invention, or of man's commandment, yet it profits him nothing. Christ Himself says it is in vain: to condemn such may appear to some, illiberal; but, whatever may be said in behalf of sincere heatheens, and others who have no divine revelation, there is no excuse for the man who has the BIBLE before him.'

Verses 10, 11.

When Jesus had thus answered the scribes. He saw good to caution the people also against their delusions: and cogently instructed them that real pollution was not an adventitious matter from without, but the genuine produce of man's fallen nature; and that the tongue was one main instrument, in bringing forth and propagating it. 'A man may bring guilt upon himself, by eating what is pernicious to his health, or they trust in vanity, and vanity will be their recompense.

Thus Christ justified his disciples; and thus the scribes and Pharisees got by cavilling. We read not of any reply they made; if they were not satisfied, yet they were silenced, and could not resist the power wherewith Christ spoke.

V. 10-20. Christ having proved that the disciples, in eating with unwashed hands, were not to be blamed, as transgressing the traditions and injunctions of the elders, shows that they were not to be blamed, as having done any thing in itself evil. Observe,

1. The solemn introduction to this discourse; v. 10. The multitude were withdrawn while Christ discoursed with the scribes and Pharisees; probably those proud men ordered them away, as not willing to talk with Christ in their hearing. But Christ had a regard to them; thus the poor are evangelized; and the foolish things of the world, and things that are despised, hath Christ chosen. He turns from the Pharisees as wilful and unteachable, to the multitude, who, though weak, were humble, and willing to be taught. To them He said, Hear and understand. Note, What we hear from the mouth of Christ, we must give all diligence to understand. Not only scholars, but even the multitude, must apply their minds to understand the words of Christ. Note, There is need of a great intention of mind and clearness of understanding, to free men from those corrupt principles and practices they have been bred up in and long accustomed to; for in that case the understanding is commonly bribed and biased by prejudice.

II. The truth itself laid down, (v. 11.) in two propositions.

1. Not that which goes into the mouth defiles the man. That defiles the man, by which guilt is contracted before God: now what we eat, if we do not eat unreasonably and immoderately, does not this; for to the pure all things are pure, Tit. 1:15. The Pharisees carried the ceremonial pollutions much further than the law intended, which our Savior witnesses against. He was now beginning to teach his followers to call nothing common or unclean; and if Peter, when he was bid to kill and eat, had remembered this word, he would not have said, Not so, Lord. Acts 10:13-15, 28.

2. But that which comes out of the mouth, this defiles a man. We are polluted by the

'by excess in food or liquor; and a Jew might have done it by eating what was forbidden by the law; yet in all these instances, the pollution would arise from the wickedness of the heart, and be just proportionable to it. Doddridge. 'It is evident that, in our Lord's judgment, the whole multitude was capable of understanding those things which the Pharisees did not, and by which the traditions were overthrown.' Whitby.

SCOTT.

(11.) 'The Pharisees thought that some things were impure by nature, and of themselves, and not merely ceremonially, and therefore polluted the soul. This opinion Christ refutes.' ROSENEM.

Verses 12-14.

When our Lord had spoken these words, He retired; as the disciples came to inform Him how greatly the Pharisees were offended; He stumbled, by his attack on their traditions. To this He answered, that every plant which his heavenly Father had not planted, should be rooted up; meaning, that the teaching and traditions of the scribes and Pharisees, not being from God, must be destroyed, to make room for true religion; and it was therefore proper to expose them before all the people. But the words are a universal rule, in respect to teachers, doctrines, observances, and every thing relative to religion: all which is not from God, has no authority or excellency, and cannot be of long duration; and true godliness can never prosper, till these weeds and suckers be extirpated, which draw away the nourishment from its root.

SCOTT.

12 But he answered said, 'Every plant which my heavenly Father hath not planted, shall be rooted up.'

14 'Let them alone: they be blind leaders of the blind.' And if the blind lead the blind, both shall fall into the ditch.

15 Then answered Peter and said unto him, 'Declare unto us this parable.'

16 And Jesus said, 'Are ye also yet without understanding?'

17 Do not ye yet understand, 'that whatsoever entereth in at the mouth goeth into the belly, and is cast out into the draught?'

18 But 'those things, which proceed out of the mouth, come forth from the heart; and they defile the man.'

hated to be reformed, and were marked out for destruction. Two things Christ here foretells concerning them.

1. The rooting out of them and their traditions: v. 13. Not only the corrupt opinions and superstitious practices of the Pharisees, but their sect, way, and constitution were not of God's planting. Note, (1.) In the visible church, it is no strange thing to find plants that our heavenly Father has not planted. It is implied that whatever is good in the church, is of God's planting, Isa. 41:19. What is corrupt, though of God's permitting, is not of his planting; He sows nothing but good seed in his field. Let us not therefore be deceived, as if all must needs be right, that we find in the church, and all those persons and things our Father's plants, that we find in our Father's garden. Believe not every spirit, but try the spirits; see Jer. 19: 23-31, 32. (2.) Those that are of the spirit of the Pharisees, what figure soever they make, and of what denomination soever they be, God will not own them as of his planting. By their fruit ye shall know them. (3.) Those words we speak from an unsanctified heart; so it is that the mouth causeth the flesh to sin, Eccl. 5:6. Christ, in a former discourse, had laid great stress on our words; (ch. 12: 36, 37.) and that was intended for reproof and warning to those that cavilled at Him: this is intended for reproof and warning to those that cavilled at the disciples, and censured them. It is not the disciples that defile themselves with what they eat, but the Pharisees that defile themselves with what they speak spitefully and censoriously of them. Note, Those who charge guilt on others for transgressing the commandments of men, many times bring greater guilt on themselves by transgressing the law of God against rash judging. Those most defile themselves, who are most forward to censure the deficiencies of others.

III. The offence that was taken at this truth, and the account brought to Christ of that offence: v. 12.

1. It was not strange that the Pharisees should be offended at this plain truth. Sore eyes cannot bear clear light; and nothing is more provoking to proud imposers than the undeceiving of those whom they have first blindfolded, and then enslaved. It should seem that the Pharisees were more offended than the scribes; and perhaps they were as much galled with the latter part of Christ's doctrine, which taught a strictness in the government of our tongue, as with the former part, which taught an indifference about washing our hands; great contenders for the formalities of religion being commonly as great contemners of the substantial of it.

2. The disciples thought it strange that their Master should say that which He knew would give so much offence. But He knew what He said, and to whom He said it, and what would be the effect of it, and would teach us: that though in indifferent things we must be tender of giving offence, yet we must not, for fear of that, evade any truth or duty.

Perhaps the disciples themselves stumbled at what Christ said, and therefore objected this that they might themselves be better informed. They seem likewise to be concerned for the Pharisees, though they had quarrelled with them; which teaches us to forgive, and seek the good, especially the spiritual good, of our enemies, persecutors, and slanderers. Weak hearers are sometimes more solicitous than they should be to have wicked hearers offended. But if we please men by concealing the truth, and indulging their errors and corruptions, we are not the servants of Christ.

IV. The doom passed on the Pharisees and their corrupt traditions; coming in as a reason why Christ cared not though He offended them, and therefore why the disciples should not care; because they were a generation of men that hated to be reformed, and were marked out for destruction. Two things Christ here foretells concerning them.

1. The rooting out of them and their traditions: v. 13. Not only the corrupt opinions and superstitious practices of the Pharisees, but their sect, way, and constitution were not of God's planting. Note, (1.) In the visible church, it is no strange thing to find plants that our heavenly Father has not planted. It is implied that whatever is good in the church, is of God's planting, Isa. 41:19. What is corrupt, though of God's permitting, is not of his planting; He sows nothing but good seed in his field. Let us not therefore be deceived, as if all must needs be right, that we find in the church, and all those persons and things our Father's plants, that we find in our Father's garden. Believe not every spirit, but try the spirits; see Jer. 19: 23-31, 32. (2.) Those that are of the spirit of the Pharisees, what figure soever they make, and of what denomination soever they be, God will not own them as of his planting. By their fruit ye shall know them. (3.) Those plants that are not of God's planting shall not be of his protecting, but he rooted up. What is not of God shall not stand, Acts 5: 38. What things are unscriptural, will wither and die or be justly exploded; however, in the great day, these tares that offend will be bundled for the fire. What is become of the Pharisees and their traditions? They are long since abandoned; but the Gospel of truth is great, and will remain. It cannot be rooted up.

2. The ruin of them, and their followers, v. 14. Where.

(1.) Christ bids his disciples let them alone. 'Have no converse with them or concern for them; neither court their favor, nor dread their displeasure; care not though they be offended, they will take their course, and let them take the issue of it. Seek not to please a generation of men that please not God, (1 Thess. 2: 15.) and will be pleased with nothing less than absolute dominion over your consciences. They are joined to idols, as Ephraim, (Hos. 4: 17.) the idols of their own fancy; let them alone, let them be filthy still,' Rev. 22: 11. The case of those sinners is sad indeed, whom Christ orders his ministers to let alone.

(2.) He gives them two reasons for it.

[1.] They are proud and ignorant, v. 14. They are grossly ignorant in the things of God and strangers to the spiritual nature of the divine law, and yet so proud, that they think they see better and further than any; and, accordingly, prescribe to all, and prescribe those who will not follow them. Though they were blind, if they had owned it, and come to Christ for eye-salve, they might have seen, but they disdained the intimation of such a thing; (John 9: 49.) Are we blind also? They were confident that they themselves were guides of the blind, (Rom. 2: 19, 20.) that every thing they said, was an oracle and law; 'Therefore let them alone.' How miserable was the case of the Jewish church! Now the prophecy was fulfilled, Isa. 29: 10, 14. And it is easy to imagine what will be in the end hereof, when the prophets prophesy falsely, and the priests bear rule by their means, and the people love to have it so, Jer. 5: 31.

[2.] They are posting to destruction, and will shortly be plucked into it, v. 14. This must needs be the end of it, if both be so blind, and yet both so bold. Both will be involved in the general desolation coming on the Jews, and both drowned in eternal destruction and perdition. We find (Rev. 22: 15.) that hell is the portion of those that make a lie, and of those that love it when made. The deceived and the deceiver are obnoxious to the judgment of God, Job 12: 16. Note, First, Those that by their cunning craftiness draw others to sin and error, shall not, with all their craft and cunning, escape ruin themselves. If both fall together into the ditch, the blind leaders will fall undermost, and have the worst; see Jer. 14: 15, 16. The prophets shall be consumed first, and then the people to whom they prophesy, Jer. 20: 6. 28: 15, 16. Secondly, The sin and ruin of the deceivers will be no security to those that are deceived by them. Though the leaders of this people cause them to err, yet they that are led of them are destroyed, (Isa. 9: 16.) because they shut their eyes against the light which would have rectified their mistake. Seneca, complaining of most people's being led by common opinion and practice, says, Things are taken on trust, and never examined; and concludes, Hence crowds fall on crowds, in vast confusion. De Vita

(13.) Every plant, &c.] 'Every religious doctrine which has not (God for its author. Such dogmas as are founded neither on Divine revelation nor on human reason, but are contrary to both and therefore deserving of being rejected and eradicated. Verses 15-20.

Peter, hearing this answer, in the name of all the apostles, desired of Christ an explanation; probably it seemed to them contrary to the Mosaic law, as well as to the traditions of the scribes. And Jesus, removing their dullness, proceeded to show them, that food, (if not unlawful or impure,) could not by any contracted pollution defile them: [152] for it entered not into the heart, and had no effect on the state of the soul; but went into the stomach, and all which was unsuitable to nourish the body, was carried off by a regular process of nature, without communicating any sinful defilement. But what proceeded out of the mouth, came from the heart; when lies, impiety, blasphemy, or wickedness were uttered, corrupt nature expressed itself; and this defiled a man in the sight of God. Crimes were indeed perpetrated by the body, but they were conceived in the heart, and proved its desperate wickedness; this rendered men loathsome and filthy in God's sight; and not eating their meals with unwashed hands.

will seek for instruction. The Pharisees were offended, but kept it to themselves; but the disciples, though offended, sought for satisfaction.

2. Christ's reproof of their weakness and ignorance, v. 16. As many as Christ loves and teaches, He thus relikes. Note, They are very ignorant indeed, who understand not that moral pollutions are abundantly worse and more dangerous than ceremonial ones. Two things aggravated their dullness and darkness.

(1.) That they were the disciples of Christ; 'Ye whom I have admitted into so great a degree of familiarity with Me, are ye so unskilful in the word of righteousness?' Note, the ignorance and mistakes of those that profess religion, and enjoy the privileges of church-membership, are justly a grief to the Lord Jesus.

(2.) That they had been a great while Christ's scholars; 'Are ye yet so, after ye have been so long under my teaching?' Note, Christ expects knowledge, grace, and wisdom in us, according to the time and means we have had. See John 14:9. Heb. 5:12. 2 Tim. 3:7, 8.

3. Christ's explication of the doctrine of pollutions. Though He chid them for their dullness, He did not cast them off, but pitied them, and taught them, as Luke 24:25-27. He here shows us,

(1.) What little danger we are in of pollution from that which entereth in at the mouth, v. 17. An inordinate appetite; intemperance, and excess in eating, come out of the heart, and are defiling; but meat in itself is not so, as the Pharisees supposed. What there is of dregs and defilement in our meat, is cast out into the draught. It may be a piece of cleanliness, but it is no point of conscience, to wash before meat; and we go on a great mistake if we place religion in it. It is not the practice itself, but the opinion it is built on, that Christ condemns, as if meat commended us to God; (1 Cor. 8:8.) whereas Christianity stands not in such observances.

(2.) What great danger we are in of pollution from that which proceeds out of the mouth, (v. 18.) out of the abundance of the heart: compare ch. 12:24. There is no defilement in the products of God's bounty; the defilement arises from the products of our own corruption. Now here we have,

1. The corrupt foundation of that which proceeds out of the mouth; it comes from the heart; that is the spring and source of all sin, Jer. 8:7. It is the heart that is so deperately wicked; (Jer. 17:9.) for there is no sin, in word or deed, which was not first in the heart. There is the root of bitterness, which bears gall and wormwood. It is the inward part of a sinner, that is very wickedness, Ps. 5:9. All evil speakings come forth from the heart, and are defiling; from the corrupt heart comes the corrupt communication.

2. Some of the corrupt streams which flow from this fountain, specified; though they do not all come out of the mouth, yet they come out of the man,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 10-20. When teachers of religion contradict the Word of God, it often becomes necessary not only to answer their objections and arguments, but to point out their errors, and expose their ignorance to the people, and to call on them to hear and understand the truth. It is not, however, generally expedient for us to bring any decided charge of hypocrisy against our opponents, in the manner which became the heart-searching Savior: yet we must, by no means, put either the honor of the clerical order, or our own reputation, in competition with the glory of God, and the salvation of souls. But when scribes and Pharisees are offended with plain truth, timid disciples will be disquieted, and almost disposed to think that their elder brethren have gone too far, even though in other things they honor them, especially when they see those exasperated, whom they had hopes of conciliating. We should however remember, that nothing in religion is of value, except what God Himself has planted; nothing will endure in the soul, but the regenerating work of the Holy Spirit; nothing should be admitted into the church, or be suffered to abide there, but what is of heavenly extraction: and therefore, if hypocrites be detected, false teachers offended, and professed friends changed into avowed enemies, by an open declaration of the truth, we ought not to be disconcerted; for 'the trees of righteousness' will grow more fruitful, when such noxious plants are rooted up. If men quarrel with the word of Christ, we must 'let them alone,' and not 'cast pearls before swine;' yet it is grievous to reflect how the blind have, in every age of the church, undertaken to lead the blind; and what numbers are and are the fruits of that wickedness which is in the heart, and is wrought there, Ps. 58:2.

First, Evil thoughts, sins against all the commandments. Therefore David puts vain thoughts in opposition to the whole law, Ps. 119:113. These are the first-born of the corrupt nature, the beginning of its strength, and do most resemble it. There is a great deal of sin that begins and ends in the heart. Carnal fancies and imaginations are evil thoughts, wicked plots, purposes, and devices of mischief to others, Mic. 2:1.

Secondly, Murders, sins against the sixth commandment; these come from a malice in the heart against our brother's life, or a contempt of it. Hence he that hates his brother is said to be a murderer; he is so at God's bar, 1 John 3:15. War is in the heart, Ps. 55:21. James 4:1.

Thirdly, Adulteries and Fornications, sins against the seventh commandment; those come from the wanton, unclean, carnal heart; and the lust that reigns there, is conceived there, and brings forth these sins, James 1:15. There is adultery in the heart first, and then in act ch. 5:28.

Fourthly, Thefts, sins against the eighth commandment, cheats, wrongs, rapines, and all injurious contracts; the fountain of all these is in the heart, which is exercised in these covetous practices, (2 Pet. 2:14.) set on riches, Ps. 62:10. Achan coveted, and then took, Joshua 7:20, 21.

Fifthly, False witness, against the ninth commandment; this comes from a complication of falsehood and covetousness, or falsehood and malice in the heart. If truth, holiness, and love, which God requires in the inward parts, reigned as they ought, there would be no false-witness bearing, Ps. 64:6. Jer. 9:8.

Sixthly, Blasphemies, speaking evil of God, against the third commandment; speaking evil of our neighbor, against the ninth commandment; these come from a contempt and dislike of both in the heart; thence the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost proceeds; (ch. 12:33, 34.) these are the overflowings of the gall within.

Now these are the things which defile a man, v. 20. Note, Sin is defiling to the soul, renders it unlovely and abominable in the eyes of the pure and holy God, unfit for communion with Him, and for the enjoyment of Him in the new Jerusalem, into which nothing shall enter that defileth, or worketh iniquity. The mind and thus continually plunging together into the pit of destruction; in which the blind leader sinks the deepest, in proportion to the degree of his pride, enmity, and presumption. Yet, as God has sometimes opened the eyes of such blind guides, and changed them into faithful teachers, we should remember still to pray for them, as well as against their wickedness.—In all our difficulties, we should apply to Christ for instruction; and though He reluke us for our want of understanding, yet He will continue to teach us, and his reproofs will tend to our humiliation and increased attention. When He teaches, He will certainly convince men, that their sin and pollution originate from themselves, and not from external causes. He will show them 'the deceitfulness, and desperate wickedness' of the human heart; and whilst they perceive that all the wickedness of every kind, which has filled and corrupted the earth, has been the genuine produce of depraved nature, and that it would have been ten-fold greater but for merciful restraints; they will be led to see and feel, that all this exists in their own hearts, and might be educed by temptation. He will teach them to trace all the streams of their own actual transgressions to this corrupt fountain; to watch the evil thoughts which rise within; to humble themselves for these defilements, and to seek cleansing from them, in 'the Fountain which He hath opened for sin, and for uncleanness'; to consider inward sanctification as far more important than all forms and notions; and to perceive that even truth is no further valuable, than as it tends to purify the heart and conscience.

SCOTT.

Verses 21-24.

After this offence given to the scribes, our Lord retired to the most remote part of the land, in the borders of Tyre and Sidon; and, though the usual proper means for concealing Himself, his coming was soon known. Mark 7:24. For a woman of Canaan, a Syrophenician, probably descended from the ancient Canaanites, a remnant of whom had taken shelter in Tyre and the adjacent regions,) heard of his miracles, having before thus renounced idolatry, and become a worshipper of the true God. Doubtless she was acquainted with the Scriptures of the prophets, probably by means of the Greek translation; and, comparing what she read with what she heard, was satisfied that Jesus was the promised Messiah.

in the coasts of Tyre and Sidon.

22 And, behold, a woman of Canaan came out of the same coasts, and cried unto him, saying, 'Have mercy on me, O Lord, thou Son of David: my daughter is grievously vexed with a devil.'

23 But he answered her not a word. And his disciples came and besought him, saying, 'Send her away; for she crieth after us.'

the coasts of Tyre and Sidon; not to those cities, (they were excluded from any share in his mighty works, ch. 11:21, 22,) but into that part of the land of Israel which lay that way; thither He went, as Elias to Sarepta, a city of Sidon, (Luke 4:26,) to look after this poor woman, whom He had mercy in reserve for. The dark corners of the country, which lay most remote, shall have their share of his benign influences; and as now the ends of the land, so afterward the ends of the earth, shall see his salvation. Isa. 49:6. Here it was, that this miracle was wrought; in the story of which we may observe,

1. The address of the woman of Canaan to Christ, v. 22. She was a Gentile, a stranger to the commonwealth of Israel; probably one of the posterity of those accursed nations that were devoted by that word, Cursed be Canaan. Note, The doom of political bodies doth not always reach every individual member. God will have his remnant out of all nations, chosen vessels in all coasts, even the most unlikely: she came out of the same coasts. If Christ had not now made a visit to these coasts, though the mercy was worth travelling far for, it is probable she had never come to Him. Note, It is often an excitement to a dormant faith and zeal, to have opportunities of acquaintance with Christ brought to our doors.

Her address was very importunate, she cried to Christ, as one in earnest; cried, as being at some distance from Him, not daring to approach too near, being a Canaanite, lest she should give offence. In her address,

(1.) She relates her misery, v. 22. My daughter is possessed. There were degrees of that misery, and this was the worst sort. It was a common case at that time, and very calamitous. Note, The vexations of children are the trouble of parents, and nothing should be more so than their being under the power of Satan. Tender parents very sensibly feel the miseries of their children; 'Though grievously vexed with the devil, yet she is my daughter still.' The greatest afflictions of our relations do not dissolve our obligations to them, and therefore ought not to alienate our affections from them. It was the distress and trouble of her family, that now brought her to Christ; yet, because she came in faith, He did not reject her. Though need drives us to Christ, yet we shall not therefore be driven from Him; and it is good to make the afflictions of others our own, in sense and sympathy, that we may make them our own, in improvement and advantage.

(2.) She requests mercy, v. 22. In calling him Lord, the Son of David, she owns Him to be the Messiah: that is the great thing which faith should fasten on. From the Lord we may expect acts of power; from the Son of David, the mercy and grace which were foretold of Him. Though a Gentile, she owns the promise made to the fathers of the Jews, and the honor of the house of David. The Gentiles must receive Christianity, not only as an improvement of natural religion, but as the perfection of the Jewish religion, with an eye to the Old Testament.

(21.) Inte; 'Rather, towards.' BLOOMFIELD.
(22.) 'In Mark (ch. 7:26) this woman is called "a Greek, a Syro-phenician by nation," here, "a woman of Canaan." Canaan himself inhabited a part of that northern country, with Sidon and Beth, his first-born sons; thence the name of Canaanites distinguished the inhabitants—Jabir, king of Habor, being called "king of Canaan." (Judg. 4:2)—and the kings of Tyre and Sidon, if I mistake not, "kings of the Hittites." 1 Kings 10:29. Now, though Judea, as almost the whole world, had stooped for a long time nearly one hundred and fifty years) under the yoke of the Romans, yet the memory of the Syro-Grecian kingdom, and the name of the nation, had not vanished: the rabbies compute the years, in the captivity, only from the kingdom of the Greeks. This woman, then, was Syro-Grecian by nation, and by habitation a Phenician; thence called a woman of Canaan.'

More mercy, &c.] 'How proper is this prayer for a penitent! Short, humble, full of faith, fervent, modest, respectful, rational, relying only on the mercy of God, persevering.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

conscience are defiled by sin, and that makes every thing else so, Tit. 1:15. This defilement by sin, was signified by the ceremonial purifications, which the Jewish doctors added to, but understood not. See Heb. 9:13, 14. 1 John 1:7.

These therefore are the things we must carefully avoid, and all approaches toward them, and not lay stress on the washing of the hands. Christ doth not yet repeal the law of the distinction of meats, (that was not done till Acts 10.) but the tradition of the elders, tacked to that law; and therefore He concludes, To eat with unwashed hands, (which was the matter now in question,) this defileth not a man. If he wash, he is not the better before God; if he wash not, he is not the worse.

V. 21-23. We have here an account of Christ's casting the devil out of the woman of Canaan's daughter.

I. Jesus went thence. When Christ and his disciples could not be quiet among them, He left them, and so left an example to his own rule, (ch. 10:14.) Shake off the dust of your feet. Though Christ endure long, He will not always endure the contradiction of sinners against Himself. He had said, (v. 14.) Let them alone, and did so. Note, Wilful prejudices against the Gospel, and cavils at it, often provoke Christ to withdraw, and remove the candlestick out of its place, Acts 13:45, 51.

II. When He went thence, He departed into the coasts of Tyre and Sidon; not to those cities, (they were excluded from any share in his mighty works, ch. 11:21, 22,) but into that part of the land of Israel which lay that way; thither He went, as Elias to Sarepta, a city of Sidon, (Luke 4:26,) to look after this poor woman, whom He had mercy in reserve for. The dark corners of the country, which lay most remote, shall have their share of his benign influences; and as now the ends of the land, so afterward the ends of the earth, shall see his salvation. Isa. 49:6. Here it was, that this miracle was wrought; in the story of which we may observe,

1. The address of the woman of Canaan to Christ, v. 22. She was a Gentile, a stranger to the commonwealth of Israel; probably one of the posterity of those accursed nations that were devoted by that word, Cursed be Canaan. Note, The doom of political bodies doth not always reach every individual member. God will have his remnant out of all nations, chosen vessels in all coasts, even the most unlikely: she came out of the same coasts. If Christ had not now made a visit to these coasts, though the mercy was worth travelling far for, it is probable she had never come to Him. Note, It is often an excitement to a dormant faith and zeal, to have opportunities of acquaintance with Christ brought to our doors.

Her address was very importunate, she cried to Christ, as one in earnest; cried, as being at some distance from Him, not daring to approach too near, being a Canaanite, lest she should give offence. In her address,

(1.) She relates her misery, v. 22. My daughter is possessed. There were degrees of that misery, and this was the worst sort. It was a common case at that time, and very calamitous. Note, The vexations of children are the trouble of parents, and nothing should be more so than their being under the power of Satan. Tender parents very sensibly feel the miseries of their children; 'Though grievously vexed with the devil, yet she is my daughter still.' The greatest afflictions of our relations do not dissolve our obligations to them, and therefore ought not to alienate our affections from them. It was the distress and trouble of her family, that now brought her to Christ; yet, because she came in faith, He did not reject her. Though need drives us to Christ, yet we shall not therefore be driven from Him; and it is good to make the afflictions of others our own, in sense and sympathy, that we may make them our own, in improvement and advantage.

(2.) She requests mercy, v. 22. In calling him Lord, the Son of David, she owns Him to be the Messiah: that is the great thing which faith should fasten on. From the Lord we may expect acts of power; from the Son of David, the mercy and grace which were foretold of Him. Though a Gentile, she owns the promise made to the fathers of the Jews, and the honor of the house of David. The Gentiles must receive Christianity, not only as an improvement of natural religion, but as the perfection of the Jewish religion, with an eye to the Old Testament.

Her petition is, Have mercy on me. She doth not limit Christ to this or that particular instance of mercy, but mercy, mercy is the thing she begs; Have mercy on me. Mercies to children are mercies to parents; favors to ours are favors to us, and so to be accounted. Note, It is the duty of parents to be earnest in prayer for their children, especially for their souls. Bring them to Christ by faith and prayer, who alone is able to heal them. Parents should regard it as a great mercy to themselves, to have Satan's power broken in the souls of their children.

2. The discouragements she met in this address: in all the story of Christ's ministry we do not find the like. He was wont to countenance and encourage all that came to Him, and either to answer before they called, or to hear while they were yet speaking; but here was one otherwise treated: and what could be the reason of it? (1.) Because He would not give offence to the Jews, by being as free and forward in his favor to Gentiles as to them. So some. He had bid his disciples not go into the way of the Gentiles, (ch. 10:5,) and therefore would not Himself seem so inclinable to them as to others. Or rather, (2.) Christ treated her thus, to try her; He knew the strength of her faith; He therefore met her with discouragements, that the trial of her faith might be found unto praise, and honor, and glory, 1 Pet. 1:6, 7. This was like God's tempting Abraham, (Gen. 22:1,) or the angel's wrestling with Jacob, only to put him on wrestling, Gen. 32:24. Many of the methods of Christ's providence, and especially of his grace, in dealing with his people, which are dark and perplexing, may be explained with the key of this story, which is for that end left on record, to teach us that there may be love in Christ's heart, while there are frowns in his face, and to encourage us, therefore, though He slay us, yet to trust in Him.

Observe the particular discouragements given her:

[1.] When she cried after Him, He answered her not a word, v. 23. His ear was wont to be always open to the cries of poor supplicants; but to this poor woman He turned a deaf ear, and she could get neither alms nor answer. It was a wonder that she did not fly off in a fret. But Christ knew what He did. He heard her, and was pleased with her, and strengthened her with strength in her soul to prosecute her request, Ps. 133:3. Job 23:6. By seeming to draw away the desired mercy from her, He drew her on to be so much the more importunate for it. Note, Every accepted prayer is not immediately an answered prayer. Sometimes God seems not to regard his people's prayers, like a man asleep or astonished, (Ps. 44:23. Jer. 14:9. Ps. 22:1, 2) nay, to be angry at them; (Ps. 80:4. Lam. 3:8, 44,) but it is to prove, and so to improve, their faith, and to make his after-appearances for them the more glorious to Himself, and the more welcome to them; for the vision at the end shall speak, and shall not lie, Hab. 2:3. See Job 33:14.

[2.] When the disciples spake a good word for her, He gave a reason why He refused her, which was yet more discouraging.

First, It was some little relief, that the disciples interposed on her behalf, v. 23. It is desirable to have an interest in the prayers of good

(21.) 'This was the first instance in which our Lord's aid had been invoked by a person, neither by birth an Israelite, nor by profession a worshipper of the God of Israel. The miracle, which He was presently to work for her, was to be an action of no small importance; being a prelude to the disclosure of the great mystery, that through Him the gate was opened to the Gentiles. It was fit, therefore, that she should be put to some previous trial of her faith, and show herself in some sort worthy of so high a preference.'

Send her away.] 'That is, "Give her a favorable dismissal, and an answer of peace." Doubtless they were surprised at the coldness and silence of Christ; and not presuming directly to press Him, they take another method, and ask Him to remove them from the importunity of the petitioner.'

24 But he answered and said, 'I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel.'

25 Then came she and worshipped him, saying, 'Lord, help me.'

26 But he answered and said, 'It is not meet to take the children's bread, and to cast it to dogs.'

9:55, 10:5, 6, 15:33, Jer. 50:5, 7, 8, 24:5, 6, 18:33, Luke 15:4-6, Acts 13:25, 28, 15:49, Rom. 15:8, 15:13-10, 18:1, 4c.

14:33, 15:14, Mark 9:22, 4, 7:5, Mark 7:27, 28, Acts 22:21, 22, Rom. 9:4, Gal. 2:15, Eph. 2:12.

Gentile is taken away: we many, and if for many, why not for me?

Thirdly, When she continued her importunity, He insisted on the unfitness of the thing, and gave her not only a repulse, but a seeming reproach too; v. 26. This seems to cut her off from all hope, and might have driven her to despair, if she had not had a very strong faith indeed. Gospel-grace and miraculous cures belonged to them to whom pertained the adoption, (Rom. 9:4,) and lay not on the same level with that rain from heaven, and those fruitful seasons, which God gave to the nations whom He suffered to walk in their own ways; (Acts 14:16, 17,) no, these were peculiar favors, appropriated to the peculiar people, the garden enclosed. Christ preached to the Samaritans, (John 4:41,) but we read not of any cures He wrought among them; that salvation was of the Jews; it is not meet therefore to alienate these. The Gentiles were counted dogs by the Jews; and, in comparison with the house of Israel, Christ here seems to allow it, and therefore thinks it not meet that the Gentiles should share in the favors bestowed on the Jews. But see how the tables are turned; after the bringing of the Gentiles into the church, the Jewish zealots for the law are called dogs, Phil. 3:2.

Now this Christ ureth against this woman of Canaan; 'How can she expect to eat of the children's bread, who is not of the family?' Note, 1. Those whom Christ intends most signally to honor, He first humbles and lays low in a sense of their own meanness and unworthiness. We must first see ourselves to be less than the least of all God's mercies, before we are fit to be dignified and privileged with them. 2. Christ delights to exercise great faith with great trials, that, being tried, we may come forth like gold. This general rule is applicable to other cases for direction, though here used only for trial. Special ordinances and church-privileges are children's bread, and must not be prostituted to the grossly ignorant and profane. Common charity must be extended to all, but spiritual dignities are appropriated to the household of faith; and therefore promiscuous admission to them, without distinction, wastes the children's bread, and is the giving of that which is holy to the dogs, ch. 7:6. Off, ye profane.

3. Here is the strength of her faith and resolution. Many, thus tried, would either have sunk down in silence, or broken out in passion. 'Here is cold comfort,' might she have said, 'for a poor distressed creature; as good for me to have staid at home, as come hither to be taunted and abused; not only to have a piteous case slighted, but to be called a dog!' A proud, unhumiliated heart would not have borne it. The reputation of the house of Israel was not now so great in the world, but that this slight put on the Gentiles was capable of being retorted, had the poor woman been so minded. It might have occasioned a reflection on Christ, and might have been a blemish on his reputation, as well as a shock to the good opinion she had entertained of Him; for we are apt to judge of persons as we ourselves find them; and think that they are what they are to us. 'Is this the Son of David?' (might she have said); 'Is this He that has such a reputation for kindness, tenderness, and compassion? I have no reason to give Him that character, for I was never treated so roughly; He might have done as much for me as others; or, if not, He needed not to have set me with the dogs of his flock. I am not a dog, I am a woman, an honest woman, a woman in misery; and I am sure it is not meet to call me dog.' No, here is not a word of this. Note, A humble, believing soul, that truly loves Christ, takes every thing in good part, that He saith and doeth, and puts the best construction on it.

She breaks through all these discouragements.

(1.) With a holy earnestness of desire in prosecuting her petition. This appeared on the former repulse; v. 25. [1.] She continued to pray. Note. The more sensibly we feel the burden, the more resolutely we should pray for the removal of it. And it is the will of God, that we should continue instant in prayer, should always pray, and not faint. [2.] She improved on prayer. Instead of blaming Christ, she seems rather to suspect herself. She fears lest, in her first address, she had not been humble and reverent enough, and therefore now she came, and worshipped Him; or she fears that she had not been earnest enough, and therefore now she cries, Lord, help me. Note, When the answers of prayer are deferred, God is thereby teaching us to pray more, and pray better. It is then time to inquire wherein we have come short. Disappointments in the success of prayer must be excitements to the duty of prayer. Christ, in his agony, prayed more earnestly. [3.] She waives the question, whether she was of those to whom Christ was sent or no. Many weak Christians perplex themselves with questions and doubts about their election; such had better mind their errand to God, and continue instant in prayer for mercy and grace; and then that matter will by degrees clear itself. A fervent, affectionate Lord, help me, will help us over many of the discouragements which are sometimes ready to overwhelm us. [4.] Her prayer is very short, but comprehensive and fervent; Lord, help me. Take this, First, As lamenting her case; 'If the Messiah be sent only to the house of Israel, the Lord help me, what will become of me and mine?' Note, It is not in vain for broken hearts to bemoan themselves; God looks on them then, Jer. 31:18. Or, Secondly, As begging grace to assist her in this hour of temptation. She found it hard to keep up her faith when it was thus frowned on, and therefore prays, Lord, help me; Ps. 63:8. Or, Thirdly, As enforcing her original request; 'Lord, help me; Lord, give me what I come for.' She believed Christ could and would help her, though she was not of the house of Israel; else she would have dropped her petition. Still she keeps up good thoughts of Christ, and will not quit her hold. Lord, help me, is a good prayer, if well put up; and it is pity that it should be turned into a by-word, and we take God's name in vain in it.

(2.) With a holy skillfulness of faith, suggesting a very surprising plea. Christ had placed the Jews with the children, as disciples round about God's table, and had put the Gentiles with dogs, under the table; and she does not deny the aptness of the similitude. Note, There is nothing got by contradicting any word of Christ, though it bear ever so hard on us. But this poor woman, since she cannot object against it, resolves to make the best of it; v. 27. Now here,

[1.] Her acknowledgment was very humble; Truth, Lord. Note, Some that seem to dispraise and disparage themselves, will yet take it as an affront if others do so too; but one that is humbled aright, will subscribe to the most abasing challenges, and not call them abusing. 'Truth, Lord; I cannot deny it; I am a dog, and have no right to the children's bread.' David, Thou hast done foolishly, very foolishly; Truth, Lord. Asaph, Thou hast been as a beast before God; Truth, Lord. Agur, Thou art more brutish than any man; Truth, Lord. Paul, Thou hast been the chief of sinners, art less than the least of saints, not meet to be called an apostle; Truth, Lord.

[2.] Her improvement of this into a plea was very ingenious; Yet the dogs eat of the crumbs. It was by a singular spiritual sagacity, that she discerned matter of argument in that which looked like a slight. Note, A lively, active faith will make that to be for us, which seems to be against us. Unbelief is apt to draw dismal conclusions even from comfortable premises; (Judges 13:22, 23.) but faith can find encouragement even in that which is discouraging, and get nearer to God by taking hold on that hand which is stretched out to push it away. So good a thing it is to be of quick understanding in the fear of the Lord, Isa. 11:3.

Her plea is, Yet the dogs eat of the crumbs. It is true, the full provision is intended for the children only, but the small crumbs are allowed to the dogs. We poor Gentiles cannot expect the stated ministry and miracles of the Son of David, that belongs to the Jews; but they be-biting, insatiable gluttony, filthiness in lust, vomiting and returning to their vomit. Compare Prov. 26:11. 2 Pet. 2:22. Hence the Gentiles, on account of the impurity of their lives, and their being without the covenant, were called dogs by the Jews.' HONNE.

Dogs: 'The bad properties of dogs are, obstinate barking, cruel

27 And she said, 'Truth, Lord: yet the dogs eat of the crumbs which fall from their master's table.'

28 Then Jesus answered and said unto her, O woman, great is thy faith: be it unto thee even as thou wilt. And her daughter was made whole from that very hour.

hid his face from her, but now gathers her with everlasting kindness, v. 27. Then Jesus said, O woman, great is thy faith. This was like Joseph's making himself known to his brethren, I am Joseph: so here, in effect, I am Jesus. Now He begins to speak like Himself, and put on his own countenance. He will not contend for ever.

(1.) He commended her faith. O woman, great is thy faith. Observe, 1. It is her faith He commends. There were several other graces that shone bright in her conduct; but these were the product of her faith, and therefore Christ fastens on that as most commendable; because of all graces faith honors Christ most. 2. It is the greatness of her faith. Note, First, Though the faith of all the saints is alike precious, yet it is not in all alike strong: all believers are not of the same size and stature. Secondly, The greatness of faith consists much in a resolute adherence to Jesus Christ, as an all-sufficient Savior, even in the face of discouragements; to love Him, and trust Him as a Friend, even when He seems to come forth against us as an enemy. This is great faith! Thirdly, Though weak faith, if true, shall not be rejected, yet great faith shall be commended, and shall appear greatly pleasing to Christ: for in them that thus believe He is most admired. Thus Christ commended the faith of the centurion, and he was a Gentile too: he had a strong faith in the power of Christ, this woman in the good-will of Christ; both were acceptable.

(2.) He cured her daughter: 'Be it unto thee as thou wilt: I can deny thee nothing, take what thou earnest for.' Note, Great believers may have what they will for asking. When our will conforms to the will of Christ's precept, his will concurs with the will of our desire. Those that will deny Christ nothing, shall find that He will deny them nothing at last, though for a time He seems to hide his face from them. 'Thou wouldest have thy sins pardoned, thy corruptions mortified, thy nature sanctified; be it unto thee even as thou wilt. And what canst thou desire more? When we come, as this poor woman did, to pray against Satan and his kingdom, we concur with the intercession of Christ, and it shall be accordingly. Though Satan may sift Peter, and buffet Paul, yet, through Christ's prayer and the sufficiency of his grace, we shall be more than conquerors, Luke 22:31, 32. 2 Cor. 12:7, 9. Rom. 16:20.

The event was answerable to the word of Christ; Her daughter was made whole from that very hour; thenceforward was never vexed with the devil any more; the mother's faith prevailed for the daughter's cure. Though the patient was at a distance, that was no hindrance to the efficacy of Christ's word. He spoke, and it was done.

V. 29-39. Here is, I. A general account of Christ's cures. Observe,

1. The place where these cures were wrought; it was near the sea of Galilee, a part of the country Christ was much conversant with. We read not of any thing He did in the coasts of Tyre and Sidon, but the casting of the devil out of the woman of Canaan's daughter, &c. He took that journey on purpose for that. Let not ministers grudge their pains to do good. He that knows the worth of souls, would go a great way to help to save one.

But Jesus departed thence. Having left fall that crumb under the table. He here returns to make a full feast for the children. We may do that occasionally for one, which we may not make a constant practice of. He sat down on a mountain, that all might see and have free access to Him; for He is an open Savior.

2. The multitudes and maladies that were healed by Him; (v. 30.) Great multitudes came to Him; that the Scripture might be fulfilled, Unto Him shall the gathering of the people be, Gen. 49:10. If Christ's ministers could cure bodily diseases as Christ did, there would be more flocking to them than there is; we are soon sensible of bodily pain, but few are concerned about their souls.

Now, such was the goodness of Christ, that He admitted all sorts of people. He never complained of crowds or throngs, or looked with contempt on the vulgar; the souls of peasants are as precious with Him as the souls of princes.

Such was the power of Christ, that He healed all sorts of diseases; those that came to Him brought their sick relations and friends along with them, v. 30. We read not of any thing they said to Him, but they laid them down before Him as objects of pity, to be looked on by Him. Their calamities spoke more for them than the tongue of the most eloquent orator. David shouted before Goliath's corpse, that was enough, he then left it with Him, Ps. 142:2. Whatever our case is, the only way to find ease and relief is, to lay it at Christ's feet, and submit it to Him. Those that would have spi-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 21-23. Our divine Savior is 'the same yesterday, to-day, and forever'; and still He sees good to vary the expressions of his love to those who wait on Him. Sinners of every nation and description are alike welcome to his salvation, and He will in no wise cast out those who cry to Him for mercy. Yet He can veil the compassions of his heart under a frowning countenance; not only to humble and prove those whom He loves, but also to show the strength of their faith, and the depth of their humility. In some cases the disciples may seem more compassionate than their Lord: but when the folly and selfishness of their pity, and the wisdom and mercy of his frowns and delays, come to be compared, the case will appear far otherwise; and the event will prove that 'He is rich in mercy to all them that call on Him.' Let then such as seek help from Him, and receive no gracious answer, increase their importunity, and endeavor, with heavenly skill, to turn even their unworthiness and discouragements into arguments, with which to plead before his mercy-seat. Let sinners submit without reserve to every humiliating charge, and rely on his mercy. Thus, whilst they allow that they are not 'worthy of the crumbs from his table,' they may expect to be supplied with children's food, for He cannot be impoverished by his bounty to the most atrocious transgressors. Indeed true faith gathers strength by trials, as healthy bodies do by exercise; and when the Lord has sufficiently proved the waiting soul, He will honor faith and humble perseverance, and abundantly answer every believing prayer.

'The case of the Canaanitish woman is in itself a thousand sermons. Her faith—her prayers—her perseverance—her success—the honor she received from her Lord &c. How instructively, how powerfully do these speak and plead! What a profusion of light does this single case throw upon the manner in which Christ sometimes exercises the faith and patience of his followers! They that seek shall find, is the great lesson inculcated in this short history. God is ever the same. Reader, follow on after God—cry—pray—plead—all in Him is for thee! Thou canst not perish, if thou continuest to believe and pray. The Lord will help thee.'

30 And great multitudes came unto him, having with them those that were lame, blind, dumb, maimed, and many others, and cast them down at Jesus' feet; and he healed them:

31 Insomuch that the multitude wondered when they saw ^a the dumb to speak, ^b the maimed to be whole, ^c the lame to walk, and the blind to see: ^d and they glorified the ^e God of Israel.

32 Then [†] Jesus called his disciples unto him, and said, [†] I have compassion on the multitude, because they continue with me now [†] three days, [†] and have nothing to eat: and I will not send them away fasting, [†] lest they faint in the way.

33 And his disciples say unto him, ^v Whence should we have so much bread in the wilderness, as ^z to fill so great a multitude?

34 And Jesus saith unto them, ^a How many loaves have ye? And they said, Seven, and ^a ^b few little fishes.

35 And he commanded the multitude ^c to sit down on the ground.

36 And he took the seven loaves and the fishes, ^d and gave thanks, and brake them, and gave to his disciples, and the disciples to the multitude.

ritual healing from Christ, must lay themselves at his feet, to be ruled and ordered as He pleaseth.

Here were lame, blind, dumb, maimed, and many others, brought to Christ. See what work sin has made! It has turned the world into a hospital; See what work the Savior makes! He conquers those hosts of enemies to mankind. He sent his word, and healed them. Note, All diseases are at the command of Christ, to go and come as He bids them. 'This is an instance of Christ's power, which may comfort us in all our weaknesses; and of his pity, which may comfort us in all our miseries.

3. The influence that this had on the people,
v. 31.

They wondered, and well they might. It is the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous, Ps. 118: 23. The spiritual cures that Christ works, are wonderful. When blind souls are made to see by faith, the dumb to speak in prayer, the lame to walk in holy obedience, it is to be wondered at. Sing unto the Lord a new song, for thus he has done marvellous things.

They glorified the God of Israel, whom the Pharisees, when they saw these things, blasphemed. Miracles, which are matters of our wonder, must be the matter of our praise ; and mercies, which are matter of our rejoicing, must be the matter of our thanksgiving. Those that were healed, glorified God ; if He heal our diseases, all that is within us must bless his holy name ; and if we have been graciously preserved from blindness, and lameness, and dumbness, we have as much reason to bless God, as if we had been cured of them : nay, and the standers-by glorified God. Note, God must be acknowledged with praise and thankfulness in the mercies of others as in our own. They glorified Him as the God of Israel, his church's God, a God in covenant with his people, who hath sent the Messiah promised ; and this is He. See Luke 1 : 69. Blessed be the Lord God of Israel. This was done by the power of the God of Israel, and no other could do it.

II. Here is a particular account of his feeding four thousand men with seven loaves, and a few little fishes, as He had lately fed five thousand with five loaves. The guests indeed were now not quite so many as then, and the provision a little more ; which intimates that Christ wrought his miracles as the occasion required, and not for ostentation ; both then and now He took as many as were to be fed, and made use of all that was at hand to feed them with. When once the utmost powers of nature are exceeded, we must say, This is the finger of God; so that this is no less a miracle than the former.

Here is, 1. Christ's pity; v. 32. He tells his disciples this, both to try and to excite their compassion. When about to work this miracle, He called them to Him, and discoursed with them; not because He needed their advice, but because He would give an instance of his condescending love to them. He called them not servants, but treated them as friends and counsellors. Shall I hide from Abraham the thing that I do? Gen. 18: 17. In what He said to them, observe, Maimed.) It is generally allowed, that the word here used, in its primary meaning, signifies such persons as have been deprived of their limbs; and the restoration of them may be considered as one of the most stupendous effects of our Lord's creating power. 'The word' which we render maimed, does in the strictest propriety, signify one who se hand or arm had been cut off; (Mark 9: 43); but it is sometimes applied to those who were only disabled in those parts. It is reasonable to suppose, that among the maimed, who were brought in, there must have been some whose limbs had been cut off; and I will suppose, hardly any of the miracles of our Lord were more illustrious than these.

loaves, and a few little fishes: the fish not proportionable to the bread, for bread is the staff of life. It is probable that the fish was such as they had themselves taken; for they were fishers, and were now near the sea. Note, It is comfortable to eat the labor of our hands, (Ps. 128: 2.) and to enjoy that which is any way the product of our own industry, Prov. 12: 27. And what we have got by God's blessing on our labor, we should be free of; for therefore we must labor, that we may have to give, Eph. 4: 28.

Secondly, The putting of the people in a posture to receive it; v. 35. They saw but very little provision, yet they must sit down, in faith that they should have a meal out of it. They who would have spiritual food from Christ, must sit down at his feet, to hear his Word, and expect it to come in an unseen way.

Thirdly, The distributing of the provision among them. He first gave thanks. The word used in the former miracle was—He blessed. It comes all to one; giving thanks to God is a proper way of craving a blessing from God. And when we come to ask and receive further mercy, we ought to give thanks for the mercies we have received. He then brake the loaves, (for it was in the breaking that the bread multiplied,) and gave to his disciples, and they to the multitude. Though the disciples had distrusted Christ's power, yet He made use of them now as before; He is not provoked, as He might be, by the weaknesses and infirmities of his ministers, to lay them aside; but still He gives to them, and they to his people, of the Word of life.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 29—39. 'Who can describe the sentiments of these happy creatures, who, without any dangerous or painful operation, found themselves in a moment restored, beyond all the efforts of nature, and prospects of hope! With what pleasure did the ear which had been just opened, listen to his instructive tongue! How did the lame leap round Him for joy; and the maimed extend their recovered hands, in grateful acknowledgments of his new-creating power! The voice of the dumb sang forth his praises in sounds before unknown! The eye of the blind checked the curiosity, which would have prompted it to range over the various and beautiful objects of unveiled nature, to fix its regards on the gracious countenance of Him who had given it the day. Let us further reflect, with what correspondent pleasure must our Lord survey these grateful and astonished creatures, while his benevolent heart took its share in all the delight He gave. These trophies of his greatness! how unlike to those of the field, the monuments of desolation and slaughter! Doddridge.—With what raptures then will they, whose souls have been restored to holiness by his healing grace, forever contemplate and adore their divine Benefactor, and meditate on the price which He paid for their redemption!

And how will He forever behold them with immense complacency, and 'delight over them to do them good!' Let us then wait on Him to open our eyes, that we may behold his glory; to enable us to walk in his ways and to do his will; and to teach us to show forth his praises, that the Father may be glorified in Him, and in us, during life, and forever. And let us copy his example of love, according to the ability which He has given us, delighting to do good and to communicate felicity.—Whilst we are willing to endure hardship, in attending to the concerns of our souls, we may be sure that our gracious Lord will compassionate us under all our troubles, and supply what He sees needful for our temporal support.—But alas! how soon do even believers forget his interpositions in their behalf! How often do we repeat our objections against self-denying and expensive duties, though we never yet were losers by them! And how frequently do our unbelieving doubts revive, under even lighter trials, after we have been delivered out of greater! Lord, 'increase our faith,' and pardon our unbelief; and still renew thy mercies towards us; teaching us to live upon thy fullness and bounty, for all things pertaining to this world, and to that which is to come. Scott.

Magdala.] 'Magdala was a city, and probably a territory, east of Jordan, sometimes called by the rabbins Magdala of Gadara, from its vicinity to that city. Dr. Lightfoot has satisfactorily shown, from the Jewish writers, that it was situated on the south-east side of the lake of Genesareth, a sabbath-day's journey, or two miles from Chammath, near the hot baths of Tiberias, one mile from Jordan, and the same distance from Hippo. It appears to be the same Magdala which Josephus mentions, in his Life, as in the vicinity of Gamala, in Gaulanitis.' GREENFIELD.

NOTES

CHAP. XVI. v. 1. 'THE PHARISEES were the most considerable sect among the Jews, for they had not only the scribes and all the learned men of the law of their party, but they also drew after them the bulk of the people. Josephus speaks of this sect as existing about ful, that the disciples should renew their objection, when Christ had declared his compassionate purpose of feeding the multitude; especially as their provision was something larger than before, and the number present not so great. The word rendered baskets is different from that, we translated, in the preceding chapter, and the same distinction is made in the original, in all the places where either of these miracles is mentioned. Some think that the word in this place signifies a larger basket than the other, but others suppose exactly the contrary. Scott.

m set a table in the wilderness, they tempted Him, saying, Can He give us a sign from heaven?

II. Christ's reply to this demand.

1. He condemns their overlooking the signs they had, v. 2, 3. They were seeking for the signs of the kingdom of God, when it was already among them. The Lord was in this place, and they knew it not. Thus their unbelieving ancestors, whom miracles were their daily bread, asked, Is the Lord among us, or is He not?

To expose this, He notices,

(1.) Their skillfulness and sagacity in other things, particularly in natural prognostications of the weather; 'You know that a red sky over night is a presage of fair weather, and a red sky in the morning, of foul weather.'

There are common rules drawn from observation and experience, by which it is easy to foretell very probably what weather it will be. When second causes have begun to work, we may easily guess at their issue, so uniform is nature in its motions, and so consistent with itself.

We know not the balancings of the clouds, (Job 37: 16.) but we may spell something from the faces of them. This gives no countenance at all to the wild and ridiculous predictions of the astrologers, the star-gazers, and the monthly prognosticators, (Isa. 47: 13.) concerning the weather long before, with which weak people are imposed on; we are sure, in general, that seed-time and harvest, cold and heat, summer and winter, shall not cease. But it is not for us to hypocrisy of the Pharisees, who were the great imposers of the traditions of the elders. Observe,

I. Their demand, and the design of it.

1. They must have a sign of their own choosing; they despised those signs which relieved the necessity of the sick and sorrowful, and insisted on some sign which would gratify the curiosity of the proud. It is fit that the proofs of divine revelation should be chosen by the wisdom of God, not by the follies and fancies of men. The evidence given, is sufficient to satisfy an unprejudiced understanding, but was not intended to please a vain humor. And it is an instance of the deceitfulness of the heart, to think we should be wrought upon by means and advantages we have not, while we slight those we have. If we hear not Moses and the prophets, neither would we be wrought upon though one rose from the dead.

2. It must be a sign from heaven. They would have such miracles to prove his commission, as were wrought at the giving of the law on Sinai. Whereas sensible and terrible signs were not agreeable to the spiritual and comfortable dispensation of the Gospel. Now the word comes more nigh us, (Rom. 10: 8.) and therefore the miracles do so, and do not oblige us to keep such a distance as these did, Heb. 12: 18.

The design was, to tempt Him; not to be taught by Him. If He should shew them a sign from heaven, they would attribute it to a confederacy with the prince of the power of the air; if He should not, as they supposed He would not, they would have that to say for themselves, why they did not believe on Him. And observe their perverseness; then, when they had signs from heaven, they tempted Christ, (1 Cor. 10: 9.) saying, Can He furnish a table in the wilderness? Now that He had furnished a table in the wilderness, they tempted Him, saying, Can He give us a sign from heaven?

II. Christ's reply to this demand.

1. He condemns their overlooking the signs they had, v. 2, 3. They were seeking for the signs of the kingdom of God, when it was already among them. The Lord was in this place, and they knew it not. Thus their unbelieving ancestors, whom miracles were their daily bread, asked, Is the Lord among us, or is He not?

To expose this, He notices,

(1.) Their skillfulness and sagacity in other things, particularly in natural prognostications of the weather; 'You know that a red sky over night is a presage of fair weather, and a red sky in the morning, of foul weather.' There are common rules drawn from observation and experience, by which it is easy to foretell very probably what weather it will be. When second causes have begun to work, we may easily guess at their issue, so uniform is nature in its motions, and so consistent with itself. We know not the balancings of the clouds, (Job 37: 16.) but we may spell something from the faces of them. This gives no countenance at all to the wild and ridiculous predictions of the astrologers, the star-gazers, and the monthly prognosticators, (Isa. 47: 13.) concerning the weather long before, with which weak people are imposed on; we are sure, in general, that seed-time and harvest, cold and heat, summer and winter, shall not cease. But it is not for us to know the particulars, till, by the weather-glasses, or otherwise, we perceive the immediate signs of the change of weather. Let it suffice, that it shall be what weather pierces God; and that should not displease us.

(2.) Their sottishness and stupidity in the concerns of their souls; Can ye not discern the signs of the times?

[1.] 'Do you not see that the Messiah is come?' The sceptre was departed from Judah. Daniel's weeks were just expiring, and yet they regarded not. Christ's miracles, and the gathering of the people to Him, were plain indications that the kingdom of heaven was at hand, that this was the day of their visitation. Note, 1. There are signs of the times, by which wise and upright men are enabled so far to understand the motions and methods of Providence, as thence to know what Israel ought to do, like the men of Issachar, as the physicians from certain symptoms finds a crisis formed. 2. There are many who are skilful enough in other things, and yet cannot or will not discern the day of their opportunities, are not aware when the wind is fair, and so let slip the gale. See Jer. 8: 7. Isa. 1: 3. 3. It is great hypocrisy, when we slight the signs of God's ordaining, to seek for signs of our own prescribing.

[2.] 'Do you not foresee your own ruin coming for rejecting Him? You will not entertain the Gospel of peace, and can you not evidently discern that hereby you pull inevitable destruction on your own heads?' Note, It is the undoing of multitudes, that they are not aware what will be the end of their refusing Christ.

2. He refuses to give them any other sign, (v. 4.) as before, ch. 12: 39. Those that persist in the same iniquities, must expect the same reproofs. Here, as there, (1.) He calls them an adulterous generation; because, while they professed themselves of the true church of God, they treacherously departed from, and brake their covenants with Him. The Pharisees were a generation pure in their own eyes, like the adulterous woman, Prov. 30: 20. (2.) Christ will not be prescribed to; we ask, and have not, because we ask amiss. (3.) He refers them to the sign of Jonas, which should yet be given them; his resurrection from the dead, and his preaching by his apostles to the Gentiles; these were reserved for the last and highest evidences of his divine mission. Note, Though the fancies of proud men shall not be humored, yet the faith of the humble shall be supported, and the unbelief of them that perish, left inexcusable, and every mouth shall be stopped.

This discourse broke off abruptly; He left them and departed. Christ will not tarry long with those that tempt Him, but justly withdraws. He left them as irreclaimable; Let them alone: left them in the hand of their own 144 years B. C. When it arose is uncertain. They had their appellation from a Hebrew word signifying to separate, and were probably, in their rise, the most holy among the Jews, having separated themselves from the national corruption, with a design to restore and practise the pure worship of the Most High. In our Lord's time, they still kept up the outward regulations of the institution, but they had utterly lost its spirit. As to their religious opinions, they still continued to credit that being of God, who received the promises of Moses, the writings of the prophets, the Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Chronicles. These last twelve books occupied, among the Jews, a middle place between the law and the prophets, as divinely inspired. The Pharisees believed, in a confused way, in the resurrection though they received the Pythagorean doctrine of the transmigration of souls. Those, however, who were notoriously wicked, they consigned, on their death, immediately to hell, without the benefit of transmigration, or the hope of future redemption. They held also the predestinarian doctrine of necessity, and the government of the world by fate; and yet inconsistently allowed some degree of liberty to the human will.

The Sadducees had their origin and name from one Sadoc, a disciple of Antigonos of Socho, president of the sanhedrim, and teacher of the law in one of the great divinity schools in Jerusalem, about two hundred and sixty-four years before the incarnation. This Antigonos having often in his lectures informed his scholars that they should not serve God through expectation of a reward, but through love and filial reverence only; Sadoc inferred from this teaching, that there were neither rewards nor punishments after this life, and by consequence that there was no resurrection of the dead, nor angel, nor spirit in the terrible world; and that man is to be rewarded or punished here, for the good or evil he does. They received only the five books of Moses, and rejected all unwritten traditions. From every account that we have of this sect, it plainly appears they were a kind of mongrel deists, and professed materialists. See Prideaux, &c.' [Note. 3: 7.]

(1.) (Notes, Mark 8: 10—13. Luke 12: 54—57.) No two descriptions of bad men could be much more opposite to each other, in principles and conduct, than the Pharisees and Sadducees; yet they were alike enemies to Jesus! (Note, 3: 7—10.) They could find no objection against his conduct and doctrine, but what He answered to their confusion: they therefore came insidiously to make trial of his power, as if 'desiring a sign from heaven,' to satisfy them that He was the Messiah, of which they pleaded, that his other miracles were not a sufficient proof. (Note, 12: 38—40.) The descent of the Holy Spirit on Him at his baptism, and the voice of the Father declaring Him to be his beloved Son, were signs from heaven; yet the Pharisees and Sadducees required some further evidence; and probably they intended to mention some particular sign, or appearance in the heavens, without which they could not be convinced; pursuing thus to make trial of his power.

counsels; so He gave them up to their own hearts' lusts.

V. 5—12. As in many other discourses, Christ here speaks of spiritual things under a similitude, and they misunderstand Him of carnal things. The occasion was, their forgetting to take along with them provisions for their family; usually they carried bread with them, because they were sometimes in desert places; and when they were not, yet this would not be burdensome. But now they forgot. Note, Christ's disciples are often such as have no great forecast for the world.

I. Here is the caution Christ gave them, v. 6. He had now been discoursing with the Pharisees and Sadducees, and saw them to be men of such a spirit, that it was necessary to caution his disciples to have nothing to do with them. Against those that are openly vicious, disciples stand on their guard, but against Pharisees, who are great pretenders to devotion, and Sadducees, who pretend to a free and impartial search after truth, they commonly lie unguarded; therefore the caution is doubled, Take heed, and beware.

The corrupt principles and practices of the Pharisees and Sadducees are compared to leaven; they fermented wherever they came.

II. Their mistake concerning this caution, v. 7. They thought Christ hereby upbraided them, that they were so busy attending to his discourse with the Pharisees, that they forgot their private concerns. Or, that He would not have them ask bread of the Pharisees and Sadducees, lest He should so far countenance them; or expose Himself to mischief from them. Or, they took it for a caution, not to be familiar to eat with them, (Prov. 23: 6.) whereas the danger was not in their bread, (Christ himself did eat with them, Luke 7: 36. 14: 1. 11: 37.) but in their principles.

III. The reproof Christ gave them for this.

1. He re-proves their distrust of his ability and readiness to supply them; v. 8. He does not chide them for their little forecast, as they expected. Note, Parents and masters must not be angry at the forgetfulness of their children and servants, more than is necessary to make them take more heed another time; we are all apt to be forgetful of duty. This should serve to excuse a fault, Peradventure it was an oversight. See how easily Christ forgave his disciples' carelessness, though in such a material point as taking bread; and do likewise. But He chides them for their little faith.

(1.) He would not have them depend on Him for supply, though in a wilderness, nor disquiet themselves with anxious thoughts about it. Note, Though brought into straits through their own carelessness and incontinency, Christ encourages his disciples to trust in Him for relief. We must not therefore use this as an excuse for our want of charity to those who are really poor, that they should have minded their own affairs better, and then they would not have been in need. It may be so, but they must not therefore be left to starve.

(2.) He is displeased at their solicitude. We must endeavor to keep the mean between the extremes of carelessness and carefulness; but of the two, the excess of thoughtfulness about the world worst becomes Christ's disciples. Note, To distrust Christ, and to disturb ourselves when we are in straits and difficulties, is an evidence of the weakness of our faith, which, if it were in exercise as it should be, would ease us of the burden of care, by casting it on the Lord, who careth for us.

(3.) The aggravation of their distrust was, the experience they had so lately had of Christ's power and goodness in providing for them, v. 9, 10. Though they had no bread with them, they had Him with them, who could provide bread for them. If they had not the cistern, they had the Fountain. Do ye not yet understand, neither remember? Note, Christ's disciples are often to be blamed for the shallowness of their understandings, and the slipperiness of their memories. 'Have ye forgot those repeated supplies; five thousand fed with five loaves, and four thousand with seven loaves, and yet they had enough and to spare? Remember how many baskets ye took up.' These baskets were intended for memorials of the mercy, as the pot of manna preserved in the ark, Exod. 16: 32. The meat for their bodies was intended to be meat for their faith, (Ps. 74: 14.) which therefore they should have lived on, now that they had forgotten to take bread. Note, We are perplexed with present cares and distrusts, because we do not duly remember our former experiences of divine power and goodness.

2. He reproves their misunderstanding of his caution; v. 11. Note, Christ's disciples may well be ashamed of the dulness of their apprehensions in divine things; especially when they have long enjoyed the means of grace. He took it ill, (1.) That they should think Him as thoughtful about bread as they were; whereas his meat and drink were to do his Father's will. (2.) That they should be so little acquainted with his way of preaching, and so like the multitude, as to take that literally which He spake by way of parable, ch. 13: 13.

IV. The rectifying of the mistake by this reproof, v. 12. Note, Christ shows us our folly and weakness, that we may stir up ourselves to take things right. He did not tell them expressly what He meant, but repeated what He had said, and so obliged them to arrive at the sense in their own thoughts. Thus Christ teaches by the Spirit of wisdom in the heart, opening the understanding to the Spirit of revelation in the Word. And those truths are most precious, which we have found out after some mistakes. Though Christ did not tell them plainly, yet now they were aware that by the leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees, He meant their way and doctrine. They were leading men, and in reputation, which made the danger of infection by their errors the greater. In our age, we may reckon atheism and deism to be the leaven of the Sadducees, and popery that of the Pharisees, against both which it concerns all Christians to be on their guard.

V. 13—20. We have here a private conference of Christ with his disciples concerning Himself. It was in the coasts of Cesarea Philippi, the utmost borders of the land of Canaan northward. Note, When ministers are abridged in their public work, they should endeavor to do the more in their own families.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12. Ungodly men, of discordant sentiments and parties, readily unite in opposition to the cause of Christ; and infidels, Pharisees and time-servers often postpone their subordinate controversies, that they may join their subtlety and influence in opposing the word of God. Men frequently make accurate observations, and deduce just inferences, in matters of a temporal nature; yet when they return to religious subjects, they seem incapable of understanding the plainest truths, which run counter to their interests, passions, and prejudices. But Christ will convict such disingenuous prevaricators: and, in the mean time, it is commonly best for us to leave them, and not to waste our time, or give them a handle, by disputing with them.—We ought not indeed allowedly to neglect our temporal concerns, in attending to those of our souls; yet if any are betrayed into it occasionally, through great earnestness about spiritual things, they need not fear but the Lord will provide for them. Our main concern should be, to beware of false teachers and false doctrine; and to avoid the leaven of hypocrisy, pride and infidelity: yet even disciples are sometimes more anxious concerning the supply of their wants, than about keeping at a distance from error and sin. This arises from weakness of faith, and will expose them to rebukes.—Shor ^d the Lord interrogate us, under many of our despondings, concerning our past experience of his power, truth, and love, He would soon show us, what cause we have to be ashamed of our present distrust and solicitude, and force us to confess, that we did not properly understand and remember his former interpositions in our favor. But it is well, if we learn to profit by our own dulness and mistakes, and are made more attentive to his instructions.

better know what they said. Christ had not plainly said who He was, but left people to infer it from his works, John 10: 24, 25. Now, 1. He would know what inferences they drew from them, and from the miracles which his apostles wrought in his name.

To this question the disciples answer; v. 14. Some said, He was the Son of David, (ch. 12: 23.) and the great Prophet, John 6: 14. The disciples, however, do not mention that opinion, but only such opinions as were wide of the truth, which they had gathered up from their countrymen. Observe,

(1.) Some say one thing, and others another. Truth is one; but those who vary from that commonly vary one from another. Thus Christ came eventually to send division, Luke 12: 51. Being so noted a Person, every one would be ready to pass his verdict on Him, and those that were not willing to own Him to be the Christ, followed every guess and hypothesis.

(2.) They are honorable opinions; and bespeak their respect for Him, according to the best of their judgment. These were not the sentiments of his enemies, but the sober thoughts of those that followed Him with love and wonder. Note, it is possible for men to have good thoughts of Christ, and yet not right ones, a high opinion of Him, and yet not high enough.

(3.) They all suppose Him to be risen from the dead; which perhaps arose from a confused notion they had of the resurrection of the Messiah, before his public preaching, as of Jonas; or from an excessive value for antiquity; as if it were not possible for an excellent man to be produced in their own age, but it must be one of the ancients returned to life.

(4.) They are all false opinions, built on wilful mistakes. Christ's doctrines and miracles bespoke Him an extraordinary Person; but because of the meanness of his appearance, they will not own Him to be the Messiah, but grant Him to be any thing else.

[1.] Some say, Thou art John the Baptist. Herod said so; (ch. 14: 2.) and those about Him would be apt to say as he did. This notion might be strengthened by an opinion they had, that martyrs should rise again before others; which some think the second of the seven sons refers to, 2 Macc. 7: 9. The King of the world shall raise us up, who have died for his laws, unto everlasting life.

[2.] Some, Elias; taking occasion, no doubt, from the prophecy of Malachi, (ch. 4: 5.) Behold, I will send you Elijah. And the rather, because Elijah (as Christ) did many miracles, and was himself, in his translation, the greatest miracle.

[3.] Others, Jeremias: they fasten on him, because he was the weeping prophet, and Christ was often in tears; or because God had set him over kingdoms and nations, (Jer. 1: 10.) which agreed with their notion of the Messiah.

[4.] Or, one of the prophets. This shows what an honorable idea they entertained of the prophets; and yet they were the children of them that persecuted and slew them, ch. 23: 29. Rather than they would allow Jesus of Nazareth, one of their own country, to be such an extraordinary person as his works bespoken him, they would say, 'It was not he, but one of the old prophets.'

II. He inquires what their thoughts were concerning Him, v. 15. Ye tell Me, what other people say of Me; can ye say better? 1. The disciples had had greater advantages than others, and been better taught. Note, Those who have more acquaintance with Christ than others, should have truer sentiments concerning Him, and be able to give a better account of Him than others. 2. The disciples were trained up to teach others, and therefore it was highly requisite that they should understand the truth themselves. Note, Ministers must be examined before they be sent forth, especially what their sentiments are of

Verse 13.

'Cesarea Philippi was anciently called Panæas, from the mountain of Panium, or Hermon, at the foot of which it was situated, near the springs of Jordan; but Philip the tetrarch, the son of Herod the Great, having rebuilt it, gave it the name of Cesarea in honor of Tiberius, the reigning emperor, and he added his own name to it, to distinguish it from another Cesarea on the coast of the Mediterranean. It was afterwards named Neronias by the young Agrippa, in honor of Nero; and in the time of William of Tyre, it was called Belinas. It was, according to Josephus, a day's journey from Sidon, and one hundred and twenty stadia from the lake of Tiberias; and according to Abulfeda, a journey of a day and a half from Damascus. Many have confounded it with Dan, or Leshem; but Eusebius and Jerome expressly affirm, that Dan was four miles from Panæas, on the road to Tyre. It is now called Banias, and is described by Seetzen, as a hamlet of about twenty miserable huts, inhabited by Mohammedans; but Burckhardt says it contains about one hundred and fifty houses, inhabited by Turks, Greeks, &c.'

Verse 14.

'It was the opinion of the Jewish rabbins (founded on a wrongly interpreted passage of Malachi, see Sirach, 48: 9, 10.) that Elias would appear a short period before the time of the Messiah. Of this there are vestiges in the writings of the Jews. Some maintain that he will come in another body, as Kinchi on Malachi. That the Jews expected the reviviscence of Jeremias appears from Ben Gorion. Those who thought Him one of the prophets risen again, appear to have heard nothing of the birth, &c. of Jesus, but to have recently received their first report of Him from his miracles.'

Christ, and who they say that He is; for how can they be owned as ministers of Christ, that are either ignorant or erroneous concerning Christ? This is a question we should every one of us be frequently putting to ourselves, 'Who do we say, what kind of one do we say, that the Lord Jesus is? Is He precious to us? Is He in our eyes the chief of ten thousand? Is He the Beloved of our souls? It is well or ill with us, according as our thoughts are right or wrong concerning Jesus Christ.

Now let us observe,

(1.) Peter's answer to this question, v. 16. To the former question concerning the opinion others had of Christ, several of the disciples answered, according as they had heard people talk; but to this Peter answers in the name of all the rest. In all companies there are found some warm, bold men, to whom a precedence of speech falls of course; Peter was such a one: yet we find other of the apostles sometimes speaking as the mouth of the rest; as John, (Mark 9: 35.) Thomas, Philip, and Jude, John 14: 5, 8, 22. So that this is far from being a proof of such primacy and superiority of Peter above the rest of the apostles, as the church of Rome ascribes to him. They will needs advance him to be a judge, when the utmost they can make of him, is, that he was but foreman of the jury.

Peter's answer is short, but full, true, and to the purpose, v. 16. Here is a confession of the Christian faith, addressed to Christ, and so made an act of devotion; a confession of the true God as the living God, and of Jesus Christ whom He hath sent, whom to know is life eternal. This is the conclusion of the whole matter.

[1.] The people called Him a Prophet, that Prophet; (John 6: 14.) but the disciples own Him to be the Christ, the anointed One; the true Messiah. It was a great thing to believe this of one whose outward appearance was so contrary to the general idea the Jews had of the Messiah.

[2.] He called Himself the Son of man; but they owned Him to be the Son of the living God. The people's notion of Him was, that He was the ghost of a dead man, Elias or Jeremias; but they know Him to be the Son of the living God, who has life in Himself, and has given to his Son to have life in Himself, and to be the Life of the world. If He be the Son of the living God, He is of the same nature with Him; and though his divine nature was now veiled with the cloud of flesh, yet there were those who looked through it, and saw his glory, the glory as of the Only-begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth. Now can we with an assurance of faith subscribe to this confession? Let us then, with a fervency of affection and adoration, go to Christ, and tell Him so; Lord Jesus, thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God.

(2.) Christ's approbation of his answer; (v. 17-19.) in which Peter is replied to, both as believer and an apostle.

[1.] As a believer, v. 17. Christ shows Himself well pleased with Peter's confession, it was so clear and express. Note, The proficiency of Christ's disciples is very acceptable to Him; and Christ shows him whence he received the knowledge of this truth. At its first discovery in the dawning of the Gospel-day, it was a mighty thing to believe it; all men had not this faith. But,

15 He saith unto them, "But whom say ye that I am?"

16 And Simon Peter answered and said, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God."

17 And Jesus answered and said unto him, "Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-jona: for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee," but my Father which is in heaven.

no achievement of our own, but the free gift of God's grace; so that we have nothing to boast of, Ps. 115: 1. 1 Cor. 4: 7.

[2.] Christ replies to him as an apostle or minister, v. 18, 19. Peter, in the name of the church, had confessed Christ, and to him therefore the promise intended for the church is directed. Note, There is nothing lost by being forward to confess Christ; for those who thus honor Him, He will honor.

God had had a church in the world from the beginning, and it was built on the rock of the promised Seed, Gen. 3: 15. But now, it was requisite that the church should have a new charter, as Christian in relation to a Christ already come. Now here we have that charter; and a thousand pities it is, that this word, which is the great support of the kingdom of Christ, should be wrested and pressed into the service of antichrist. But the devil has employed his subtlety to pervert it, as he did, (ch. 4: 6.) that promise, Ps. 91: 11.

Now the purport of this charter is,

First, To establish the being of the church, v. 18. It is Christ that makes the grant, He who is the church's Head and Ruler. The grant is put into Peter's hand; 'I say it to thee.' The Old-Testament promises relating to the church were given immediately to particular persons, eminent for faith and holiness, as to Abraham and David; which yet gave no supremacy to them, much less to any of their successors; so the New-Testament charter is here delivered to Peter as an agent, but to the use and behoof of the church in all ages, according to the purposes therein specified and contained. Now it is here promised,

1. That Christ would build his church on a rock. This body politic is incorporated by the style and title of Christ's Church. It is a number of the children of men called out of the world, and set apart from it, and dedicated to Christ. It is not thy church, but mine. Peter remembered this, when he cautioned ministers not to lord it over God's heritage. The world is God's, and they that dwell therein; but the church is a chosen remnant, standing in relation to God through Christ as Mediator. It bears his image and superscription.

(1.) The Builder and Maker of the church is Christ Himself; I will build it. It is a temple of Christ's building. Zech. 6: 11, 13. Herein Solomon was a type of Christ, and Cyrus, Isa. 44: 28. The materials and workmanship are his. By the working of his Spirit with the preaching of his word, He adds souls to the church, and so builds it up with living stones; (1 Pet. 2:

Verse 16.

Numbers thought Jesus a deceiver; but those who esteemed Him more highly, had very inadequate apprehensions of his real dignity.—The apostles had, not long before, worshipped Christ, as 'the Son of God.' (See 14: 33.) and their repeated confessions, to the same effect, show what their habitual judgment was, on this subject. Some think, that they only meant to say that He was the Messiah; whereas it is obvious they thus showed, that in this respect they understood the true meaning of the prophecies concerning the Messiah. (Notes, Ps. 2: 7-12.) John 15: 66-71. 9: 35-38. 11: 27-27.]

SCOTT.

Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God. 'Every word here is emphatic—a most concise, and yet comprehensive confession of faith. The Christ, or Messiah, points out his divinity, and shows his office—the Son, designates his person: on this account it is, that both are joined together so frequently in the new covenant. Of the living God—literally, of God, the Living one. Living—a character applied to the Supreme Being, not only to distinguish Him from the dead idols of paganism, but also to point Him out as the source of life, present, spiritual, and eternal. Probably there is an allusion here to the great name Yehv, or Yehovah: which properly signifies being, or existence.'

Dr. A. CLARKE.

Verse 17.

Others had enjoyed the same outward means, but were not yet brought to believe in Jesus, "as the Christ, the Son of the living God" and the teaching of God alone, had made him differ from his unbelievers.

First, Peter had the happiness of it; Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-jona. He reminds him of the obscurity of his extraction; he was Bar-jona—The son of a dove: so some. Having reminded him of this, He makes him sensible of his great happiness as a believer; Blessed art thou. Note, True believers are truly blessed. All happiness attends the right knowledge of Christ.

Secondly, God must have the glory of it; For flesh and blood have not revealed it to thee. Thou hadst this neither by the invention of thy own wit, nor by the instruction of others; neither from nature nor from education, but from my Father, who is in heaven. Note, 1. The Christian religion is a religion given by inspiration of God, not the learning of philosophers, nor the politics of statesmen. 2. Saving faith is the gift of God, wrought by Him, as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, for his sake, and on the score of his mediation, Phil. 1: 29. Therefore thou art blessed, because my Father has revealed it to thee. Note, The revealing of Christ to us and in us is a distinguishing token of God's good will and a firm foundation of true happiness.

Perhaps Christ discerned something of pride and vain-glory in Peter's confession; a subtle sin apt to mingle itself even with our good duties. It is hard for good men to compare themselves with others, and not to have too great a conceit of themselves; to prevent which, we should consider that our preference to others is

5.) and building is a progressive work; the church in this world is but in the forming. It is comfort to all who wish well to the church, that Christ, who has divine wisdom and power undertakes to build it.

(2.) The foundation on which it is built is, this Rock; and it must be meant, Christ, for other foundation can no man lay. See Isa. 28: 16.

[1.] The church is built on a rock; Christ would not build on the sand. A rock is high Ps. 61: 2. Christ's church does not stand on a level with this world; a rock is large, so is the church's foundation; and the more large, the more firm; those are not the church's friends, that narrow its foundations.

[2.] It is built on this rock; thou art Peter, which signifies a stone or rock; Christ gave him that name when He first called him, (John 1: 42.) and here He confirms it; 'Peter, thou dost answer thy name, thou art a solid, substantial disciple, fixed and stayed, not shaken with the waves of men's fluctuating opinions concerning Me, but established in the present truth,' 2 Pet. 1: 12. From the mention of this significant name, occasion is taken for this metaphor of building on a rock.

1st, Some by this rock understand Peter himself as an apostle. The church is built on the foundation of the apostles; (Eph. 2: 20.) hence their names are said to be written in the foundations of the new Jerusalem, Rev. 21: 14. Now Peter being that apostle by whose hand the first stones of the church were laid, both in Jewish converts, (Acts 2.) and in the Gentile converts, (Acts 10.) he might in some sense be said to be the rock on which it was built. Cephas was one that seemed to be a pillar, Gal. 2: 9. But it sounds very harsh, to call a man that only lays the first stone of a building, which is a transient act, the foundation on which it is built, which is an abiding thing. Yet if it were so, this would not support the pretensions of the bishop of Rome; for Peter had no such headship as he claims; much less could he derive it to his successors, and least of all to the bishops of Rome, who, whether they are so in place or no, are not so in the truth of Christianity, past all question.

2dly, Others by this rock understand Christ. 'Thou art Peter, thou hast the name of stone, but on this rock, pointing to Himself, I will build my church.' Perhaps He laid his hand on his breast, as when He said, Destroy this temple, (John 2: 19.) meaning the temple of his body. But this must be explained by those many Scriptures which speak of Christ as the only Foundation of the church; see 1 Cor. 3: 11. 1 Pet. 2: 6. Christ is both its Founder and its Foundation; He draws souls, and draws them to Himself; to Him they are united, and on Him they rest and have a constant dependence.

3dly, Others, by this rock, understand this confession which Peter made of Christ, and this comes all to one with understanding it of Christ Himself. It was a good confession which Peter witnessed, Thou art Christ, the Son of the living God; the rest concurred with him in it.

ing countrymen; his faith and knowledge were of a spiritual and saving nature, and therefore he was blessed. Peter was, at this time, greatly ignorant of many evangelical truths, and even prejudiced against them: he did not understand the plan of redemption by the blood of Christ; he was but little acquainted with his own heart, and with spiritual things; he had a variety of carnal and vain expectations; he was afterwards left to make many gross mistakes, yea, even to commit grievous sins, and to incur rebukes and chastenings; and he had many persecutions to endure, and was at length to die a martyr by a most painful death: yet he was 'blessed,' because he was regenerate, and an upright believer in Christ: having received these introductory benefits, more would in due time be given; (Notes, 13: 12.) and his everlasting happiness was sure. 'Revealed,' does not seem, in this place, to mean the immediate communication of knowledge by inspiration; for that would not have insured Peter's happiness: (Note, 7: 21-23.) but the removing of those proud and carnal prejudices which veiled the hearts of others, that they could not understand what was in itself most plain. (Notes, 1-4. 11: 25-26. 2 Cor. 3: 12-18.) Peter was 'taught of God' and 'his understanding, as to this subject, was opened to understand the Scriptures.'

Flesh and blood. Man; human nature, our bodies as existing and acting in this world. SCOTT. Flesh and blood. 'The Jews use this phrase infinitely times, and by it oppose "men" to "God".'

2. Christ here promises to preserve and secure his church, when it is built; The gates of hell shall not prevail against it; neither against this truth, nor against the church which is built on it.

(1.) This implies that the church has enemies that fight against it, here represented by the gates of hell, that is, the city of hell; the devil's interest among the children of men; the powers and policies of the devil's kingdom, the dragon's heads and horns, by which he makes war with the Lamb. These fight against the church by opposing Gospel-truths, corrupting Gospel ordinances, persecuting good ministers and good Christians; drawing or driving, persuading by craft or forcing by cruelty, to that which is inconsistent with the purity of religion: this is the design of the gates of hell, to root out the name of Christianity, (Ps. 83:4.) to devour the man-child, (Rev. 12:9.) to aze this city to the ground.

(2.) This assures us that the enemies of the church shall not gain their point. While the world stands, Christ will have a church in it, in spite of all the powers of darkness; They shall not prevail against it, Ps. 129:1, 2. This gives no security to any particular church, or church governors, that they shall never err, never apostatize or be destroyed; but that somewhere or other the Christian religion shall have a being.

The roman lives, though in a wilderness, (Rev. 12:14.) cast down, but not destroyed, (2 Cor. 4:9.) as dying, and behold we live, 2 Cor. 6:9. Corruptions grieving, persecutions grievous, but neither fatal. The church may be foiled in particular encounters, but in the main battle it shall come off more than a conqueror.

Peter's confession contains that fundamental truth, respecting the person and office of Christ, upon which, as on a rock, He would build his church. Nor could the powers of death or the entrance into the eternal world, destroy the hope of those who should build on it. Nothing can be more absurd, than to suppose that Christ meant, that the person of Peter was the rock, on which the church should be builded; except it be the wild notion, that the bishops of Rome have since been substituted in his place! 'Their rock is not as our Rock, our enemies themselves being judges.' Without doubt, Christ Himself is the Rock and tried Foundation of the church, and woe be to him who attempts to lay any other! (Note, 1 Cor. 3:10-15.) but Peter's confession is that rock doctrinally. The profession of the truths implied in it constitutes a man a member of the visible church; the vital belief of them constitutes a member of the real church, however he may err in other matters; but nothing less than this can entitle any one to the name of a believer. The Deity of Christ as 'the Son of the living God,' and his human nature as 'the Son of man,' have by turns been opposed; and his union to his prophetic, his priestly, and his kingly office, has been explained away by different descriptions of deceivers. Yet the church, established on the person of Christ, as Emmanuel, the Prophet, Priest, and King of his redeemed people, still subsists; and it will assuredly, ere long, gain a decided victory over all its adversaries of every name on earth or in hell. Such pains have also been taken, to show that the gates of hell Hades, the invisible world do not mean, according to the common interpretation, the power and policy of the devil, and of his angels and servants; but merely death, as the entrance into Hades; and that a resurrection of all true believers to eternal life is especially intended. But Christ came, not only 'to overcome death, but him that hath the power of death, that is, the devil,' and this brings in the substance of the more usual and far more ancient interpretation. Hades here signifies death, or grave, or destruction, and by consequence Satan also, who hath the power of these. Gates may signify, first, power, which consists in arms, which were usually kept over the gates of the cities; secondly, counsel, contrivance, stratagems, policy; because they were wont to sit in council in the gates; thirdly, worldly authority borrowed by Satan from his instruments, the heathen powers of the world, because judgment was wont to be exercised in the gates. "The church" signifies particular persons, (believers, true faithful Christians,) of which the church consists, or the 'whole congregation and society of men.' Hammond. The original word signifies any assembly of people, for whatever purpose, or in whatever way collected; but in the New Testament, it is generally used in the senses above given. Considered as a prophecy, this has been most wonderfully accomplished, during almost eighteen hundred years, during a vast proportion of which, the professed friends of the church have combined with her avowed enemies to destroy her, by power and policy, by persecution and heresies, and by every imaginable way; but all in vain. 'The gates of hell' have not prevailed, and shall not prevail against her. 'Heaven and earth shall pass away, but Christ's words shall not pass away.' Let it be remarked, that our Lord says, 'I will build,' &c. but the church is 'God's building and his church,' (Cor. 3:9.)

Scott. The original Greek means a congregation, or assembly

'Now,' saith Christ, 'this is that great truth on which I will build my church.' 1. Take away this truth itself, and the universal church falls to the ground. If Christ be not the Son of God, Christianity is a cheat, and the church is a mere chimera; our preaching is vain, your faith is vain, and you are yet in your sins, 1 Cor. 15:14, 17. 2. Take away the faith and confession of this truth from any particular church, and it ceases to be a part of Christ's church, and relapses to the state and character of infidelity. This is that article, with the admission or the denial of which, the church either rises or falls; those who let go this, do not hold the foundation; and though they may call themselves Christians, they give themselves the lie; for the church is a sacred society, incorporated on the certainty and assurance of this great truth; and great it is, and has prevailed.

Particular believers are kept by the power of God, through faith, unto salvation, 1 Pet. 1:5.

Secondly, The other part of this charter is, to settle the order and government of the church.

19. Now this constituting of the government of the church, is here expressed by the delivering of the keys, and, with them, a power to bind and loose. This is not to be understood, of any peculiar power that Peter was invested with, as if he were sole door-keeper of the kingdom of heaven, and had that key of David, which belongs only to the Son of David; no, this invests all the apostles and their successors with a ministerial power to guide and govern the church of Christ, as it exists in particular congregations or churches, according to the rule of the Gospel. All we that are priests, received, in the person of the blessed apostle Peter, the keys of the kingdom of heaven; so Ambrose, De Dignit. Sacerd. Only the keys were first put into Peter's hand, because he was 'the first that opened the door of faith to the Gentiles,' Acts 10:28. Christ, having incorporated his church, appointed the office of the ministry for the keeping up of order and government, and to see that his laws were duly served; I will give thee the keys. He doth not say, 'I have given them,' or 'I do now'; but 'I will do it,' meaning after his resurrection; when He ascended on high, He gave those gifts, (Ephes. 4:8.) then this power was actually given, not to Peter only, but to all the rest, ch. 28:19, 20. John 20:21. He doth not say, The keys shall be given, but, I will give them; for ministers derive their authority from Christ, and all their power is to be used in his name, 1 Cor. 5:4.

Now, 1. The power here delegated, is a spiritual power pertaining to the kingdom of heaven, not a civil, secular power; Christ's kingdom is not of this world; their instructions afterward were in things pertaining to the kingdom of God, Acts 1:3.

good or bad; (hence used, Acts 19:32, for the mob, or confused rabble gathered together against Paul,) and it must have some other word joined to it to determine its nature. In primitive times, before Christians had any stated buildings, they worshipped in private houses, hence the church that was in the house of Aquila and Priscilla (Rom. 16:3, 5. and 1 Cor. 16:19.) and in the house of Nymphas, Col. 4:15. Now as these houses were dedicated to the worship of God each was termed Kyrius oikos, the house of the Lord, which word was contracted into kyriak and kyriake: and hence kirk of the Scotch and kirik of the Saxons, from which by corruption, we have made church, changing the hard Saxon c to ch. Though this term is generally used for the people worshipping in a particular place, yet by a metonymy from the council being put for the congregation, we apply it, as was originally, to the building, which contains the worshipping people. Church is very properly defined in the nineteenth article of the church of England, to be 'a congregation of faithful men, in the which the pure word of God is preached and the sacraments duly ministered, according to Christ's ordinance.'"

Thou art Peter, &c.] Although himself of a different opinion, Horne remarks, "The most eminent of the ancient fathers, as well as some of the early bishops or popes of Rome, particularly Gregory the Great, and likewise several of the most judicious modern commentators, respectively, take this rock to be the profession of faith, which Peter had made, that Christ was the Son of God." Peter's rock.] "The true meaning of Petros, or Peter, is given by Christ when He calls him Cephas, or a stone, and Petros never signifies a rock, according to Leigh. Petra means a rock, which is the regular figurative expression in holy Scripture for a divine Protector, (2 Sam. 22:2, 32. Ps. 18:2. and many other places.) thus this word cannot be applied to any other than God or Christ; thus St. Paul testifies that Christ was the rock of the primitive church, (1 Cor. 10:4.) and a foundation, 1 Cor. 3:2. Peter then was but the stone laid on this foundation rock, as he himself says, (1 Pet. 2:5.) Ye also as living stones are built up a spiritual house, &c. and proceeds to quote that text in Isaiah of a chief corner-stone to be believed on, &c. and this stone which the builders rejected has become the head of the corner. From the whole argument of St. Peter, then it is manifest, that there cannot be any other true head of the church than Christ Himself. So that the pretence for setting up a vicarial head on earth, is not only contrary to St. Peter's instruction to the eastern churches, long after Christ's ascent into heaven, but also to our Lord's promise: Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them. Matt. 18:20."

Dr. A. CLARKE.

Gates of hell.] The original expression is found (and in the same sense) both in the classical, Hellenistic, the Greek and Hebrew versions. By both sacred and profane writers, the expression conveys the very same idea, i. e. the approach to the place of departed souls, the state of the dead, or death itself. So Hom. II. 9:312. Theocr. Idyl. 2:155. &c. The Septuagint uses the same word, Gen. 37:33 Prov. 14:12. 16:25. In Ps. 6:5. and 94:17. the word rendered grave, or silence, is the same in the Greek version. So in 1 Cor. 15. In Is. 38:9. 10. 18. the Greek version uses the same word as those here translated hell. Wisdom of Solomon, 16:13. &c."

the word of God, and to be received accordingly, 1 Thess. 3: 13. John 13: 20.

Now the keys of the kingdom of heaven are,

(1.) The key of doctrine, called the key of knowledge. Your business shall be to explain to the world the will of God, both as to truth and duty; in the common speech of the Jews, at that time, to teach or declare a thing to be unlawful, was to bind; to be lawful, was to loose. Now the apostles had an extraordinary power of this kind; some things forbidden by the law of Moses were now to be allowed, as the eating of such and such meats; some things allowed were now to be forbidden, as divorce; and the apostles were empowered to declare this to the world, and men might take it on their word. When Peter was first taught himself, and then taught others, to call nothing common or unclean, this power was exercised. There is also an ordinary power hereby conveyed to all ministers, to preach the Gospel as appointed officers; to tell people, in God's name, and according to the Scriptures, what is good, and what the Lord requires of them; and they who declare the whole counsel of God, use these keys well, Acts 20: 27.

Some make the giving of the keys to allude to the custom of the Jews in creating a doctor of the law, which was to put into his hand the keys of the chest where the book of the law was kept, denoting his being authorized to take and read it; and the binding and loosing, to allude to the fashion of their books, which were in rolls; they shut them by binding them up with a string, which they untied when they opened them. Christ gives his apostles power to shut or open the book of the Gospel to people, as the case required. See the exercise of this power, Acts 13: 46. 18: 6. When ministers preach pardon and peace to the penitent, wrath and the curse to the impenitent, in Christ's name, they act then pursuant to this authority of binding and loosing.

(2.) The key of discipline, which is but the application of the former to particular persons on a right estimate of their characters and actions; not legislative, but judicial: Such is the power of the keys, wherever it is lodged, with reference to church-membership and privileges. [1.] Christ's ministers have a power to admit into the church; 'Go, disciple all nations, baptizing them; those who profess faith in Christ, and obedience to Him, admit them and their seed members of the church by baptism.' [2.] They have a power to expel and cast out such as have forfeited their church membership; refusing to unbelievers the application of Gospel-promises and the seals of them; and declaring to such as appear to be in the gall of bitterness and bond of iniquity, that they have no part or lot in the matter, as Peter did to Simon Magus, though he had been baptized; and this is a binding over to the judgment of God. [3.] They have a power to restore and to receive in again, on repentance, such as had been thrown out; to loose those whom they had bound; declaring that, if their repentance be sincere, the promise of pardon belongs to them. The apostles had a miraculous gift of discerning spirits; yet even they went by the rule of outward appearances, (as Acts 8: 21. 1 Cor. 5: 1. 2 Cor. 3: 7. 1 Tim. 1: 20.) which ministers may still make a judgment upon, if they be careful and faithful.

Lastly, Here is Christ's charge to his disciples, to keep this private for the present; n.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 13-20. We often foolishly want to know what men say of us; but our blessed Lord had wise, holy and important reasons for making a similar inquiry; and we ought to imitate his manner of grafting instructive observations on every topic of conversation.—There are various opinions concerning the Lord Jesus; but none can be his true disciples, who hesitate to confess, 'that He is the Christ, the Son of the living God.' or who labor to explain away the meaning of such emphatical words. Happy are they, who confess this from an understanding and believing heart! Human teaching alone has not given them this, but it is the gift of their heavenly Father, and an earnest of further favors.—We should learn to make allowances for inquirers who seem to have a teachable spirit, but are yet strangers to many truths: for not the doctrines believed, but the origin, nature, and effects of their faith and knowledge, distinguish the true disciples from other men.—The Person and work of Christ, the Son of God, is the Rock, on which alone the church is built; and let the powers of darkness plot and rage, let infidels and heretics revile and menace as they please, they will never be able to subvert this foundation, or to destroy one soul which rests his hope upon it.—We have not at present such authority as was intrusted to the apostles, and none can forgive sins but God only; yet let no man despise the declarations and censures of faithful ministers: for, as far as they agree with the word of God, they are ratified in heaven.

SCOTT.

Verse 19.

Our Lord next stated the authority, with which Peter would be invested. He had spoken in the name of his brethren, as well as in his own; and doubtless this related to them as well as to him: (18: 13.) but he might be especially addressed, as he first preached the Gospel, after Christ's ascension, both to the Jews, and to the Gentiles; thus opening the kingdom of heaven, as it were, to them both, in which it was impossible that any successor could share with him. Keys were an ancient emblem of authority: (Rev. 3: 7, 8. Note. Is. 22: 22-23.) The expression doubtless immediately related to the authority, which the apostles possessed, as the representatives of Christ, and the principal ministers of his kingdom. (Note. John 21: 19-23. c. 23.) They were endued with the Holy Spirit, that they might infallibly declare his truth to mankind, and determine what was binding on the conscience, and what not; to show what persons ought to be admitted into the church, or excluded from it; to decide on the characters of those whose sins were forgiven, or the contrary; and whatever in these, and similar respects, they bound or loosed on earth, would be bound or loosed in heaven. The apostles themselves had not an infallible insight into the characters of men, and they were liable to mistakes and sins in their own conduct. But they were infallibly preserved from error, in stating the way of acceptance and salvation, the rule of obedience, the believer's character and experience, and the final doom of unbelievers, hypocrites, and apostates. In such cases their decision was absolute, and ratified in heaven, as all will find at last, even they who now despise it. In this respect, their apostolical authority continues in their doctrine as transmitted to us in the New Testament; but all other ministers of whatever rank, name, or age, can do no more than declare the doctrine of the apostles, and apply it to particular cases; by preaching the Word, administering divine ordinances, admitting men into the visible church, or excluding them from it, or by personal encouragement and warning. As far as they proceed according to the Scripture in these things, their decisions are warranted, and ratified in heaven; but not when they mistake either the doctrine, or in its application to particular persons or characters. As no man can see another's heart, and as no man has any inherent power to forgive sin, or the contrary; so all pretensions absolutely to absolve, or retain men's sins, claim more than even apostolical authority; for surely none will maintain that any man can be made a true believer, or a hypocrite, by the erroneous decision of another concerning him. 'Touching the keys, wherewith they may either open or shut the kingdom of heaven, we, with Chrysostom say, 'they may be the knowledge of the Scriptures; with Tertullian we say, the interpretation of the law, (or Word of God,) and with 'Eusebius, we call them the Word of God.' Bp. Jewel. SCOTT.

'Among the Jews, we meet with the phrases bound and loosed thousands of times over. It is used first, in doctrine and in judgments, concerning things allowed or forbidden; in the law. Secondly, to bind is the same as to forbid or to declare forbidden. "I am about to build a Gentile church," saith Christ, "and to thee, O Peter, do I give the keys of the kingdom of heaven, that thou mayst first open the door of faith to them; but if thou askest by what title that church is to be governed, when the Mosaic rule may seem so improper for it, thou shalt be so guided by the Holy Spirit, that whatsoever of the law of Moses thou shalt forbid them, shall be forbidden; whatsoever thou grantest them shall be granted, and that under a sanction made in heaven." Hence when he was ready to use his keys and open the gate of the Gospel to the Gentiles, (Acts 10:) he was aware, from heaven, that the consorting of the Jew with the Gentile, which before had been bound, was now loosed; and the eating of any creature convenient for food, was now loosed which before had been bound; and he in like manner looses both these.' LIGHTFOOT.

Verse 20.

Our Lord, having opened these things in confidence to his disciples, charged them not to speak to others concerning his being the Messiah. Let them collect it from the fulfilment of prophecy, and from his miracles and doctrine; but the time for an explicit declaration of it was not yet come.

(Acts 2:36.) That God hath made this same Jesus both Lord and Christ; there is a time to keep silence, and a time to speak.

V. 21-23. Here.

I. Christ foretells his sufferings. From this time he frequently spake of them. Some hints He had already given, as when He said, Destroy this temple: when He spake of the Son of man being lifted up, and of eating his flesh, and drinking his blood: but now He began to speak plainly and expressly. Note, Christ reveals his mind to his people gradually, and lets in light as they can bear it, and are fit to receive it.

From that time, when they had made that full confession of Christ, that He was the Son of God. When He found them knowing in one truth, He taught them another; for to him that has, shall be given. Let them first be established in the principles of the doctrine of Christ, and then go on to perfection, Heb. 6:1. All truths are not to be spoken to all persons at all times, but such as are proper and suitable to their present state. Now observe,

1. What He foretold.

(1.) The place where He should suffer. Jerusalem, the head city, the holy city. Though He lived most of his time in Galilee, He must die at Jerusalem; there all the sacrifices were offered, there therefore He must die, who is the great Sacrifice.

(2.) The persons by whom He should suffer; the elders, and chief priests, and scribes: these made up the great sanhedrim, which sat at Jerusalem. It was strange that men of knowledge in the Scripture, who professed to expect the Messiah's coming, and pretended to have something sacred in their character, should use Him thus barbarously when He did come. It was the Roman power that condemned and crucified Christ, but He lays it to the chief priests and scribes, as the first movers.

(3.) What He should suffer; many things, and be killed. His enemies' insatiable malice, and his own invincible patience, appear in the variety and multiplicity of his sufferings; nothing less than his death would satisfy them; He must be killed. The suffering of many things is more tolerable; and death, without such prefaces, would be less terrible; but He must first suffer many things, and then be killed.

(4.) What should be the happy issue; He shall be raised again the third day. As the prophets, so Christ Himself, when He testified beforehand his sufferings, testified withal the glory that should follow, 1 Pet. 1:11. His rising again proved Him to be the Son of God, notwithstanding his sufferings; and therefore He mentions that, to keep up their faith. When He spake of the cross and the shaver, He spake in the same breath of the joy set before Him, in the prospect of which He endured the cross, and despised the shame. Thus we must look on Christ's suffering for us, tracing in it the way to his glory; and on our suffering for Christ, looking through it to the recompense of reward. If we suffer with Him, we shall reign with Him.

2. Why He foretold it, (1.) To show that his sufferings were the product of an eternal counsel agreed on between the Father and the Son; thus it behoved Christ to suffer. The matter was settled in the determinate counsel and foreknowledge, in pursuance of his own voluntary undertaking for our salvation; his sufferings were no surprise to Him, but He had a distinct and certain foresight of them, which greatly magnifies his love, John 18:4. (2.) To rectify the mistakes of his disciples concerning the external pomp and power of his kingdom. They counted on nothing but dignity and authority; but here Christ tells them of the cross and sufferings; nay, that the chief priests and the elders, whom, it is likely, they expected to be the supports of the Messiah's kingdom, should be his great enemies and persecutors. Those that follow Christ must be dealt plainly with, and warned not to expect great things in this world. (3.) It was to prepare them for the share of sorrow and fear, which they must have in his sufferings. When He suffered many things, the disciples could not but suffer some; if their Master be killed, they will be seized with terror; let them know it before, that they may provide accordingly.

II. The offence which Peter took at this, (p. 22.) probably he spake the sense of the rest of the disciples, as before, for he was chief speaker. He took Him, and began to rebuke Him. Perhaps Peter was a little elevated with the great things Christ had now said to him, which made him more bold with Christ than became him; so hard is it to keep the spirit humble in the midst of great advancements!

1. It did not become Peter to contradict his Master, or to advise Him. Shall any teach God knowledge? He that reproveth God, let him answer it. Note, When God's dispensations are intricate or cross to us, it becomes us silently to acquiesce, and not to prescribe to the divine will. Unless we know the mind of the Lord, it is not for us to be his counsellors, Rom. 11:34.

2. It savored much of fleshly wisdom, for him to appear so warmly against suffering. It is the corrupt part of us, that is thus solicitous to sleep in a whole skin. We are apt to look on sufferings as they relate to this present life; but there are other rules to measure them by, which, if duly observed, will enable us cheerfully to bear them, Rom. 8:18. See how passionately Peter speaks; 'Be it far from Thee, Lord. God forbid, that thou shouldst suffer and be killed.' Master, spare Thyself: so it might be read. He would have Christ to dread suffering as much as he did. He intimates, likewise, the improbability of the thing, humanly speaking; 'This shall not be unto Thee. It is impossible that one who hath so great an interest in the people as Thou hast, should be crushed by the elders, who fear the people: we that have followed Thee, will fight for Thee, if occasion be; and there are thousands that will stand by us.'

III. Christ's displeasure against Peter for Verases 21-23.

It is probable, that the scribes were at this time fully expecting that Jesus, appearing in external glory, as 'the King of Israel'; but He began to show them that He must suffer, even be put to death. (Notes, 17-19. Mark 10:32-34. Luke 24:26-31.) Thus He proceeded to bring them acquainted with his priestly office. But Peter took Him aside, or by the hand, and expressed to Him his hope, that it should not be so with Him. Thus Peter soon showed how unfit he was to be the rock, on which the church was to be builded. Accordingly Christ turned, and rebuked him in the very terms which He had used in recalling the devil's temptations. (Luke 4:8.) Some wish to soften the apparent harshness of the expression: but doubtless Christ intended to show, that on this occasion Satan spake by Peter, and used him (without Peter's intention,) as an instrument in tempting Jesus to shun the cross. It was therefore proper to recognise Satan, as well as Peter, as the suggestion. Thus Peter was 'an offence,' or attending block; Jesus, for in this instance he spake as a carnal man, who did not properly value, or relish, the spiritual excellency of divine things; but was more disposed to prize and choose the things of men, such as ease, indulgence, honor, and riches, than to understand the doctrine of redemption and the glory of God in it.

Be it far, &c. 'Rather, God forbid, as in 1 Macc. 2:21. I do be it far from thee.' Be merciful to thyself. Peter wished Christ to exert that power in his own behalf which He had often exerted for others. How many Peters are there now in the world, who are in effect saying, This cannot be done unto Thee—Thou didst not give thy life for the sin of the world—it would be injustice to cause the innocent to suffer thus for the guilty. But what said God? His soul shall be made an offering for sin—He shall taste death for every man—the iniquities of us all were laid upon Him. Glorious truth! may the God who published it have eternal praises.

23 But he turned, and said unto Peter, 'Get thee behind me, Satan: thou art an offence unto me; for thou savorest not the things that be of God, but those that be of men.'

24 Then said Jesus unto his disciples, 'If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me.'

25 For whosoever will save his life shall lose it: and whosoever will lose his life for my sake, shall find it.

(1.) Thou art an offence to Me; Thou art my hinderance; (so it may be read; 'thou standest in my way.' Christ was hastening on in the work of our salvation, and took it ill to be hindered, or tempted to start back. So strongly was He engaged for our redemption, that they who but indirectly endeavored to divert Him from it, touched Him in a very tender part. Peter was not so sharply reproved for disowning and denying his Master in his sufferings as he was for dissuading Him from them; though that was the defect, 'this the excess, of kindness. It argues a very great firmness and resolution of mind in any business, when it is an offence to be dissuaded, and a man will not endure to hear any thing to the contrary; like that of Ruth, Entreat me not to leave thee. Note, Our Lord preferred our salvation before his own ease and safety; for even Christ pleased not Himself; (Rom. 15: 3.) He came into the world, not to spare Himself, as Peter advised, but to spend Himself.

See why He called Peter Satan; because, whatever stood in the way of our salvation, He looked upon as coming from the devil. The same Satan that afterwards entered into Judas, maliciously to destroy Him in his undertaking, here prompted Peter plausibly to divert Him from it. Thus he changes himself into an angel of light.

Thou art an offence to Me. Note, [1.] Those that engage in any great and good work, must expect to meet with hinderance and opposition from friends and foes, from within and from without. [2.] Those that obstruct our progress in any duty, must be as an offence to us. Then we do the will of God, as Christ did, whose meal and drink it was to do it, when it is a trouble to us to be solicited from our duty. Those that hinder us from doing or suffering for God, when we are called to it, are Satans, adversaries to us.

(2.) Thou savorest not the things that are of God, but those that are of men. Note, [1.] The things of God, that is, the concerns of his will and glory, often clash with the things of men, that is, with our wealth, pleasure, and reputation. While we mind Christian duty as our way and work, and the divine favor as our end and portion, we savor the things of God; but if these be minded, the flesh must be denied, hazards must be run and hardships borne; and here is the trial which of the two we savor. [2.] Those that inordinately fear, and industriously decline suffering for Christ, when they are called to it, savor more of the things of man than of God.

V. 24-23. Christ, having showed his disciples that He must suffer, and that He was ready and willing to suffer, here shows them that they must suffer too, and must be ready and willing. We have in these verses,

I. The law of discipleship, and the terms on which we may have the honor and benefit of it, v. 24. He said this to his disciples, not only that they might instruct others concerning it, but that by this rule they might examine their own sincerity. Observe,

1. What it is to be a disciple of Christ. When Christ called his disciples, it was the word of command; Follow me. A true disciple of Christ is one that follows Him in duty, and shall follow Him to glory; not one that prescribes to Him, as Peter now undertook to do forgetting his place; but one that comes after Him, as the sheep after the shepherd, the servant after his master, the soldiers after their captain; one that aims at the same end Christ aimed at, the glory of God, and the glory of heaven; one that walks in the same way that He walked in, is led by his Spirit, treads in his steps, submits to his conduct, and follows the Lamb, whithersoever He goes, Rev. 14: 4.

2. What are the great things required of those that will be Christ's disciples; If any man will, be willing, to come. It denotes a deliberate, cheerful, and resolute choice. Many are disciples more by chance or the will of others, than by any act of their own will; but Christ will have his people volunteers, Ps. 110: 3. I is as if Christ had said, 'If any of the people that are not my disciples, be steadfastly minded to come to Me, and if you that are, be in like manner minded to adhere to Me, it is on these terms, these and no other; you must follow Me in sufferings as well as in other things, and therefore when you sit down to count the cost, reckon upon it.'

Now what are these terms?

(1.) Let him deny himself. Peter had advised Christ to spare Himself, and would be ready, in the like case, to take the advice; but Christ tells them all, they must be so far from sparing themselves, that they must deny themselves. Herein they must come after Christ, for his birth, life, and death were all a continued act of self-denial, a self-emptying, Phil. 2: 7. If self-denial be a hard lesson, it is no more than what our Master learned and practised before us, both for our redemption and for our instruction; and the servant is not above his lord. Note, All the disciples and followers of Jesus Christ must deny themselves. It is the fundamental law of admission to Christ's school, and the first and great lesson to be learned in this school, to deny ourselves; it is necessary in order to our learning all the other good lessons that are there taught. We must deny ourselves absolutely, not admire our own shadow, nor gratify our own humor; not lean to our own understanding, nor seek our own things, nor be our own end. We must deny ourselves, comparatively, for Christ, and his will and glory and the service of his interest in the world; for our brethren, and for their good; for ourselves deny the appetites of the body for the benefit of the soul.

(2.) Let him take up his cross. The cross is here put for all sufferings; providential afflictions, persecutions for righteousness' sake, every trouble that befalls us. The troubles of Christians are fitly called crosses, in allusion to the death of Christ on the cross; and it should reconcile us to troubles, and take off the terror of them, that they are what we bear in common with Christ, and such as He hath borne before us. Note, [1.] Every disciple of Christ hath his cross; as each hath his special duty, so each hath his special trouble, and every one feels most his own burden. That is our cross which Infinite Wisdom has appointed for, and a Sovereign Providence laid on us, as fitted for us. We are apt to think, we could bear such a one's cross better than our own; but that is best, which is, and we ought to make the best of it. [2.] Every disciple of Christ must take up that which the wise God hath made his cross. It is an allusion to the Roman custom of compelling those that were condemned to be crucified, to carry their cross: when Simon carried Christ's cross after Him, this phrase was illustrated. 1st. It is supposed that the cross lies in our way, and is prepared for us. We must not make crosses to ourselves. Our rule is, not to go a step out of the way of duty, either to meet

(23.) Satan.] Evil counsellor, as in 2 Sam. 19: 22. i. e. under the appearance of friendship thou givest Me the worst counsel.

ROBERT. Bloomfield. KUNOBLE. Verse 24.

'To deny himself, in the New Testament, is taken for him, who renounces himself, and all the advantages of this life; so that he is prepared to despise and lose all his most valuable possessions, and even his life, for the profession of the Christian religion. The discourse is not concerning vice which is to be renounced, as not a few persons think; but concerning the advantages of this life, of which the follower of Christ must be prepared to suffer the loss with an undisturbed mind.'

Schlosser in Scott. Verses 25, 26. Jesus subjoined two most interesting questions, which are supposed to have been proverbial among the Jews.

26 For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?

27 For the Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father, with his angels; and then he shall reward every man according to his works.

28 Verily I say unto you, There be some standing here, which shall not taste of death, till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom.

any man will set out after Me, in good beginnings, let him continue to follow Me with all perseverance.

That is following the Lord fully, as Caleb did. Those that come after Christ, must fulfil after Him.

II. Arguments to persuade us to submit to these laws, and come up to these terms. Self-denial, and patient suffering, will never be learned if we consult with flesh and blood; let us therefore consult with our Lord Jesus, and see what advice He gives us; and here He gives us,

1. Some considerations proper to engage us to these duties. Consider,

The weight of that eternity which depends on our present choice; v. 25. Here are life and death, good and evil, the blessing and the curse. Observe,

[1.] The misery that attends the most plausible apostasy; Whoever will save his life in this world, if it be by sin, he shall lose it in another. There cannot be a fairer pretence for apostasy than saving the life by it, so cogent is the law of self-preservation; and yet even that is folly, for it will prove in the end self-destruction; the life saved is but for a moment, the death shunned is but as a sleep; but the life lost is everlasting, and the death run upon is the depth and complement of all misery, and an endless separation from all good. Now, let any rational man consider it, take advice and speak his mind, whether there is any thing got, at long run, by apostasy, though a man save his estate, preferment, or life, by it.

[2.] The advantage that attends the most perilous and expensive constancy; Whoever will lose his life for Christ's sake in this world, shall find it in a better, infinitely to his advantage. Note, 1st. Many a life is lost, for Christ's sake, in doing his work, by laboring fervently for his name, by choosing rather to die than to deny Him or his truths. Christ's holy religion is handed down to us, sealed with the blood of thousands. 2dly. Though many have been losers for Christ, even of life itself, yet never any one was, or will be, a loser by Him in the end. The loss of other comforts, for Christ, may possibly be made up in this world; (Mark 10: 30.) the loss of life cannot, but it shall be made up in the other world, in an eternal life; the believing prospect of which hath been the great support of suffering saints in all ages. An assurance of the life they should find, in lieu of the life they hazarded, hath enabled them to triumph over death in all its terrors; to go smiling to a scaffold, and stand singing at a stake, and to call the utmost instances of their enemies' rage but a light affliction.

[3.] The worth of the soul which lies at stake, and the worthlessness of the world in comparison of it; (v. 26.) the same word which is translated his life, (v. 25.) is here translated soul, for the soul is the life, Gen. 2: 7. This alludes to that common principle, that, whatever a man gets, if he lose his life, it will do him no good. But it looks higher, and speaks of the soul as immortal, and a loss of it beyond death, which cannot be compensated by the gain of the whole world. Note, 1st. Every man has a soul, a spiritual and immortal part, which thinks and reasons, has a power of reflection and prospect, which actuals as nobody now, and will shortly act in a separation from the body. Our or miss a cross. We must so manage an affliction, that it may not be a stumbling-block or hindrance to us in any service we have to do for God; None of these things move me. We must take up the cross, go on with it, though it lie heavy. 2dly. We must not only bear the cross, (that a stock or a stone may do,) but we must take it up, and improve it to some good advantage. We should not say, 'This is an evil, and I must bear it, because I cannot help it,' but, 'This is an evil, and I will bear it, because it shall work for my good.' When we rejoice in our afflictions, and glory in them, then we take up the cross. This fitly follows on denying ourselves; for he that will not deny himself the pleasures of sin, and the advantages of this world for Christ, when it comes to the push, will never have the heart to take up his cross. 'He that cannot take up a resolution to live a saint, has a demonstration within himself, that he is never like to die a martyr;' so Abb. Tillotson.

(3.) Let him follow Me, in this particular of taking up the cross. Suffering saints must look unto Jesus, and take from Him both direction and encouragement. Do we bear the cross? We therein follow Christ. He bore it for us, the heavy end of it, the end that had the curse on it, and so made the other light and easy for us. Or, we may take it in general, we must follow Christ in all instances of holiness and obedience. To do well and suffer ill, is to follow Christ. If any man will come after Me, let him follow Me; that seems to be the same thing over again. What is the difference? Surely it is this, 'If any man will come after Me, in profession, and so have the name and credit of a disciple, let him follow Me in truth, and so do the work and duty of a disciple.' Or thus, if we, in good beginnings, let him continue to follow Me, in following the Lord fully, as Caleb did.

That is following the Lord fully, as Caleb did. Those that come after Christ, must fulfil after Him.

II. Arguments to persuade us to submit to these laws, and come up to these terms. Self-denial, and patient suffering, will never be learned if we consult with flesh and blood; let us therefore consult with our Lord Jesus, and see what advice He gives us; and here He gives us,

Every man has a soul, a spiritual and immortal part, which thinks and reasons, has a power of reflection and prospect, which actuals as nobody now, and will shortly act in a separation from the body. Our souls are our own, not in respect of dominion and property, (for we are not our own, All souls are mine, saith God,) but in respect of nearness and concern; for they are ourselves. 2dly. It is possible for the soul to be lost, and there is danger of it. The soul is lost when it is eternal ly separated from all the good to all the evil that a soul is capable of; when it dies as far as a soul can die; when it is separated from the favor of God, and sunk under his wrath and curse. A man is never undone till he is in hell. 3dly. If the soul be lost, it is of the sinner's own losing; Hos. 13: 9. The sinner dies because he will die; his blood is on his own head. 4thly. One soul is worth more than all the wealth, honor, and pleasures of this present time, if we had them. Here is the whole world set in the scale against one soul, and Tekel written on it. This is Christ's judgment, and He is a competent Judge; He had reason to know the price of souls, for He redeemed them; nor would He undervalue the world, for He made it. 5thly. The winning of the world is often the losing of the soul. It is the love of the world, and the eager pursuit of it, that drowns men in destruction and perdition. 6thly. He that loses his soul, though it be to gain the world, will sit down at last an unspeakable loser. When he comes to balance the account, he will find that, instead of the advantage he promised himself, he is irreparably broken and ruined.

What shall a man give in exchange for his soul? Note, If once the soul be lost, it is lost forever. If, after that great price which Christ laid down to redeem our souls, they be so neglected for the world, that they come to be lost, that new mortgage will never be taken off; there remains no more sacrifice for sins, nor price for souls, but the equity of redemption is eternally precluded. Therefore it is good to be wise in time, and do well for ourselves.

2. Here are some considerations proper to encourage us in self-denial and suffering for Christ.

(1.) The assurance we have of Christ's glory, at his second coming to judge the world, v. 27. If we look to the end of all these things, and the posture of souls then, we shall thence form a very different idea of the present state of things. If we see things as they will appear then, we shall see them as they should appear now.

The great encouragement to steadfastness in religion is taken from the second coming of Christ, considering it,

[1.] As his honor; v. 27. To look on Christ in his state of humiliation, so abased, so abused, a reproach of men, and despised of the people, would discourage his followers from taking at y pains, or running any hazards for Him; but with an eye of faith to see the Captain of our salvation coming in his glory, in all the pomp and power of the upper world, will animate us, and make us think nothing too much to do, or too hard to suffer, for Him. The Son of man: He here gives Himself the title of his humble state, to show that He is not ashamed to own it. His first coming was in the meanness of his children, who being partakers of flesh, He took part of the same; but his second coming will be in the glory of his Father. At his first coming, He was attended with poor disciples; at his second, He will be attended with glorious angels; and if we suffer with Him, we shall be glorified with Him, 2 Tim. 2: 12.

[2.] As our concern; v. 27. Observe, 1st. Christ will come as a Judge, to dispense rewards and punishments. 2dly. Men will then be rewarded, not according to their gains in this world, but according to what they were a doing. Then the treachery of backsliders will be punished with eternal destruction, and the constancy of faithful souls recompensed with a crown of life. 3dly. The best preparative for that day is, to deny ourselves, and take up our cross and

Till they see, &c.] This appears to refer to the Mediatorial kingdom our Lord was about to set up, by the destruction of the Jewish nation and polity, and the diffusion of the Gospel throughout the world.

Doddridge refers it chiefly to that providential appearance of Christ for the destruction of Jerusalem, so often called the coming of the Son of man, (Matt. 24: 3. 27, 30, 37.) and the day in which He shall be revealed. Luke 17: 24. 26: 30.

Here good and evil seem to be dispensed promiscuously; we see not apostasy punished with immediate strokes, nor fidelity encouraged with immediate smiles; but in that day all will be set to rights. (2.) The near approach of his kingdom in this world, c. 23. It was so near, that there were some attending Him, who should live to see it. At the end of time, He shall come in his Father's glory; but now, in the fulness of time. He was to come in his own mediatorial kingdom. A specimen was given of his glory a few days after this, in his transfiguration; ch. 17: 1. But this points at Christ's coming by the pouring out of his Spirit, the planting of the gospel-church, the destruction of Jerusalem.

Here was the Son of man coming in his kingdom. Many then present lived to see it, particularly John, who lived till after the destruction of Jerusalem, and saw Christianity planted in the world. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 21-23. We ought not so to regard one part of the Redeemer's character, as to overlook another; but should keep in view, at once, the depth of his voluntary humiliation and sufferings as our great High Priest, and the height of his exaltation as our glorious King. In like manner, we should connect our view of the believer's privileges with that of his duty, and of the cross which he must bear in the way to glory. But it often happens, that men speak so excellently of one part of Christianity, as to be entitled to commendation, and yet betray their ignorance and carnal prejudices, when they give their sentiments on other subjects, and so lay themselves open to deserved rebukes. We must not parley with such as 'are an offence to us,' but decidedly reject their solicitations; showing them, that their false tenderness springs from their 'savoring,' not the 'things of God,' but those of men.'—But what repeated instructions do we need, to teach us to deny ourselves, and to copy the example of our suffering Redeemer; and to convince us, that every disciple must have the spirit of a martyr, whether it ever be put to the trial, or not!—If life is so valuable, that the whole world is a paltry compensation for the loss of it, what words can describe, or computation reach, the worth of an immortal soul? It is the noblest work of God below, formed at first in his own image, possessed of vast and most valuable powers, capable of most exquisite happiness or misery, and intended for eternal existence. Such an invaluable treasure every man is possessed of; but how few seem sensible of its preciousness, or of the danger of losing it! This loss consists in the eternal forfeiture of the favor of God, in deprivation of his image, and banishment from his presence, in the regions of darkness and despair. The souls of all men are in themselves thus lost, by transgression of the holy law of our Creator; yet, through the mercy of the Lord Jesus, none will eventually perish, but the impenitent and unbelieving. Could any man therefore obtain the whole world, and the sure enjoyment of it during a thousand years, as his recompense for neglecting the salvation of the Gospel; he would, through the countless ages of eternity, curse his own folly, in making so mad a bargain. Yet millions lose their souls for the sake of the most trivial gain, or the most worthless indulgence, nay, from mere sloth and negligence! for whatever the object be for which men refuse or forsake Christ, that is the price at which Satan purchases their souls. But, alas, we are all prone to believe the soothing lies of that cruel murderer and his emissaries, and to disbelieve the alarming truths of God and his ministers: we are disposed to procrastinate, or to take it for granted that all is well, when it is far otherwise; and therefore men lose their souls for 'a thing of nought.'—But, what can they give in exchange for them? Alas! death reduces the wealthiest sinner to the level of the meanest beggar, and he has naught to give. The dying transgressor, however wealthy, cannot, with all his treasures, perhaps acquired by iniquity, purchase one hour's respite, in order to seek the mercy of his offended God. The whole world in this case is of no value: 'it cost more to redeem the soul, and that must be let alone forever,' by all who neglect the precious ransom which the Savior once paid, when 'He gave Himself for us, to redeem us from all iniquity, and to purify us to Himself, a peculiar people, zealous of good works.' Let us then learn to value our souls, and Christ as the Savior of ruined souls; and to despise every glittering bait, or formidable danger, by which Satan would allure or fright us from our only refuge. Let us fear coming short of this salvation, and continually anticipate the season when 'the Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father, and all his holy angels with Him, to reward every man according to his works;' for He will mercifully recompense the fruits of his own grace in us, and all our losses and sufferings for his sake: 'but if any man draw back, his soul will have no pleasure in him.' Though our trials must come first, yet they will soon be over: we shall speedily behold our once suffering Savior in his glory, and our transient taste of death will introduce us into 'his presence where is fulness of joy, and pleasures forevermore.' NOTES.

CHAP. XVII. v. 1. 2. (Marg. Ref.—Luke 9: 29.) Our Lord retired to a mountain apart to pray, where He spent the night, as He did on some other occasions: (See Luke 6: 12.) tradition reports that it was Tabor a lofty mountain to the north of Galilee. He was pleased to take with Him Peter, James, and John, but not the other apostles, because it 'seemed good in his sight,' for we cannot assign any other satisfactory reason. The apostles saw their Master daily in 'the form of a servant,' and as the Son of man: but on this occasion, they beheld his glory, as of the Only-begotten of the Father, and had such a discovery of Him 'in the form of God,' as they were able to sustain. (Note, Phil. 2: 9-11.) His disguise was, as they were, laid aside, and He appeared like Himself: 'the Son of righteousness,' 'the Light of the world.' 'The fashion of his countenance was altered,' and 'did shine like the sun;' and his very 'raiment became white as snow, so as no fuller on earth could whiten it.' (Mark 9: 3.) yea, 'white as the light,' and resplendent as lightning. This appearance of Christ, as Man, would give the apostles some faint conception of the Divine glory, which He had with the Father before his incarnation, and which was always inherent in Him, though He saw good to veil it under external meanness. It would serve to interpret to them the meaning of their own confession, 'Thou art the Son of the living God;' and give them an idea of his heavenly glory after his ascension; and of the glory prepared for them also, when changed by his power to be like Him, even in respect of his glorified body. (Notes, 1 Cor. 15: 45-49 Phil. 3: 20, 21.)

of his body remained the same, but the accidents and appearances of it were greatly altered. He was transfigured—metamorphosed. The profane poets amused and abused the world with idle extravagant stories of metamorphoses, and to these some think Peter has a eye, when, being about to mention this transfiguration of Christ, he saith, We have not followed cunningly devised fables, when we made it known unto you, 2 Pet. 1: 16. Christ was both God and man; and in the days of his flesh, He took on Him the form of a servant; (Phil. 2: 7.) though now, in his transfiguration, he put by that veil, appeared in the form of God, (Phil. 2: 6,) and gave his disciples a glimpse of his glory, which could not but change his form.

The great truth which we declare is, that God is light, (1 John 1: 5.) dwells in light, (1 Tim. 6: 16.) covers Himself with light, Ps. 104: 2. And therefore when Christ would appear in the form of God, He appeared in light, the most glorious of all visible objects, the first-born of the creation, and most nearly resembling the eternal Parent. Christ is the Light; while He was in the world, He shined in darkness, and therefore the world knew Him not; (John 1: 5, 10,) but at this time, that Light shined out of the darkness.

Now his transfiguration appeared in two things:

1. His face did shine as the sun, when he goes forth in his strength, so clear, so bright; for He is the Sun of righteousness, the Light of the world. The face of Moses shone but as the moon, but Christ's as the sun, with an innate, inherent light, which was the more sensibly glorious, because it suddenly broke out, as it were, from behind a black cloud.

2. His raiment was white as the light. All his body was altered, as his face was; so that beams of light, darting from every part through his clothes, made them white and glittering. The shining of the face of Moses was so weak, that it could easily be concealed by a thin veil; but such was the glory of Christ's body, that his clothes were enlightened by it.

beautiful, 'standing by itself in the plain of Esdraelon, a short distance from Nazareth, towards the east. After a very laborious ascent of an hour,' continues Maundrell, 'we reached the highest part of the mountain, which is a plain area of an oval figure, about two furlongs in length, and one in breadth. It is inclosed with trees on all parts, except towards the south, and was anciently surrounded with walls and trenches, and other fortifications, of which there are remains to this day. There are in it several cisterns of good water, and three contiguous grottoes to represent the tabernacles Peter proposed to make. From the top of Tabor is a most extensive prospect, which well repays the labor of the ascent.'

(Marg. Ref.) Moses and Elijah were conversing with our Lord, on the painful and ignominious death He was shortly to suffer. (Notes, Luke 9: 23-36. p. 31.) The apostles, hearing at least part of this conversation, probably understood from it, that the persons whom they saw were Moses and Elijah. Elijah was taken up alive into heaven, and doubtless appeared in his glorified body: how Moses appeared is no proper subject for our inquiry; but, as Christ rose 'the first fruits' of all who rise to die no more, there is no ground for the notion, that the body of Moses was raised for the very purpose. This scene was given to the apostles as a realizing apprehension of the invisible world, and of the present felicity of departed believers, to which they would immediately be admitted, if 'faithful unto death.' These two eminent persons attended on Jesus, as servants on their Lord, coming, as it were, on purpose to do Him homage. Moses was the great lawgiver of Israel, and Elijah the chief of the prophets; but they both came, to lay down their commissions and their honors at the Redeemer's feet, in whose person, and obedience unto do, the moral law

III. The companions of it, v. 3. Observe, 1. There were glorified saints attending Him, that as on earth, there were, Peter, James, and John so there might be some to bear record from heaven too. We see here, that they who are fallen asleep in Christ, are not perished, but exist in a separate state, and shall be forthcoming when there is occasion. 2. These two were Moses and Elias, men very eminent in their day; both having fasted forty days and forty nights, as Christ did, and wrought other miracles, and both remarkable at their going out of the world, as well as in their living in it. The Jews had great respect for the memory of Moses and Elias, and in them the law and the prophets honored Christ, and bore testimony to Him; they appeared to the disciples, who saw them, and heard them talk, and, either by their discourse or by information from Christ, knew them to be Moses and Elias. Glorified saints shall know one another in heaven. They talked with Christ. Christ was now to be sealed in his prophetic office, and therefore these two great prophets were fittest to attend Him, as transferring all their honor and interest to Him; for in these last days God speaks to us by his Son, Heb. 1: 1.

IV. The great pleasure and satisfaction that the disciples took in the sight of Christ's glory, v. 4. Peter here expresses,

1. Their delight in this converse; Lord, it is good to be here. Though on a high mountain, rough and unpleasant, bleak and cold, it is good to be here. The soul that loves Christ, and loves to be with Him, loves to go and tell Him so; Lord, it is good for us to be here. This intimates a thankful acknowledgment of his kindness in admitting them to his favor. Note, Communion with Christ is the delight of Christians. All the disciples of the Lord Jesus reckon it good for them to be with Him in the holy mount. It is good to be where Christ is, and whither He brings us; retired and alone with Him, where we may behold the beauty of the Lord Jesus, Ps. 27: 4. It is pleasant to hear Christ, with Moses and the prophets, to see how all the institutions of the law, and all the predictions of the prophets, were fulfilled in Him.

2. Their desire of its continuance; Let us make here three tabernacles. There was in this, as in many other of Peter's sayings, a mixture of weakness and of good will, more zeal than discretion.

(1.) Here was a zeal for this converse with heavenly things, a laudable complacency in the sight they had of Christ's glory. Peter thought this mountain a fine spot to build upon, and was for making tabernacles there; as Moses in the wilderness made a tabernacle for the Shekinah, or divine glory. Note, Those that by faith behold the beauty of the Lord in his house, cannot but desire to dwell there all the days of their life. It is good having a nail in God's holy place, (Ezra 9: 8.) a constant abode; to be was magnified, the ceremonial types fulfilled, the prophecies accomplished, and the end of all preceding dispensations answered. Thus Moses and Elijah bare witness to the apostles, that Jesus was their Lord also; and that, by his coming, the time of the law and the prophets was terminated, and that of the Gospel introduced. (Notes, Mark 9: 2-10. John 1: 15-18. 1 Pet. 1: 10-12.)

SCOTT.
'It was a constant and prevalent tradition among the Jews, that both Moses and Elijah should appear in the times of the Messiah, and to this very tradition the disciples refer, v. 16.'

Verse 4.

With this glorious scene before their eyes, the apostles were heavy with sleep, either overpowered by the splendor, or drowsy through weariness; (Luke 9: 32,) but when they were awakened, Peter, delighted and surprised to see his beloved Master 'appear in glory' and receive such honor, instead of hearkening to the discourse, broke out into an exclamation, that it was most pleasant and desirable for them to continue there, and not to go down any more to meet those sufferings, of which he was so reluctant to hear. (Marg. Ref. l.—See 16: 24-23, v. 22, 23.) But that sacrifice was not yet offered, without which his sinful soul could not have been saved; and most important services were appointed to him and his brethren, for the glory of God and the good of the church, in all succeeding ages. Peter on this occasion also savored the things of men, and was not meet for the spiritual felicity to which he aspired; and he seems to have forgotten the other disciples who were left below, from a regard to his own present ease and comfort. He however scarcely understood the meaning of his own proposal, which was rather the language of his feelings, than of his understanding. (Notes, John 13: 36-38. p. 37. 2 Pet. 1: 12-19.)

Father gave us for our Lord Jesus, in which, He received from Him honor and glory, (2 Pet. 1:17.) when there came this voice from the excellent glory. This was like proclaiming the royal style of a prince; and be it known, to the comfort of mankind, the royal style of Christ is taken from his mediation. Thus, in vision, He appeared with a rainbow, the seal of the covenant, about his throne; (Rev. 4:3.) for it is his glory to be our Redeemer.

Now concerning this testimony, observe,

1. How it came, and in what manner it was introduced, v. 5.

(1.) There was a cloud. We find often in the Old Testament, that a cloud was a visible token of God's presence; He came down on mount Sinai in a cloud, (Exod. 13:9.) and so to Moses, Exod. 34:5. Num. 12:25. He took possession of the tabernacle in a cloud, and afterward of the temple. We know no. 1. balancings of the clouds, but we know that much of the intercourse and communication between heaven and earth is maintained by them; therefore God is said to make the clouds his chariots; so he did here when He descended on this mount.

(2.) It was a bright cloud under the law, God commonly made a thick and dark cloud the token of his presence; Exod. 19:16. 1 Kings 8:12. But we are now come, not to the mount that was covered with blackness and darkness, (Heb. 12:18.) but to the mount that is crowned with a bright cloud. The Old-Testament dispensation was a dispensation of darkness, terror and bondage; the New, is one of light, love, and liberty.

(3.) It overshadowed them; being intended to break the force of that great light, which otherwise would have overcome the disciples, and been intolerable; it was like the veil which Moses put on his face when it shone. God, in manifesting Himself to his people, considers their frame. This cloud was to their eyes as parables to their understandings, to convey spiritual things by things sensible, as they were able to bear them.

(4.) There came a voice out of the cloud, the voice of God, who now, as of old, spake in the cloudy pillar; (Ps. 99:7.) no thunder, or lightning, or voice of a trumpet, as when the law was given by Moses, but only a voice, a still small voice, and that not ushered in with a strong wind, or an earthquake, or fire, as when God spake to Elias, 1 Kings 19:11, 12. Moses then and Elias were witnesses, that in these last days God hath spoken to us by his Son, in another way than He spake formerly to them. This voice came from the excellent glory; (2 Pet. 1:17.) in comparison of which the former had no glory.

2. What it was, v. 5. Here we have,

(1.) The great gospel-mystery revealed, v. 5. This was the very same that was spoken from heaven at his baptism; (ch. 3:7.) the best news that ever came from heaven to earth since man sinned; the same in purport with that great doctrine, (2 Cor. 5:19.) That God was in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself. Moses and Elias were great men, and favorites of Heaven, yet they were but servants, and servants that God was not always well pleased in; for Moses spake unadvisedly, and Elias was a man subject to passions; but Christ is a Son, and in Him God was always well pleased. Moses and Elias were sometimes instruments of reconciliation between God and Israel; Moses was a great intercessor, and Elias a great reformer; but in Christ God is rein holy ordinances as a man at home, not as a wayfaring man.

It argued great respect for his Master and the heavenly guests, with some commendable forgetfulness of himself and his fellow-disciples, that he would have tabernacles for Christ, and Moses, and Elias, but none for himself. He would be content to lie in the open air, on the cold ground, in such good company; if his Master have but where to lay his head, no matter whether he himself has or no.

(2.) Yet in this zeal he betrayed a great deal of weakness and ignorance. What need had Moses and Elias of tabernacles? They belonged to that blessed world, where they hunger no more, nor doth the sun light on them. Christ had lately foretold his sufferings, and bid his disciples expect the like; Peter forgets that, or, to prevent it, will needs be building tabernacles in the mount of glory, out of the way of trouble. Note, There is a proneness in good men to expect the crown without the cross.

Yet it is some excuse for the incongruity of Peter's proposal, not only that he knew not what he said, (Luke 9:33.) but also that he submitted the proposal to the wisdom of Christ; If Thou wilt, let us make tabernacles. Note, Whatever tabernacles we propose to make to ourselves in this world, we must always remember to ask Christ's leave.

Now to this which Peter said, there was no reply made; the disappearing of the glory would soon answer it. They that promise themselves great things on earth, will soon be undeceived by their own experience.

V. The glorious testimony which God the conciling the world; his intercession is more prevalent than that of Moses, and his reformation more effectual than that of Elias.

This repetition of the same voice that came from heaven at his baptism was no vain repetition; but, like the doubling of Pharaoh's dream, was to show the thing was established. It was spoken at his baptism, because then He was entering on his temptation, and his public ministry; and now it was repeated, because He was entering on his sufferings, which are to be dated from hence; for now, and not before, He began to foretell them, and immediately after his transfiguration it is said, (Luke 9:51.) that the time was come, that He should be received up; this therefore was then repeated, to arm Him against the terror, and his disciples against the offence of the cross. When sufferings begin to abound, consolations are given in more abundantly, 2 Cor. 1:5.

(2.) The great gospel-duty required; Hear ye Him. God is well pleased with none in Christ but those that hear Him; we must hear Him, and believe Him, as the great Prophet and Teacher; hear Him, and be ruled by Him, as the great Prince and Lawgiver; hear Him, and heed Him. Whoever would know the mind of God, must hearken to Jesus Christ; for by Him God has in these last days spoken to us. This voice from heaven has made all the sayings of Christ as authentic as if they had been thus spoken out of a cloud; and it refers to that prediction concerning the Prophet God would raise up, like unto Moses; (Deut. 18:18.) Him shall ye hear.

Christ now appeared in glory; and the more we see of his glory, the more cause we shall see to hearken to Him: but the disciples were gazing; they are therefore bid not to look at Him, but to hear Him. Their sight of his glory was soon intercepted by the cloud, but their business was to hear Him. We walk by faith, which comes by hearing, not by sight, 2 Cor. 5:7.

Moses and Elias were now with Him, the law and the prophets; hitherto it was said, Hear them, Luke 16:29. The disciples were ready to equal them with Christ, and probably were desirous to know what they said, when talking with Christ, and to hear something more from them; No, saith God, hear Him, that is enough, and Moses and Elias gave consent to this voice; whatever interest they had in the world as prophets, they were willing to see it all transferred to Christ, that in all things He might have the pre-eminence. Be not troubled that Moses and Elias make so short a stay with you; hear Christ, and you will not want them.

VI. The fright of the disciples at this voice, and the encouragement Christ gave them.

1. The disciples fell on their faces, and were sore afraid. The greatness of the light, and the surprise of it might have a natural influence on them, to dispirit them. But that was not all; ever since man sinned, and heard God's voice in the garden, extraordinary appearances of God have ever been terrible to man, who, knowing he has no reason to expect any good, has been afraid to hear any thing immediately from God. Note, Even then when fair weather comes out of the secret place, yet with God is terrible majesty, Job 37:22. See what dreadful work the voice of the Lord makes, Ps. 29:4. It is well for us that God speaks to us by men like ourselves, whose terror shall not make us afraid.

2. Christ graciously raised them up with abundance of tenderness. It is comficial to think that our Lord Jesus, in his exalted state, still has a compassion for, and condescends to, every true believer. Observe here, (1.) What He did; He came and touched them. His approach banished their fears, and there needed

1. Note, We must come down from the holy mountains, where we have communion with God, and of which we are saying, It is good to be here; even there we have no continuing city. Blessed be God, there is a mountain of glory and joy before us, whence we shall never come down. But observe, When the disciples came down, Jesus came with them. Note, When we return to the world again after an ordinance, it must be our care to take Christ with us.

2. As they came down, they talked of Christ. Note, When we are returning from holy ordinances, our discourse should be suitable to the work we have been about. That communication which is good to the use of edifying, is then a special manner seasonable; as, on the contrary, that which is corrupt, is worse then, than at another time.

Here is, (1.) Christ's charge to the disciples to keep the vision very private for the present; p. 9. If they had proclaimed it, the credibility of it would have been shaken by his sufferings, which were now hastening on. But let us more to make them easy. Christ laid his right hand on John in a like case, and on Daniel, Rev. 1: 47. Dan. 8: 18. 10: 10. Christ's touches were often healing, and here they were strengthening and comforting. (2.) What He said; Arise, and be not afraid. Note, Though a reverential fear is pleasing to Christ, yet a fear of amazement is not so, but must be striven against. Note, It is Christ, by his word, and the power of his grace, that raises up good men from their dejections, and silences their fears; and none but Christ can do it. Causeless fears would soon vanish, if we would not yield to them, but do what we can against them. Considering what they had seen and heard, they had more reason to rejoice than to fear, and yet they needed this caution. Note, Through the infirmity of the flesh, we often frighten ourselves with that wherewith we should encourage ourselves. Observe, After they had had an express command from heaven to hear Christ, the first word they had from Him, was, Be not afraid, hear that. Note, Christ's errand into the world was to give comfort to good people, that, being delivered out of the hands of their enemies, they might serve God without fear, Luke 1: 74, 75.

VII. The disappearing of the vision; p. 8. Moses and Elias were gone, the rays of Christ's glory were laid aside, or veiled again. They hoped this had been the day of Christ's entrance into his kingdom, and his public appearance in that external splendor which they dreamed of; but see how they are disappointed. Note, It is not wisdom to raise our expectations high in this world, for the most valuable of our glories and joys here are vanishing. If sometimes we are favored with special manifestations of divine grace and pledges of future glory, yet they are withdrawn presently; two heavens are too much for those to expect, that never deserve one. Now they saw no man save Jesus only. Note, Christ will tarry with us when Moses and Elias are gone. The prophets do not live forever, (Zech. 1: 5.) and we see the period of our ministers' conversation; but Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever, Heb. 13: 7, 8.

VIII. The discourse between Christ and his disciples as they came down from the mountain, p. 9, 13.

As Jesus came down, the next day, to the other apostles and the people. He charged those with Him, not to mention the instructive and animating scene which they had witnessed, till after his resurrection from the dead: for before that event it would not have obtained credit; and it was, for the present, rather intended for their own support and encouragement, than for the conviction of others. It seems that it must not be mentioned even to the other disciples. (Marg. Ref. x, y. Mark 9: 9, 10.—Note, 2 Pet. 1: 16-19.)

The whole of this emblematic transaction appears to me to be intended to prove, 1st. The reality of the world of spirits, and the immortality of the soul: the disciples saw Moses and Elijah still existing, though the former had been gathered to his fathers upwards of fourteen hundred years; and the latter had been translated nearly nine hundred. 2dly. The resurrection of the body, and the doctrine of future rewards and punishments, see ch. 16: 27. 3dly. The abolition of the Mosaic institutions, and the fulfilment of the predictions of the prophets relative to the person, nature, sufferings, death, and resurrection of Christ, and the glory that should follow. 4thly. The establishment of the mild, light-bringing, and life-giving Gospel of the Son of God. And 5thly. That as the old Jewish covenant and discipleship had ended, Jesus was now to be considered as the sole Teacher, the only availing offering for sin, and the grand Mediator between God and man.

Verse 10-13.

The apostles, being fully convinced that Jesus was the promised Messiah, and that He would speedily set up his glorious kingdom, the publication of it be adjourned till after his resurrection, and then that and his subsequent glory will be a great confirmation of it. Note, Christ observed a method in the manifestation of Himself; would have his works put together, mutually to explain and illustrate each other, that they might appear in their full strength and convincing evidence. Every thing is beautiful in its season. Christ's resurrection was properly the beginning of the gospel-state, to which all before was but preparatory; and therefore, though this was transacted before, it must not be produced as evidence till then, (and then it appears to have been much insisted on, (2 Pet. 1: 16-18.) when the religion it was designed to confirm, was brought to its full consistence and maturity. Christ's time is the best and fittest for manifesting Himself, and must be attended to by us.

(2.) An objection which the disciples made against something Christ had said; p. 10. 'If Elias make so short a stay, and is gone so suddenly, and we must say nothing of him; why have we been taught out of the law to expect his public appearance in the world immediately before the setting up of the Messiah's kingdom? Must the coming of Elias, which every body looks for, be a secret?' Or, thus; 'If the resurrection of the Messiah, and with it the beginning of his kingdom, be at hand, what comes of that glorious preface and introduction to it, which we expect in the coming of Elias?' (Mal. 4: 5.) Behold I send you Elijah the prophet. The disciples spoke the common language of the Jews, who made that the saying of the scribes, which was the saying of the Scripture whereas of that which ministers speak to us according to the Word of God, we should say, 'God speaks it to us, not the ministers'; for we must not receive it as the word of men, 1 Thess. 2: 13. Observe, When the disciples could not reconcile what Christ said with what they had heard out of the Old Testament, they desired Him to explain it to them. Note, When we are puzzled with Scripture difficulties, we must apply ourselves to Christ by prayer for his Spirit, to open our understandings, and to lead us into all truth.

(3.) The solving of this objection. [1.] Christ allows the prediction, (p. 11.) 'So far you are in the right.' Christ did no come to alter or invalidate any thing foretold in the Old Testament. Note, Corrupt glosses may be rejected without diminishing the authority or dignity of the sacred text. New Testament prophecies are true, and to be received and improved, though some may have misinterpreted them, and drawn wrong inferences from them. He shall come and restore all things; not restore them to their former state, (John Baptist did not that,) but he shall accomplish all things, (so it may be read,) all things that were written of him, all the predictions of the coming of Elias. John Baptist came to restore things spiritually, to revive the decays of religion, to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children; which means the same with this, he were nevertheless unable to reconcile these things with the doctrine of the scribes; that Elias or Elijah, 'must first come,' especially as it was grounded on an express prophecy in Malachi. (Marg. Ref. x, y. Notes, Mal. 3: 1-6. p. 1. 4: 2-6.) Perhaps they supposed that the appearance of Elijah on the mount was intended; and, in that case, why must they conceal it? To this our Lord replied, that it had doubtless been predicted that Elijah would come, and restore, or regulate, all things, in order to prepare the way for the Messiah's kingdom; but that in fact he had come, and the people and scribes had not known or believed Him, and at length he had been put to death by the malice of his enemies; and in like manner they would also persecute and slay their promised Messiah, as it had been predicted by the prophets. By this the disciples more clearly perceived, that John the Baptist had been foretold under the name of Elijah, because of the similarity of his disposition and ministerial labors.

Scott.
(1.) Restore. 1. Regulate. Dodd. Reform. No fanciful restoration of all men, devils and damned spirits, is spoken of as either being done or begun by the ministry of John; but merely that he should preach a doctrine, tending to universal reformation of manners, and be greatly successful: (see Matt. 3: 1-7, and especially Luke 3: 3-15.) where we find that a general reformation had taken place among the common people, the tax-gatherers, and the soldiers. And as John announced the coming of Christ, who was to baptize with the Holy Ghost, i. e. to enlighten, change, and purify the heart, that the reform might be complete, both outward and inward. He may be said, in the strictest sense of the word, to have fulfilled the prophecy; and that he was the Elijah mentioned by Malachi, the words (Luke 1: 17.) prove.

strangeness of all other sufferings; (John 15: 18.) when they had imbrued their hands in the blood of John Baptist, they were ready to do the like to Christ. shall restore all things. John preached repentance, and that restores all things.

[2.] He asserts the accomplishment. The scribes say true; Elias shall come; but I say unto you, what the scribes could not say, Elias is come, v. 12. Note, God's promises are often fulfilled, and men perceive it not. Elias is come, and they knew him not; knew him not to be the Elias promised, the forerunner of the Messiah. The scribes busied themselves in criticising the Scripture, but understood not, by the signs of the times, the fulfilling of it. Note, It is easier to explain the Word of God than to apply it, and make a right use of it. But it is no wonder the morning star was not observed, when He who is the Sun himself, was in the world, and the world knew Him not.

Because they knew him not, they have done to him whatsoever they listed; if they had known, they would not have crucified Christ, or beheaded John, 1 Cor. 2: 8. They ridiculed John, persecuted him, and at last put him to death; which, though Herod's doing, is here charged on the whole generation of unbelieving Jews; particularly the scribes, who, though they could not prosecute John themselves, were pleased with what Herod did. He adds, Like-wise also shall the Son of man suffer of them. Marvel not that Elias should be abused and killed by those who pretended, with a great deal of reverence, to expect him, when the Messiah Himself will be in like manner treated.

Note, The sufferings of Christ took off the sufferings of all other sufferers; (John 15: 18.) when they had imbrued their hands in the blood of John Baptist, they were ready to do the like to Christ. Note, As men deal with Christ's servants, so they would deal with Him Himself; and they that are drunk with the blood of the martyrs, still cry, Give, give. Acts 12: 1—3.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13. Discoveries of the Redeemer's divine majesty greatly assist us in rightly understanding the motive, the benefit, and the glory of his basement. Could we now behold that sacred countenance, which once, for our sins, was disfigured with blood and spitting, we should view it more resplendent than the meridian sun. We should see the Savior no longer 'crowned with thorns,' insulted with the purple robe, and nailed to the cross between two robbers; but 'arrayed with light as a garment,' and surrounded with the adoring throng of prophets, apostles, saints, and angels, emulating each other, who should most rapturously celebrate his praises: yea, we should hear the eternal Father, from the inaccessible light in which He dwells, proclaim the honors of the Redeemer as his co-equal Son, and regard Himself as glorified in all the adorations rendered to Him. (Notes, John 5: 20—23, v. 23. Phil. 2: 9—11, v. 11.) But alas! how dull and drowsy are our minds, when we would contemplate such subjects!—If, however, by faith we get a glimpse of our Redeemer's glory, and our hearts glow with love and joy; we find our heaven begun, and we are ready to say, 'It is good for us to be here;' and we want always to continue in that pleasant frame of spirit, and to spend our lives in contemplation. But we know not what we say, or do: ever in this, there is a large proportion of carnal self-love; some knowledge indeed of the essence of felicity; but great ignorance of what is needful to fit us for it, and of the situation in which we are placed during our continuance here. These glimpses and foretastes are vouchsafed to prepare us for tribulations, and to support us under them; but we must pass through varying experiences in our way to glory, and spend our lives in self-denying services, for the honor of Christ and the benefit of his people.—We know not what we shall at last be: yet we are assured, that when the Savior shall appear, we shall be like Him: and as our bodies must be changed by his omnipotence, so must our souls be transfigured and transformed by his renewing grace. This should be our grand personal object, whilst we wait for the time when he 'will receive us to Himself, that where He is, there we may be also.' In order to this, we must obediently hear Him, as our Prophet and King; trust in Him as the great Mediator, 'in whom' the Father 'is well pleased;' and wait for the communication of his grace, in fervent prayer, and retirement from the hurry of this vain world. But we could not now endure the refulgence of the divine glory: not only the terrors of mount Sinai, but the glories of mount Tabor, would overwhelm us, save for the gracious interposition and encouraging words of the incarnate Savior.—After sweet seasons of communion with God, we must return to our several employments: yet the Savior will be with us, if we rely on his promises, and are observant of his precepts; and we should ever keep in mind 'his death and resurrection, and anticipate the time when we shall behold Him in glory, and be forever with Him.—But even with the Scriptures in our hands, how apt are we to overlook the accomplishments of them! And how little in comparison has yet been effected, in bringing fallen sinners unto God, by the labors of all his servants! Men knew not the Son of the Father, but crucified and slew Him; and we need not wonder if they treat his disciples and ministers in the same manner. SCOTT.

long. It is comfortable to those who are wrestling with principalities and powers, that Christ hath spoiled them, Col. 2: 15.

2. He redresses the grievances of the children of men. It was an immediate cure, and a perfect one. This is an encouragement to parents to bring their children to Christ, whose souls are under Satan's power; He is able to heal them, and as willing as He is able. Not only bring them to Christ by prayer, but bring them to the Word of Christ. Christ's rebukes, brought home to the heart, will ruin Satan's power.

III. Christ's discourse with his disciples hereupon.

1. They ask the reason why they could not cast out the devil at this time; ^p 19. Note, Ministers, who are to deal for Christ in public, have need to keep up a private communion with Him, that they may in secret bewail their weakness and straitness in their public performances, and inquire into the cause of them. Such questions as the disciples put to Christ we should put to ourselves, in communing with our own hearts; Why were we so dull and careless at such a time? Why came we so much short in such a duty?

II. The rebukes Christ gave to the people, and then to the devil.

1. He chid those about Him; ^v 17. This is not spoken to the disciples, but to the people, and perhaps especially to the scribes, (Mark 9. 14.) who, as it should seem, insulted over the disciples, because they had now met with a case that was too hard for them. Christ Himself could not do many mighty works among a people in whom unbelief reigned. They were faithless and perverse. Note, Those that are faithless will be perverse: and perverseness is sin in its worst colors. Faith is compliance with God, unbelief is opposition and contradiction to God. Israel of old was perverse, because faithless, (Ps. 95: 9.) froward, for in them is no faith, Deut. 32: 20.

Two things He upbraids them with. (1.) His presence with them so long; ^w How long shall I be with you? Will you always need my bodily presence, and never be fit to be left, the people? the conduct of the disciples, and the disciples to the conduct of the Spirit and of their commission? (2.) His patience with them so long; ^x How long shall I suffer you? Note, [1.] The faithlessness and perverseness of those who enjoy the means of grace are a great grief to the Lord Jesus. Thus did He suffer the manners of Israel of old, Acts 13: 18. [2.] The longer Christ has borne with a perverse and faithless people, the more He is displeased with their perverseness and unbelief; and He is God, and not man, else He would not suffer so long, nor bear so much as He doth.

2. He cured the child. Though the people were perverse, and Christ was provoked, yet care was taken of the child. Note, Though Christ may be angry, He is never unkind, nor doth He, in the greatest of his displeasure, shut up the bowels of his compassion from the miserable; ^y Bring him to Me. Note, When all other helps fail, we are welcome to Christ, and may confide in Him.

See here an emblem of Christ's undertaking as our Redeemer.

1. He breaks the power of Satan, (^z 18.) rebuked the devil, as one who could back with force his word of command. Note, Christ's victories over Satan are obtained by the power of his word, the sword of his mouth, Rev. 19: 21. Satan cannot stand before the rebukes of Christ, though his possession has been ever so ness and straitness in their public performances, and inquire into the cause of them. Such questions as the disciples put to Christ we should put to ourselves, in communing with our own hearts; Why were we so dull and careless at such a time? Why came we so much short in such a duty?

2. Christ gives them two reasons why they failed.

(1.) ^z Because of their unbelief, ^z 20. Where He spake to the father of the child and to the people, He charged it on their unbelief; ^z 17. He spake to his disciples, He charged it on them; there were faults on both sides; but we are more concerned to hear of our own faults than of other people's, and to impute what is amiss to ourselves than to others. When the preaching of the Word seems not to be so successful as sometimes it has been, the people are apt to lay all the fault on the ministers, and the ministers on the people; whereas, it is more becoming for each to acknowledge his own faultiness. Ministers, in reproving, must learn thus to give to each his portion of the Word; and to take people off from judging others, by teaching all to judge themselves; ^z It is because of your unbelief. Though they had faith, yet that faith was weak and ineffectual. Note, [1.] As far as faith falls short, it may truly be said, 'There is unbelief.' Many are chargeable with unbelief, who yet are not to be called unbelievers. [2.] It is because of our unbelief, that we bring so little to pass in religion, and so often miscarry, and come short in that which is good.

Our Lord takes this occasion to show them the power of faith; ^z If ye have faith as a grain of mustard-seed, ye shall do wonders, ^z 20. Some make the comparison to refer to the quality of the mustard-seed; 'If you have an active growing faith, not dead, flat, or insipid.' But it rather refers to the quantity; 'If you had but a grain of true faith, though so little, that it were like that which is the least of all seeds.' Faith, in general, is a firm assent to, a compliance with, and a confidence in, all divine revelation. The faith here required is that, which had for its object that particular revelation, by which Christ gave his disciples power to work miracles in his name, for the confirmation of the doctrine they preached. This faith they were defective in. Perhaps their Master's absence with the three chief of his disciples, with a charge to the rest not to follow them, might occasion some doubts concerning their power, or rather the power of the Lord with them. It is good for us to be diffident of ourselves and of our own strength; but it is displeasing to Christ, when we distrust any power derived from Him.

^z Ye shall say to this mountain, Remove. This is a proverbial expression, denoting that which follows, and no more. ^z Nothing shall be impossible to you. They had a full commission among other things, to cast out devils without exception; but this devil, being more than ordinarily malicious and inveterate, they distrusted the power they had received, and so failed. To convince them of this, Christ shows them

Verse 17.

Faithless. The scribes and multitude were chiefly meant in this rebuke; yet the disciples, and even the father of the child, showed a very reprehensible degree of unbelief on this occasion. Scorr.

Verses 19, 20.

The apostles had doubtless in some instances cast out devils. 'By faith as a grain of mustard-seed.' (13: 31.) some understand a faith that groweth and increaseth as a grain of mustard-seed. Christ elsewhere for 'the removing of a mountain.' (21: 21.) requires 'faith in God.' (Mark 11: 22, 23.) which seems to signify an excellent faith, 'faith without doubting.' St. Paul reckons faith able 'to remove mountains,' as the strongest faith. (1 Cor. 13: 2.) According to this exposition, the sense runs thus. Did your faith increase, according to the examples of God's power you have had before your eyes; as the grain of mustard-seed grows up to be the greatest of all herbs, so would your faith transmute and grow superior to all difficulties. A remover of mountains seems only to import a doer of those things which are exceeding difficult, and beyond the power of nature to perform.' [Comp. Zech. 4: 7.] Whitby.
(19.) Why could not ye cast him out? 'They were confounded at their want of success—but not at their want of faith, which was the cause of their miscarriage! When the ministers of the Gospel find their endeavors with respect to some places or persons ineffectual, they should come by private prayer to Christ, humble themselves before Him, and beg to be informed whether some evil in themselves have not been the cause of the unfruitfulness of their labors.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

This seems clearly to intimate, that there are different orders of spirits, some more powerful and malignant than others; (12: 45.) and that these could not be cast out, except by persons who were much engaged in fasting and prayer. As success depended on the strength and simplicity of faith, 'fasting and prayer' may be considered as proper means for increasing humility, zeal, compassion, and those holy affections of the soul, with which vigorous and simple faith must be intimately connected; and the spirit of the instruction is equally applicable to us, in our personal conflicts and public services. Scorr.

'This difficult passage is wanting in the Vatican MS. and one of the eleventh or twelfth century, and in some ancient versions.' Dr. A. Clarke. Prayer, by impressing the mind with a more intimate sense that all things depend on the infinite and incomprehensible power of God, raises his ideas of that power to a greater sublimity, that can be done by ordinary speculation. And fasting, by lowering the animal life, subdues such passions as are nourished by the continued repletion of the body. Hence fasting has a tendency to free the mind from the dominion of passion, which never fails to occasion great perturbation, and at times is found to make even the best men inattentive, at least to the more silent impressions of God's Holy Spirit. Fasting, therefore, produces an inward quietness and calmness very favorable to the growth of faith and is one of the most efficacious means of curing many of the diseases produced by intemperance or plethoric habits.' MACKENZIE.

22 And while they abode in Galilee, Jesus said unto them, 'The Son of man shall be betrayed into the hands of men;

23 And they shall kill him, and the third day he shall be raised again. And they were exceeding sorry.

24 And when they were come to Capernaum, they that received tribute-money came to Peter, and said, Doth not your Master pay tribute?

25 He saith, 'Yes. And when he was come into the house, Jesus prevented him, saying, What thinkest thou, Simon? of whom do the kings of the earth take custom or tribute? of their own children or of strangers?

26 Peter saith unto him, Of strangers. Jesus saith unto him, Then are the children free.

27 Notwithstanding, lest we should offend them, go thou to the sea, and cast an hook, and take up the fish that first cometh up; and when thou hast opened his mouth, thou shalt find a piece of money: that take, and give unto them for me and thee.

what they might have done. Note, An active faith can remove mountains, not of itself, but in the virtue of a divine power engaged by a divine promise, both which faith fastens on.

(2.) Because there was something in the kind of the malady, which rendered the cure more than ordinarily difficult; v. 21. This possession, which works by a falling sickness, or this kind of devils that are thus furious, is not cast out ordinarily, but by great acts of devotion, and therein ye were defective. Note, [1.] Though the adversaries we wrestle with, be all principalities and powers, yet some are stronger than others. [2.] The extraordinary power of Satan must not discourage our faith, but quicken us to greater intenseness in the acting of it, and more earnestness in praying to God for the increase of it; so some understand it here; 'This kind of faith (which removeth mountains) doth not proceed, is not obtained from God, nor is it carried up to its full growth, nor drawn out into act and exercise, but by earnest prayer.' [3.] Fasting and prayer are proper means for the bringing down of Satan's power against us, and the fetching in of divine power to our assistance. Fasting is of use to put an edge on prayer, is a means of mortifying corrupt habits, and of disposing the body to serve the soul in prayer. When the devil's interest in the soul is confirmed by the temper and constitution of the body, fasting must be joined with prayer, to keep under the body.

V. 22, 23. Christ here foretells his own sufferings; He began to do it before; (ch. 16: 21.) and, finding that it was to his disciples a hard saying, He saw it necessary to repeat it. Observe here,

1. What He foretold concerning Himself—that He should be betrayed and killed. He perfectly knew, before, all things that should come to Him, and yet undertook the work of our redemption, which greatly commends his love; nay, his clear foresight of them was a kind of ante-passion, had not his love to man made all easy to Him.

(1.) He tells them that He should be betrayed into the hands of men. He shall be delivered up; (it might be understood of his Father's delivering Him up by his determined counsel and foreknowledge, (Acts 2: 23. Rom. 8: 32.) but as we render it, it refers to Judas' betraying Him into the hands of the priests, and their betraying Him into the hands of the Romans.

(2.) That they should kill Him; nothing less than that would satisfy their rage; it was his blood, his precious blood that they thirsted after. This is the heir, come, let us kill Him. Nothing less would satisfy God's justice, and answer his undertaking; if He be a Sacrifice of atonement, He must be killed; without blood no remission.

(3.) That He shall be raised again the third day. Still, when He speaks of his death, He gave a hint of his resurrection. This was an encouragement, not only to Him, but to his disciples; for if He rise the third day, his absence will not be long, and his return will be glorious.

This 'tribute' seems to have been the half-shekel apiece, collected to defray the expense of the sanctuary service. (Marg.—Notes, Ex. 30: 11—16. 2 Kings 12: 4, 5. Neh. 10: 32, 33.) This at first was collected occasionally, as wanted; but we are informed by Josephus, that in his time it was paid annually, by all above twenty years of age. 'Our Saviour's argument, why He should not pay this tribute, as being the Son of that King to whom it was paid, holds not with reference to the other tribute, said to Caesar, He being not the Son of Caesar, but of God. By this example, Christ teacheth us to avoid the scandal and sinister suspicions of men, though they be groundless, with some Injurious to ourselves, especially when we have not means to convince them. The scandal of the Pharisees, proceeding not from ignorance but pure malice, He is not thus concerned to avoid. (15: 12.) Whithy. (Marg. Ref. h.) The external poverty of Christ, contrasted with this display of divine glory, must sensibly affect every considerate mind. Had Jesus so pleased, all the treasures in the depths of the sea, and in the heart of the earth might with equal ease have been

2. How the disciples received this; They were exceeding sorry. Herein appeared their love to their Master's person, but withal, their ignorance and mistake concerning his undertaking. Peter indeed durst not say any thing against it, as he had done before, (ch. 16: 22.) having then been severely chidden for it; but he, and the rest of them, greatly lamented it, as it would be their own loss, their Master's grief, and the sin and ruin of them that did it.

V. 24—27. We have here an account of Christ's paying tribute.

1. Observe how it was demanded, v. 24.

1. It was not a civil payment to the Romans but the half-shekel, about fifteen pence, which was required from every person for the service of the temple, and the defraying of the expenses of the worship there; it is called a ransom for the soul, Exod. 30: 12, &c. This was not so strictly exacted now, especially in Galilee, as sometimes it had been.

2. The demand was very modest; the collectors standing in such awe of Christ, that they durst not speak to Him about it, but apply to Peter, at whose house, in Capernaum, probably Christ lodged, who therefore was fittest to be spoken to, as it might be presumed, he knew his Master's mind. Their question is, Doth not your Master pay tribute? Some think they sought an occasion against Him, desiring, if He refused, to represent Him as disaffected to the temple-service; (Ezra 4: 13.) but it should rather seem, they asked this with respect, intimating, that if He had any privilege to exempt Him from this payment, they would not insist on it.

Peter presently passed his word for his Master; 'Yes, certainly; my Master pays tribute, it is his principle and practice; you need not fear moving it to Him.' He was made under the law; (Gal. 4: 4.) therefore under this law He was paid for, at forty days old, (Luke 2: 22.) and now He paid for Himself, as one who, in his estate of humiliation, had taken on Him the form of a servant, Phil. 2: 7, 8. He was made sin for us, and was sent forth in the likeness of sinful flesh, Rom. 8: 3. Now this tax paid to the temple, is called an atonement for the soul, Ex. 30: 15. Christ, that in every thing He might appear in the likeness of sinners, paid it, though He had no sin to atone for. Thus it became Him to fulfil all righteousness, ch. 4: 15. He did it, to set us an example, (1.) Of rendering to all their due, tribute to whom tribute is due, Rom. 13: 7. The kingdom of Christ not being of this world, its favorites and officers are so far from having a power granted them, as such, to tax other people, that they are made liable to the powers that are. (2.) Of contributing to the support of the public worship of God in the places where we are. If we reap spiritual things, it is fit that we should return carnal things. The temple was now made a den of thieves, and the temple-worship a pretence for opposition to Christ and his doctrine; and yet Christ paid this tribute. Note, Church duties, legally imposed, are to be paid, notwithstanding church corruptions. We must take care not to use our laid at his feet. His poverty was therefore voluntary, as our suffering Surety, to take away the reproach of an indigent station, and to reconcile his people to it, as best and safest for them.

(24.) Tribute-money. 'Vespasian afterwards ordered this to be paid into the Roman treasury.'

It seems to have been a voluntary thing, which custom rather than law had established. In Nehemiah's day it was accounted so, and the sum was then somewhat lower. See Neh. 10: 32. Donations.

(25.) He saith, Yes. 'From this reply of Peter, it is evident that our Lord customarily paid all taxes, tributes, &c. which were common among the people wherever He came. The children of God are subject to all civil laws in the places where they live—and should pay the taxes levied on them by public authority: and though any of these should be found unjust, they rebel not, as their business is not to reform the politics of nations, but the morals of the world.'

Dr. A. Clarke. (27.) Lest we should offend them. 'Rather, that we may not give them a handle for saying, that we despise the temple, &c.; or lest we should make them suppose that we undervalue the temple: which might cause them to stumble at, and reject my pretensions to the Messiahship.'

CHAP. XVIII.

Jesus teaches humility by the example of a little child. — He inculcates a devotion to his "little ones," and watchfulness against stumbling others, or falling ourselves, 5-10. He illustrates his love for his people, by the parable of a lost sheep, 11-14, shews how to act towards an offending brother, 15-17; assures his apostles that what his hand or voice shall be found or loosed in heaven, 18; gives special promises to those who unite in prayer, or make in His name, 19, 20; and enforces the constant forgiveness of injuries, by a parable of a king, and his dealings with a servant, who was deeply indebted to him; yet was not influenced by his readiness to forgive him, to forgive his fellow servant, 21-35.

AT the same time came the disciples unto Jesus, saying, a Mark 9:33.

faithful as a Son in his own house: (Heb. 3:6.) and therefore not obliged to pay this tax. Thus Christ asserts his right, lest his paying tribute should be misimproved to the weakening of his title as the Son of God, and the King of Israel, and look like a disowning of it Himself. God's children are freed by grace and adoption, from the slavery of sin and Satan, but not from their subjection to civil magistrates in civil things; here the law of Christ is expressed; Let every soul (sanctified souls not excepted) be subject to the higher powers. Render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's.

III. How it was paid, notwithstanding, v. 27.

1. The reason why He paid it. Let us should offend them. Few knew, as Peter did, that He was the Son of God; and it would have been a diminution to the honor of that great truth, yet a secret, to advance it now, to serve such a purpose as this. Therefore Christ drops that argument; and, considering, that if He should refuse this payment, it would increase people's prejudice, and alienate their affections, He resolves to pay it. Note, Christian prudence and civility teach us, in many cases, to recede from our right, rather than give offence by insisting on it. We must never decline our duty for fear of giving offence; (Christ's preaching and miracles offended them, yet He went on with them, ch. 15:12, 13.) better offend men than God; but we must sometimes deny ourselves in that which is our secular interest, rather than give offence; as Paul, 1 Cor. 8:13. Rom. 14:13.

2. What course He took to pay it: wherein appears,

(1.) The poverty of Christ; He had not fifteen pence to pay his tax with; though He cured so many that were diseased, He did all gratis; for our sakes He became poor, 2 Cor. 8:9. In his ordinary expenses, He lived on alms, (Luke 8:3.) and in extraordinary ones, on miracles. He did not order Judas to pay this out of the bag which he carried; that was for subsistence, and He would not order that for his particular use, which was intended for the benefit of the community.

(2.) The power of Christ, in fetching money out of the fish's mouth for this purpose. Whether his omnipotence put it there, or his omniscience knew it was there, it was an evidence of his divinity, and that He is Lord of hosts. Those creatures that are most remote from man, are at the command of Christ, even the fishes of the sea; (Ps. 8:5.) and to evidence his dominion, and to accommodate Himself to his present state of humiliation, He chose to take it out of a fish's mouth, when He could have taken it out of an angel's hand. Now observe,

[1.] Peter must catch the fish by angling. Even in miracles He would use means to encourage industry and endeavor. Do we expect Christ to give to us? Let us be ready to work for Him.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 14-27. Manifold are the troubles of body and mind, personal and domestic, to which we are liable, by the power of Satan, and for our sins: but, through the goodness of our God, hitherto we have not been destroyed, though sorely vexed and endangered; and if our troubles bring us humbly to seek help from Christ, they will eventually be 'for our profit.' We may do right in applying to disciples, and they may be desirous to help us, though often unable; nothing, however, but our unbelief and disobedience, can preclude us from finding relief in Christ: yet He will sharply rebuke us, if we remain faithless and perverse amidst abundant opportunities of instruction and conviction. Should we inquire the reason of our ill success, in our conflicts with sin and temptation, and our endeavors to do good, the answer would still be, 'Because of your unbelief.' Wonderful is the power of holy faith; and nothing is impossible to those who go forth in the Redeemer's name, to obey His commands and promote his cause. But our faith will commonly be strong, and our efforts successful, in proportion as we seek the victory by 'fasting and prayer'; and it especially behoves us to make a fair trial of this method, as to those particular conflicts in which we have been most foiled, and those services respecting which we deplore our want of success.—What a varied scene of outward debasement, and of divine

[2.] The fish came up, with money in the mouth; so we have the reward of obedience in obedience. What work we do at Christ's command, brings its own pay along with it: In keeping God's commands, as well as after keeping them, there is great reward, Ps. 19:11. Peter was made a fisher of men, and those that he caught thus, came up; where the heart is opened to entertain Christ's Word, the hand is opened to encourage his ministers.

[3.] The piece of money was just enough to pay the tax for Christ and Peter. Thou shalt find a shekel, the value of a Jewish shekel, which would pay the poll-tax for two, for it was half a shekel, Exod. 30:13. Christ could as easily have commanded a bag of money as a piece of money; but He would teach us not to covet superfluities, but, having enough for our present occasions, therewith to be content, and not to distrust God, though we live but from hand to mouth. If we have a competency for to-day, let to-morrow take thought for the things of itself. Christ paid for Himself and Peter, because it is probable that here he only was assessed, and of him it was at this time demanded; perhaps the rest had paid already, or were to pay elsewhere. The papists make a great mystery of Christ's paying for Peter, as if this made him the head and representative of the whole church; whereas the payment of tribute for him, was rather a sign of subjection than of superiority. His pretended successors pay no tribute, but exact it. Peter fished for his money, and therefore part of it went for his use. Those that are workers together with Christ in winning souls, shall be sharers with Him in his glory, and shall shine with Him. Give it for thee and Me. What Christ paid for Himself was looked upon as a debt; what He paid for Peter, was a courtesy to him. Note, It is a desirable thing, if God so please, to have wherewithal of this world's goods, not only to be just, but to be kind; not only to be charitable to the poor, but obliging to our friends. What is a great estate good for, but that it enables a man to do so much the more good?

Lastly, Observe the evangelist records here the orders Christ gave to Peter; the effect is not particularly mentioned, but taken for granted, and justly; for with Christ, saying and doing are the same thing.

CHAP. XVIII. v. 1-6. The Gospels are, in short, a record of what Jesus began both to do and to teach. In the foregoing chapter, we had an account of his doings, in this of his teachings; probably, not all at the same time, in a continued discourse, but at several times, upon divers occasions, here put together, as near akin. See how practical Christ's preaching was; He could have revealed mysteries, but He pressed plain duties, especially those that glory, was the life of our Redeemer! Yet all his humiliation made way for his resurrection and final exaltation. Let us then 'endure the cross,' despise riches and worldly honors, and be contented in poverty, if that be his will concerning us. Let those who are rich learn to be poor in spirit, and not to trust in riches, or to despise the needy, lest they be found to have reproached their Savior, as well as their Maker. (Notes, 1 Tim. 6:16-19. Jam. 1:9-11. 2:5-7.)—We should always be ready to waive our privileges and exemptions, rather than give offence. Yet we seldom follow the dictates of our own minds, without inquiring the will of God, but we fall into mistakes, even in things apparently most obvious.—Even the poor believer should be ready to pay the tribute and custom, for the credit of the Gospel, and trust in the Lord to defray the expense; and 'the fishers of men,' though needy, may go on cheerfully in their work, trusting in the Lord to supply their wants; for He will, when necessary, bring to their net such, as shall be both able and willing to contribute to the support of his cause.—But how glorious are the privileges, and how noble the freedom, of the children of the King of kings! To these privileges we strangers are admitted by faith in Christ; and 'if the Son make us free, then shall we be free indeed.' (See John 8:30-36.)

greatest. Judas had the bag, which, though now he come last, he hopes will then denominate him the greatest. Simon and Jude are nearly related to Christ, and they hope to take place of all the great officers of state, as princes of the blood. John is the beloved disciple, the favorite of the Prince, and therefore hopes to be the greatest. Andrew was first called, and why should not he be first preferred? Note, We are very apt to amuse and humor ourselves with foolish fancies of things that will never be.

II. The discourse itself, which is a just rebuke to the question, Who shall be greatest? We have abundant reason to think, that if Christ ever intended that Peter and his successors at Rome should be heads of the church, and his chief vicars on earth, having so fair an occasion, He would now have let his disciples know it; but so far from this, his answer disallows and condemns the thing itself. Christ will not lodge such an authority or supremacy any where in his church; whoever pretend to it, are usurpers; instead of settling any of the disciples in this dignity, He warns them all not to put in for it.

Christ here teacheth them to be humble.

1. By a sign; v. 2. Christ often taught by signs or sensible representations, as the prophets of old. Note, Humility is a lesson so hardly learned, that we have need by all means to be taught it. When we look on a little child, are most displeasing to the flesh and blood. As there never was a greater pattern of humility, so there never was a greater preacher of it, than Christ.

I. The occasion of this discourse, They mean not, who by character, (then the question had been good, that they might know what graces and duties to excel in,) but who by name. They had heard much, and preached much, of the kingdom of heaven, the church in this world; but as yet they were so far from having any clear notion of it, that they dreamed of a temporal kingdom. Christ had lately foretold his sufferings, and the glory that should follow; and now they thought it was time to put in for their places; and, instead of asking how they might have strength and grace to suffer with Him, they ask Him, Who shall be highest in reigning with Him? Upon other discourses of Christ to that purport, debates of this kind arose: ch. 20: 19, 20, Luke 22: 22, 24. Note, Many look so much at the crown, that they forget the yoke and the cross. So the disciples did here, when they asked, Who is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven?

1. They suppose that all in that kingdom are great, for it is a kingdom of priests. Note, Those are truly great, who are truly good; and they will appear so at last, when Christ shall own them as his, though ever so mean and poor in the world.

2. They suppose that there are degrees in this greatness. All the saints are honorable, but not all alike so; one star differs from another in glory.

3. They suppose it must be some of them, that must be prime ministers of state. To whom should King Jesus delight to do honor, but to them who had left all for Him, and were now his companions in patience and tribulation?

4. They strive who it should be, each having some pretence or other to it. Peter was always the chief speaker, and already had the keys given him; he expects to be lord chancellor, or lord chamberlain of the household, and so to be the

we should be put in mind of the use Christ made of this child. Sensible things must be improved to spiritual purposes. Grown men, and great men, should not disdain the company of little children, or think it below them to take notice of them. They may either speak to them, and give instruction to them; or look on them, and receive instruction from them. Christ Himself, when a Child, was in the midst of the doctors, Luke 2: 46

2. By a sermon on this sign; in which He shows them and us,

(1.) The necessity of humility, v. 3. Here observe,

[1.] What He requires and insists on. First, 'You must be converted, be of another mind, and in another frame and temper, must have other thoughts, both of yourselves, and of the kingdom of heaven. The pride, ambition, and affectation of honor and dominion, which appear in you, must be repented of, mortified, and reformed, and you must come to yourselves.' Note, Beside the first conversion, there are after-conversions, which are equally necessary to salvation. Every step out of the way by sin, must be a step into it again by repentance. When Peter repented of his denying his Master, he was converted. Secondly, You must become as little children. Note, Converting grace makes us like little children, not foolish (1 Cor. 14: 20.) nor fickle, (Eph. 4: 14.) nor playful, but child-like; (ch. 11: 16.) as children, we must desire the sincere milk of the word; (1 Pet. 2: 2.) be careful for nothing, but leave it to our heavenly Father to care for us; (ch. 6: 31.) be harmless and inoffensive, and void of malice, (1 Cor. 14: 20.) governable, and under command; (Gal. 4: 2.) and (which is here chiefly intended) we must be humble as little children. Little children have no great aims or projects to raise themselves in the world; they exercise not themselves in things too high for them; and we should in like manner behave, and quiet ourselves, Ps. 131: 1, 2. As children are little in body and low in stature, so we must be little and low in spirit, and in our thoughts of ourselves. This temper leads to other good dispositions: childhood is the learning age.

[2.] What stress he lays on this; Without this you shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven. Note, Disciples of Christ have need to be kept in awe by threatenings, that they may fear lest they seem to come short, Heb. 4: 1. The disciples, when they put that question, (n. 1.) thought themselves sure of the kingdom of heaven; but Christ awakens them to be jealous of themselves, and tells them, that, except they came to a better temper, they should never come thither. Note, Many that set up for great ones in the church, prove not only little, but nothing and are found to have no part or lot in the matter. Our Lord designs here to show the great danger of pride and ambition. Pride threw the angels that sinned, out of heaven, and will keep us out, if we be not converted from it. They est in the kingdom He was about to establish. Children, when very young, show little disposition to claim precedence, or to aspire after authority: they willingly associate with their inferiors, are regardless of external distinctions, and devoid of malice and guile: they are docile, simple, submissive to authority, willingly dependent on their parents, and disposed to credit what they say. No doubt, they soon begin to show other propensities, and other ideas are early inculcated on most of them and imbibed by them; but these are the obvious characteristics of childhood, and suffice to render 'little children' proper emblems of the humble, unambitious, submissive, and dependent spirit, which is the essence and the excellence of genuine Christianity. Though not innocent, strictly speaking, they are comparatively harmless: as the young, even of the most ferocious animals, are at first innoxious, but soon begin to discover the nature of that stroke from which they spring. (Marg. Ref. d. e.—See also Mark 10: 13-16, v. 15, 1 Pet. 2: 1-3.) In general, therefore, little children are apt emblems of those qualities, which are the effects of regeneration; and though all the apostles, except Judas, were at this time regenerate and 'converted,' in the general sense of the word; yet they all needed a very great change, in respect of their ambition and carnal emulation. It was also proper to show them, that in their present temper they were not only unfit to be the 'greatest in the kingdom of heaven,' but even unfit for the meanest station in it; and that the lust of dominion was as contrary to Christianity, as any kind of immorality. In accordance with the spirit of the kingdom, they who are most lowly, and most indifferently about consequence and pre-eminence, and most willing to be little, inferior, and neglected, must be the greatest; and not they who have the greatest abilities, most splendid gifts, or most exalted stations in the church.

Scott.

(3.) Except ye be converted. 'Unless ye be changed.' The English phrase to convert denotes either to bring over from infidelity to the profession of the true religion, or to recover from a state of impetuosity to the love and obedience of God. Neither of these appears to be the meaning of the word here. The only view is, to signify, 'that they must lay aside their ambition and worldly pursuits, before they be honored to be the members, much more the ministers, of that new establishment, or kingdom, He was about to erect.' CAMPBELL.

Verses 5, 6.

'The little ones,' include the meaneast of those who come to Christ, and (as far as man can discern) believe in Him and belong to Him; especially such as, whether ministers or private Christians, being peculiarly humble and 'poor in spirit,' are the greatest in his sight, though often most slighted by men. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 10, 11, 14: 6, 3; Zechar. 13: 7.) These are the most evident and distinguished representatives of the meek and lowly Savior. The word rendered 'offend,' signifies cause to stumble. It is used both for those who fall and perish, and for those who fall and rise again. All the disciples were 'offended,' when Christ was betrayed to his enemies; and Peter especially; but says the Savior, 'I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not' (Notes, 26: 30-35. Luke 22: 31-34, v. 32.) The conduct, however, of those, who contemptuously, maliciously, or even heedlessly, did such things as tended to the destruction of their weak brethren, would not be in the least excused, because the special grace of God might prevent the fatal consequences. The men of Lystra, who stoned Paul, and left him for dead, were his murderers, in the sight of God, though He was pleased to restore his apostle to life and health. All attempts therefore to prove or disprove disputed points of doctrine from such passages are foreign to the purpose of the sacred historians. Scott.

6 But whoso shall offend one of these little ones which believe in me, it were better for him that a mill-stone were hanged about his neck, and that he were drowned in the depth of the sea.

anored in the church, that are most humble and self-denying; for though they least seek it, they best deserve it.

(3) The special care Christ takes for those that are humble.

They will be afraid,

[1.] That nobody will receive them, v. 5. But whatever kindnesses are done to such, Christ takes as done to Himself. Whoso entertains a meek and humble Christian, countenances him and studies to do him a kindness: and doth it in Christ's name, for his sake, because he bears the image of Christ, serves Christ, and because Christ has received him; this shall be recompensed as an acceptable piece of respect to Christ. Observe, though it be but one such little child that is received in Christ's name, it shall be accepted. Note, The tender regard Christ has to his church, extends itself to every particular member, even the meanest. If Christ were personally among us, we think we should never do enough to welcome Him; the poor, the poor in spirit, we have always with us, and they are his receivers. See ch. 25: 35—40.

[2.] They will be afraid that every body will abuse them. This objection He obviates, (v. 6.) where He warns all people, as they will answer it at their utmost peril, not to offer any injury to one of Christ's little ones. This word makes a wall of fire about them; he that touches them, touches the apple of God's eye.

Observe, First, The crime supposed; offending one of these little ones that believe in Christ. Their believing in Christ unites them to Him, so that, as they partake of the benefit of his sufferings, He also partakes in the wrong of that are lifted up with pride, fall into the condemnation of the devil; to prevent this, we must become as little children, and, in order to that, must be born again, put on the new man, and be like the holy child Jesus; so He is called even after his ascension, Acts 4: 27.

(2.) He shows the honor and advancement that attend humility, (v. 4.) thus furnishing a direct but surprising answer to their question; He that humbles himself as a little child, though he may fear that hereby he will render himself contemptible, as men of timid minds, who thereby throw themselves out of the way of preferment, yet the same is greatest in the kingdom of heaven. Note, The humblest Christians are the best Christians; most like Christ, and highest in his favor; best disposed for the communications of divine grace, and fittest to serve God in this world, and enjoy Him in another. They are great, for God overlooks heaven and earth, to look on such; and certainly those are to be most respected and theirs. Even the little ones that believe, have the same privileges with the great ones, for they have all obtained like precious faith. There are those that offend these little ones, by drawing them to sin, (1 Cor. 8: 10, 11.) grieving and vexing their righteous souls, discouraging them, taking occasion from their mildness to make a prey of them in their persons, families, goods, or good name. Thus the best men have often met with the worst treatment in this world.

Secondly, The punishment of this crime; intimated in that word, Better for him that he were drowned in the depth of the sea. The sin is so heinous, and the ruin so great, that he had better undergo the sorest punishments inflicted on the worst of malefactors. Note, 1. Hell is worse than the depth of the sea; for it is a bottomless pit, and it is a burning lake. We meet with one that had comfort in the depth of the sea, it was Jonah; (ch. 2: 2, 4, 9,) but never any that had the least in hell, nor will have to eternity. 2. The irresistible, irrevocable doom of the great Judge, will sink sooner and surer, and bind faster, than a mill-stone hanged about the neck. It fixes a great guilt, which can never be broken through, Luke 16: 26. Offending Christ's little ones, though by omission, is assigned as the reason of that dreadful sentence, Go ye cursed, which will at last be the doom of proud persecutors.

V. 7—14. Our Savior here speaks of offences, or scandals,

I. In general, v. 7. That is an offence, 1. Which occasions guilt, and draws men from that which is good to that which is evil. 2. Which occasions grief, and makes the heart of the righteous sad. Christ here tells us, concerning them,

(1.) That they were certain things: Christ must needs be that offences come. Not that Christ's word necessitates any man to offend, but it is a prediction on a view of the causes; considering the subtlety and malice of Satan, the weakness and depravity of men's hearts, and the foolishness that is found there, it is morally impossible

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6. Pride and ambition are so deeply rooted in our fallen nature, that they remain, and often break forth, even in those who are 'born of God.' Hence so many contentions in the church, even among real disciples, who are tempted to seek pre-eminence above their brethren, after they have given up their prospects of worldly honor and greatness! (Notes, Prov. 13: 10. 2 Cor. 12: 7—10, v. 7. Phil. 2: 1—4, p. 3.) Such ambitious plans and desires, however, are peculiarly contrary to the spirit of the Gospel, and to the character of Christ, and are productive of envy, discord, and other fatal consequences. In this, as well as in other respects, we need to be daily more and more 'renewed in the spirit of our mind,' that we may 'become as little children, willing to be 'the least of all and the servants of all.' If we have not some measure of this disposition, and yet think ourselves the subjects of Christ, we are awfully deceived; and he who has made the greatest proficiency in self-abasement, is in fact the greatest in the kingdom of grace, and will shine the brightest in the kingdom of glory. We ought therefore daily to meditate on this subject, and to examine our own spirits respecting it, that we may be more and more cast into the mould of the Gospel, and that we may learn to behave properly towards our fellow Christians, however feeble, poor, or obscure.

(6.) Mill-stone. 'A mill-stone turned by an ass.' Luke 17: 2. Hand-mills were most common in those days: a mill turned by an ass, was one of the largest size; for wind-mills and water-mills are of much later invention.

Drowned. 'It is supposed that in Syria, as well as in Greece, this mode of punishing criminals was practised; especially in cases of parricide, and when a person was devoted to destruction for the public safety, as in cases of plague, famine, &c. That this was the custom in Greece, we learn from the Scholiast on the Equites of Aristophanes. When a person was drowned, they hung a weight, or vast stone, about his neck. We find that it was also a positive institution of the ancient Hindoo law.' Dr. A. Clarke. It is still practised by the Ottoman Porte.

Verses 7—9.

Our Lord here proceeded to speak more generally concerning 'offences' meaning, not only the injuries and snares, by which men would discourage and entangle his disciples, and bring guilt on themselves; but all those evils within the church, which prejudice men's minds against his religion, or any of its doctrines, true ministers, and disciples. The scandalous lives, and shameless oppressions, cruelties, and iniquities of men called Christians, their divisions and bloody contentions, the schismatical and heretical sects, at this day, the great offences, and causes of stumbling, to Jews, Mohammedans, and Pagans, in all the four quarters of the globe; they constitute one grand hindrance to the labors of missionaries; and they furnish infidels, of every description, with their most dangerous weapons against the truth. The acrimonious controversies, agitated among those who agree in the principal doctrines of the Gospel, and their mutual contempt and revilings, together with the extravagant notions and wicked practices found among them, excite strong prejudices in the minds of great multitudes against evangelical religion; and harden the hearts of heretics, Pharisees, disguised infidels, and careless sinners, against the truths of the Gospel. In these, and in numberless other ways, it may be said, 'Woe unto the world because of offences!' for the devil, the sower of those tares, makes use of them in deceiving the nations of the earth, and in murdering the souls of men. In the present state of human nature, it must needs be, that offences should come; and God has wise and righteous reasons for permitting them: yet we should consider it as the greatest of personal afflictions, or causes of sorrow and shame, to be accessory to the destruction of souls; and an awful woe is denounced against every one, whose delusions or crimes thus stumble men, and set them against the only method of salvation. If this is done wilfully, and is not repented of, the offender's punishment will be most tremendous: and believers ought to dread occasional falls far more than death, and submit to any present loss or self-denial, rather than cause others to fall. (Marg. Ref. p. r.—Notes, 2 Sam. 12: 14. Luke 17: 1—4. Rom. 2: 17—24. v. 24. 2 Pet. 2: 1—3, v. 2.) In this connection, therefore, our Lord introduced again a warning and counsel, which have already been considered; (Marg. Ref. s.—u.—Note, 5: 23, 30.) and which here intimate, that they, who for the sake of temporal interest or indulgence, or from regard to any friend or relative, or to avoid loss or self-denial, wilfully cause others to stumble, have reason to suspect themselves of hypocrisy, and to fear lest they should perish through their own unrepented lusts, and so fall into perdition themselves, as well as prove scandals to their profession. We ought not to forget, that there was a Judas in the company, to which this warning was addressed. 'The necessity' here mentioned is therefore only conditional, 'on supposition of the wickedness of men not hindered, the subtlety and malignity of Satan, and the self-denial required of all who would embrace the Gospel; whence nothing could be expected, but that many should be scandalized at, and be unwilling to embrace, the Gospel upon these terms, and many who had once embraced it should 'fly off from it.' Whither, To maintain any other kind of necessity, is not Christian predestination, but heathen fatalism.—We can not for a moment suppose, that any will enter halt or maimed into heaven, but even if that could be, it would be infinitely preferable, to being 'cast into everlasting fire.' elves are good, and may be used as instruments of good, even those, through the corruptions of our hearts, prove snares to us, incline us to sin, and hinder us in duty. [2.] In such a case, we must, as far as lawfully we may, part with that which we cannot keep without being entangled in sin by it. First,

(7.) Needs be that offences come. 'In Scripture language, to offend is, to be accessory to the crimes of others, and share in the guilt of them, by having promoted them by our advice, direction, or example; not barely to do an act offensive to others. As it consists with Divine goodness to create free agents, so, consequently, to permit offences; and the justice of God in punishing them cannot reasonably be questioned, because He is no farther concerned than in the creation of the powers He bestows: the agents themselves only are chargeable with the abuse of them; the necessity under which offenders lie being only voluntary and moral. There is no necessary connection between liberty and sin: the one, indeed is the gift of God; the other, the free act of man. Great, therefore, is the ingratitude, great the injustice of charging our iniquities on Him, and calling his bounties cruelties, merely because we can and do misapply them.'

As to the question, apparently involved in this discussion, concerning the origin of evil, we may simply say with Dr. Bundy, quoted above, unless it interfere with the purity of God to form creatures superior to us, and make them more like Himself, by giving them a liberty of action; we must allow his goodness to be in no way impeached by his permitting offences; or we may advert to the fact, that if God created any beings, such as himself were inferior to Himself, and therefore, in various degrees, imperfect.

The same heresies, divisions, and scandal, which cause numbers to stumble to their ruin, frequently mislead and ensnare unestablished believers also; and thus tend as much to their destruction as any thing can do. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Rom. 14:13-18, p. 13, 15, 19-23, p. 19-21. 1 Cor. 8: 7-13.) Such as are strong, or think themselves so, are apt to undervalue and despise weak, wavering, and unconformed but that here should be offences; and God has determined to permit them for wise and holy ends, that both they which are perfect, and they which are not, may be made manifest. See 1 Cor. 11: 19. Dan. 11: 35. Being told, before, that there will be seducers, tempters, persecutors, and many bad examples, let us stand on our guard, ch. 24: 24. Acts 20: 29, 30.

(2.) That they would be woeful things, and of fatal consequence. Here is a double woe annexed to offences:

[1.] A woe to the careless and unguarded, to whom the offence is given; Woe to the world because of offences. The obstructions and oppositions given to faith and holiness, are the bane and plague of mankind, and the ruin of thousands. As for those whom God hath chosen and called out of the world, they are preserved by the power of God from the prejudice of these offences. They that love God's law, have great peace, and nothing shall offend them. Ps. 119: 165.

[2.] A woe to the wicked, who wilfully give the offence; But woe to that man by whom the offence comes. Though it must needs be, that the offence will come, that will be no excuse for the offenders. Note, Though God makes the sins of sinners to serve his purposes, that will not secure them from his wrath: and the guilt will be laid at the door of those who give the offence, though they also fall under a woe, who take it. Note, They who any way hinder the salvation of others will find their own condemnation the more intolerable, like Jeroboam, who sinned and made Israel to sin. This woe is the moral of that judicial law, (Exod. 21: 33, 34. 22: 6.) that he who opened the pit, and kindled the fire, was accountable for all the damage that ensued. The anti-christian generation, by whom came the great offence, will fall under this woe, for their delusion of sinners, (2 Thess. 2: 11, 12.) and their persecutions of saints; (Rev. 17: 1, 2, 6.) for men will be reckoned with, not only for their doings, but for the fruit of their doings, the mischief done by them.

II. In particular, Christ here speaks of offences given.

1. By us to ourselves, which is expressed by our hand or foot offending us; in such a case, it must be cut off; v. 8, 9. This Christ had said before, (ch. 5: 29, 30,) where it especially refers to seventh-commandment sins; here it is taken more generally.

(1.) What is here enjoined. We must part with an eye, or a hand, or a foot, that is, that, whatever it is, which is dear to us, when it proves unavoidably an occasion of sin to us. Note, [1.] Many prevailing temptations to sin arise from within ourselves; if there were never a devil to tempt us, we should be drawn away of our own lusts: nay, those things which in themselves are good, and may be used as instruments of good, even those, through the corruptions of our hearts, prove snares to us, incline us to sin, and hinder us in duty. [2.] In such a case, we must, as far as lawfully we may, part with that which we cannot keep without being entangled in sin by it. First, disciples, when they see them mistaken or perplexed in their judgments; and liable to be discouraged or drawn aside, by example, authority, persuasion, or plausible reasonings: yet these things may often be the effect of deep humility, combined with weak natural abilities and insufficient instruction. Our Lord therefore cautioned his disciples, not to aspire after being the greatest, and not to despise the least of those who professed themselves his disciples. The persons whom He addressed, were ministers, and the admonition is therefore especially directed to all their successors in that sacred function; who are, alas! very apt to pay far more regard to the eminent, the wise, and the strong, (than to say the wealthy,) than to the poor, the ignorant, and the weak of the flock. (Notes, Rom. 14: 1-3. Gal. 2: 1-5.)

(10.) Their angels. 'It was an opinion of the Gentiles that some persons had attendant angels; so Dio Cassius, Horace, &c. believe, however, that they confined them to persons of distinction. Among the Jews it was a general belief (which Christ in his wisdom pleased not to disturb), that every person had his attendant angel, who was considered as his representative, and to whom they seem to have thought that he bore a personal resemblance. (As we find from Acts 12: 15. "it is his angel.") Some confined them to the good. So Heb. 1: 14. By the generality it was thought that all had their attendant angels; so Theophrastus, and the Mohammedans. Among many opinions about the offices of these angels, (see Lightfoot.) the Jews thought the angelic representative stood in the same favor with God as did the person himself. This will guide us to the real meaning of our Savior. "These my humble and unambitious followers enjoy the perpetual favor and approbation of my Father," &c. So Euthymius and Theophylact.'

some think, the special dignity and honor of the little ones' angels; the prime ministers of state are said to see the king's face, (Esth. 1: 14.) as if the strongest angels had the charge of the weakest saints. 2. It bespeaks their continual readiness to minister to the saints. They behold the face of God, expecting to receive orders from Him what to do for the good of the saints. As the eyes of the servant are to the hand of his master, ready to go or come on the least beck, &c. the eyes of the angels are upon the face of God, waiting for the intimations of his will, which those winged messengers fly swiftly to fulfil; they go and return like a flash of lightning, Ezek. 1: 14. If we spise them; we must be afraid of the sin, and very cautious what we say and do, lest we should inadvertently give offence to Christ's little ones, and put contempt on them, without being aware of it. There were those that hated them, and cast them out, and yet said, Let the Lord be glorified. And we must be afraid of the punishment; 'Take heed of despising them; for it is at your peril if you do.'

(2.) The reasons to enforce the caution. We must not look on these little ones as contemptible, because really they are considerable. Let not earth despise those whom heaven respects. To prove that the little ones which believe in Christ are worthy to be respected, consider,

[1.] The ministration of the good angels about them; v. 10. This Christ saith to us, and we may take it on his word, who came from heaven to let us know what is done there by the world of angels. Two things he lets us know concerning them,

First, That they are the little ones' angels. God's angels are theirs; for all his is ours, if we be Christ's, 1 Cor. 3: 22. They are theirs; for they have a charge concerning them to minister for their good, Heb. 1: 14. Some have imagined that every particular saint has a guardian angel; but why should we suppose that, when we are sure that every particular saint, when there is occasion, has a guard of angels? This is particularly applied here to the little ones. While the great ones of the world have honorable men for their retinue and guards, the little ones of the church are attended with glorious angels. It is had being enemies to those who are so guarded; and it is good having God for our God, for then we have his angels for our angels.

Secondly, That they always behold the face of the Father in heaven. This bespeaks, 1. The angels' continual felicity and honor. The happiness of heaven consists in the vision of God, seeing him face to face as He is, beholding his beauty; this the angels have without interruption, even when ministering to us on earth, Rev. 4: 8. Luke 1: 19. The expression intimates, as

V. 7-14. What miseries come upon the world, through scandals in the church! This should render men careful not to admit prejudices against Christianity, from the misconduct of those who profess it, but to examine what Christianity is, in its nature and tendency, as it stands in the Scripture. Yet, alas! few will adopt this method. While, therefore, we mourn over the evils which we cannot remedy, we should be careful not to add to them, and should fear death far less than dishonoring the Gospel, and causing souls to stumble and perish by our misconduct. We ought constantly to associate the idea of the Redeemer's glory with that of our own salvation, and to mortify every inclination, and renounce every interest, which may throw a stumbling-block in the way of others, even as if it endangered the loss of our own souls. This disposition is a proper evidence that we are true believers: but how dreadful will be the disappointment of selfish, or self-indulgent persons, who prove the ruin of their neighbors, and will at last sink themselves into the unquenchable and everlasting fire of hell, under the guilt of those sins, and the power of those darling sinful inclinations, which they refused here to relinquish and mortify? We should then keep at distance from every extreme, and labor to remove those offences which prejudice men against the Gospel; remembering that those persons are peculiarly entitled to our prayers, and countenance, who attempt, by any proper means, to terminate oppressions, reform corruptions, and heal divisions, within the church. Numbers, who have been awakwould behold the face of God in glory hereafter; as the angels do, (Luke 20: 36.) we must behold the face of God now, in readiness to our duty, as they do, Acts 9: 6.

[2.] The gracious design of Christ concerning them; v. 11. This is a reason, First, Why the little ones' angels have such a charge concerning them; it is in pursuance of Christ's design to save them. Note, The ministration of angels is founded in the mediation of Christ. Secondly, Why they are not to be despised; because Christ came to save them. Note, 1. Our souls by nature are lost souls; as a traveller is lost, that is out of his way, as a convicted prisoner is lost. 2. Christ's errand into the world was, to save that which was lost, to save those that are spiritually lost from being eternally so. 3. This is a good reason why the least and weakest believer should not be despised or offended. If Christ put such a value on them, let us not undervalue them. If He denied Himself so much for their salvation, surely we should deny ourselves for their edification and consolation. See this argument urged, Rom. 14: 15. 1 Cor. 8: 11, 12. Nay, if Christ came into the world to save souls, and his heart is so much on that work, He will reckon severely with those that obstruct and hinder it, and so thwart his great design.

[3.] The tender regard which our heavenly Father has to these little ones, and his concern for their welfare. This is illustrated by a comparison, v. 12-14. Observe the gradation in the argument; the angels of God are their servants, the Son of God is their Savior, and, to complete their honor, God Himself is their Friend. None shall pluck them out of my Father's hand, John 10: 28.

Here is, First, The comparison, v. 12, 13. Now this is applicable, 1. To the state of fallen man in general; he is strayed like a lost sheep, the angels that stood, were as the ninety-nine that never went astray; wandering man is sought on the mountains, which Christ, in great fatigue, traversed in pursuit of him, and he is found; which is matter of joy. Greater joy there is in heaven for returning sinners than for remaining angels. 2. To particular believers, who are offended and put out of their way. Now though but one of a hundred should be driven off, yet that one shall be looked after with a great deal of care, the return of it welcomed with a great deal of pleasure; and therefore the wrong done to it, no doubt, will be reckoned for with a great deal of displeasure.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

ened to a concern about their souls, stumble and perish by the misconduct of professed disciples; and weak Christians are greatly harassed and perplexed by them. We ought therefore seriously to consider, what effects our conduct may have on persons of these descriptions: and by no means to despise the scruples and mistakes of our weak brethren, or endanger their comfort and progress from selfish motives. Ministers, especially, are called upon to watch over the weak, and discouraged, and the young unestablished convert, to comfort the feeble-minded, and to be gentle, compassionate, and long-suffering towards them. And shall any of us refuse attention to those, unto whom the blessed angels delight to minister; whom the Son of God came to seek and save; and concerning whom 'it is the Father's good pleasure, that not one of them should perish?' This would be the more inexorable, in us, seeing we all have been 'as lost sheep; and have been ransomed by the blood, and brought back by the tender care of our good Shepherd; who delights more in saving lost sinners, than even in the worship of those holy angels, who never went astray, and who receives, as it were, a new accession of joy and glory, by every one that is brought back to his fold. Let us then remember from what a dreadful state we have been saved, and copy the pattern of our gracious Benefactor; and study to be gentle, harmless and useful, as behoves 'the sheep of his pasture.'

One, ninety and nine.] 'A common kind of proverb among the Jews, as, "if ninety-nine die by reason of cold; but one, by the hand of God," &c. &c.

Verse 14.

From this striking comparison, our Lord shows the care which the Father takes of the weakest of his true people. The disciples of Christ ought therefore to copy the example of angels, of the Son of God, and of the Father Himself, respecting them; and not that of proud Pharisees. (Marg. Ref.—See also Luke 15: 1, 2. 8-10, 22-32. John 6: 36-40. 10: 28-31.) they will be reckoned with for it by Him, who, in his saints, as in other things, is jealous of his honor, see Isa. 3: 15. What mean ye that ye beat my people? Ps. 76: 8, 9.

Observe, Christ called God, (v. 19.) my Father which is in heaven; He calls Him, (v. 14.) your Father which is in heaven; intimating that He is not ashamed to call his poor disciples brethren; for have not He and they one Father? I ascend to my Father and your Father; (John 20: 17.) therefore ours because his. This intimates likewise the ground of the safety of his little ones; that God is their Father. A father takes care of all his children, but is particularly tender of the little ones, Gen. 33: 13. He is their Father in heaven; a place of prospect, and therefore He sees all the indignities offered them; and a place of power, therefore He is able to avenge them. This comforts offended little ones, that their Witness is in heaven, (Job 16: 19.) their Judge there, Ps. 68: 5.

V. 15-20. Christ comes next to direct what to do in case of offences given; which may be understood either of personal injuries, or of public scandals. Let us consider it both ways.

I. Let us apply it to personal injuries. If thy brother grieve, (1 Cor. 8: 12.) affront, condemn or abuse thee, if he blemish thy good name, encroach on thy rights, or injure thee in thy estate; if he be guilty of any of those trespasses that are specified, (Lev. 6: 2, 3.)—if he transgress the laws of justice, charity, or relative duties; these are trespasses against us, and often happen among Christ's disciples, and sometimes, for want of prudence, are of very mischievous consequence. Now the rule prescribed in this case is,

1. Go, and tell him his fault between him and thee alone; compare, Lev. 19: 17. Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thy heart; that is, 'If thou art displeased at thy brother for any injury he hath done thee, do not suffer thy resentments to ripen into a secret malice, but give vent to them in a mild and grave admonition; do not go and rail against him behind his back, but thou shalt in any wise reprove him: if thou wouldst convince him, do not expose him, for that will but exasperate him, and make the reproof look like a revenge.' This agrees with Prov. 25: 8, 9. Go not forth hastily to strive, but debate thy cause with thy neighbor himself, argue it calmly and amicably; and if he shall hear thee, well and good, thou hast gained thy brother, there is an end of the controversy, and it is a happy end; let no more be said of it, but let the falling out of friends be the renewing of friendship.

2. If he will not hear thee, try what he will say, if thou take one or two more, not only to be witnesses of what passes, but to reason the case further with him; they will be disinterested; and if reason will rule him, the word of reason in the mouth of two or three witnesses will be better spoken to him, and perhaps it will influence him to acknowledge his error, and to say, I repent.

3. If he shall neglect to hear them, then tell it to the church, to the ministers, elders, or other officers, or the most considerable persons in the congregation you belong to; make them the referees to accommodate the matter, and do not presently appeal to the magistrate, or fetch a writ for him. This is fully explained by the apostle; (1 Cor. 6.) he would have the saints to judge those small matters, (v. 2.) that pertain to this life, v. 3. If you ask, 'Who is the church?' The apostle directs there, (v. 5.) Is there not a wise man among you? Those of the church that are presumed to be most capable of determining such matters; and he speaks ironically, when he says, (v. 4.) Set them to judge, who are least esteemed in the church; those, if there be no better, those, rather than suffer an irreconcilable breach between two church-members. This rule was then in a special manner requisite, when the civil government was in the hands of such as were not only aliens, but enemies.

4. 'If he will not hear the church, but persists in the wrong he has done thee, and proceeds to do thee further wrong, let him be to thee as a heathen man, and a publican; take the benefit of the law against him, but let that always be the last remedy; appeal not to the courts of justice till thou hast first tried all other means. Or thou mayst, if thou wilt, break off thy friendship and familiarity with him—though thou must by no means study revenge. Thou wouldst have preserved his friendship but he would not, and so has forfeited it.' If a man cheat and abuse me once, it is his fault; if twice, it is my own.

II. Let us apply it to public scandal. Christ, having taught us to indulge the weakness of our brethren, here cautions us not to indulge their wickedness under pretence of that. Designing to erect a church for Himself in the world, He took care for the preservation, 1. Of its purity, that it might have an expulsive power to cleanse and clear itself, like a fountain of living waters. 2. Of its peace and order, that every member may know his place and duty, and its purity be preserved in a regular way and not tumultuously. Now let us see,

(1.) What is the case supposed; If thy brother trespass against thee. [1.] 'The offender is a brother.' Note, Church-discipline is for church-members. Them that are without, God judges, 1 Cor. 5: 12, 13. When any trespass is done against us, it is good to remember that the trespasser is a brother, which furnishes us with a qualifying consideration. [2.] 'The offence is a trespass against thee; if thy brother do any thing which is offensive to thee as a Christian.' Note, Christ and believers have common interests; what is done against them, Christ takes as done against Himself; and what is done against Him, they cannot but take as done against themselves. The reproaches of them that reproached thee are fallen upon me, Ps. 69: 9.

(2.) What is to be done in this case. We have here,

[1.] The rules prescribed, v. 15-17.

1st. Go and tell him his fault between him and thee alone. Do not stay till he comes to thee, but go to him, as the physician visits the patient. Note, We should think no pains too much to take for the recovering of a sinner to repentance. Tell him his fault, and the evil of it, show him his abominations. Note, People are loath to see their faults, and have need to be told of them. Great sins often amuse conscience, and for the present stupefy and silence it; and there is need of help to awaken it. David's own heart smote him, when he had cut off Saul's skirt, and when he had numbered the people; but (which is very strange) we do not find that it smote him in the matter of Uriah, till Nathan told him, Thou art the man.

Tell him his fault, argue the case with him; (so the word signifies); 'and do it with reason and argument, not with passion.' Christum reproof is an ordinance of Christ for the bringing of sinners to repentance, and must be managed as an ordinance. 'Let the reproof be private, that it may appear you seek not his reproach, but his repentance.' Note, It is a good rule, not to speak of our brethren's faults to others, till we have first spoken of them to themselves; this would make less reproaching and more reproof; less sin committed, and more duty done. It will be likely to work on an offender, when he sees his reprover concerned not only for his salvation, in telling him his fault, but for his reputation, in telling him of it privately.

If he shall hear thee, that is, 'heed thee, if

Verses 15-17.

Our Lord next prescribed some rules for stopping the progress, and preventing the consequences of contentions among Christians, which could seldom fail of being effectual, if honestly and exactly followed. It would be absurd to restrict these rules to any particular form of church-government and discipline; yet they certainly suppose the existence of government and discipline among the disciples of Christ, and the exclusion of disorderly persons, from those societies to which they immediately belong; and they are capable of being reduced to practice, under different forms of church-government; though they are alas! in great measure, neglected by all.

(15.) These rules respecting an offending brother, were well known to and practised by the Jews. Maimonides speaks of private and more public admonition. 'He that sinneth against his fellow, it is necessary that he say to him, I have offended against thee. If he receive him, well; if not, he must bring two men, and appease him, before them.' They likewise use, specifically to proclaim as a terrible punishment the synagogue.

17 And if he shall neglect to hear them, tell it unto the church: but if he neglect to hear the church, let him be unto thee as an heathen man and a publican.

18 Verily I say unto you, Whatsoever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven.

19 Again I say unto you, That if two of you shall agree on earth, as touching any thing that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of my Father which is in heaven.

Tell it to the church. But what church? is the question. The civil magistrate, say some; The Jewish sanhedrim then in being, say others; but by what follows, (v. 18.) it is plain that He means a Christian church, now in the embryo. 'Tell it to the church, that particular church, in the communion of which the offender lives; to those of that congregation, who are by consent appointed to receive informations of that kind; to the minister or ministers, the elders or deacons, or (if such the constitution of the society,) to the representatives or heads of the congregation, or to all the members of it; let them examine the matter, and if they find the complaint groundless, let them rebuke the comis well, thou hast gained thy brother; thou hast helped to save him from sin and ruin, and it will be thy credit and comfort,' James 5: 19, 20. Note, The converting of a soul is the winning of that soul; (Prov. 11: 30.) and if the loss of a soul be a great loss, the gain of a soul is sure no small gain.

2dly. If that doth not prevail, then take with thee one or two more, v. 15. Note, We must not be weary of well-doing, though we see not presently the good success of it. In work of this kind we must travail in birth again, Gal. 4: 19.

'Take with thee one or two more; 1. They may speak some pertinent, convincing word which thou didst not think of, and may manage the matter with more prudence than thou didst.' Note, Christians should see their need of help in doing good, and pray in the aid one of another. 2. 'To affect him.' Note, Those should think it high time to repent and reform, who see their misconduct become a general offence and scandal. 3. 'To be witnesses of his conduct, in case the matter should afterward be brought before the church.' None should come under the censure of the church as obstinate and contumacious, till it be very well proved that they are so.

3dly. If he neglect to hear them, and will not be humbled, then tell it to the church, v. 17. Note, 1. Private admonitions must always go before public censures; if gentler methods will do the work, those that are more rough and severe must not be used, Tit. 3: 10. Those that will be reasoned out of their sins, need not be shamed out of them. Let God's work be done effectually, but with as little noise as may be; his kingdom comes with power, but not with observation. But, 2. Where private admonition does not prevail, there public censure must take place. The church must receive the complaints of the offended, and rebuke the sins of the offenders, and judge between them, after an impartial; if they find it just, let them rebuke the offender, and call him to repentance. It is an awful thing to receive a reproof from a church, from a minister, a reprover by office, and therefore it is the more regarded by such as pay any deference to an institution of Christ's and his ambassadors.

4thly. 'If he neglect to hear the church, and will neither be ashamed of his faults, nor amend them, let him be unto thee as a heathen man and a publican;' let him be cast out of the church, and let the members be warned to withdraw from him, that he may be ashamed of his sin, and they not be infected by it, or made chargeable with it. Those who put contempt on the orders and rules of a society, and bring reproach on it, forfeit the honors and privileges of it, and are justly laid aside till they repent and submit, and reconcile themselves to it again. Christ has appointed this method for the vindicating of the church's honor, the preserving of its purity, and the conviction and reformation of those that are scandalous. But observe, He doth not say, 'Let him be to thee as a devil or damned spirit, as one whose case is desperate,' but, 'as a heathen and a publican, as one in a capacity of being restored and received in again. Count him not as an enemy, but admonish him as a brother.' The directions given to the church of Corinth concerning the incestuous person, agree with the rules here, 1 Cor. 5: 2, 11, 13.

[2.] Here is a warrant signed for the ratification of all the church's proceedings according to these rules, v. 18. What was said before to Peter, is here said to all the disciples, and in them to all the faithful office-bearers in the church, to the world's end. While ministers preach the word of Christ faithfully, and in their government of the church strictly adhere to his laws, they may be assured that He will own them, and ratify what they say and do, so that it shall be taken as said and done by Himself. He will own them,

1st. In their sentence of suspension; Whatsoever ye shall bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven. If the censures of the church duly follow the institution of Christ, his judgments will follow the censures of the church; (Rom. 11: 8.) for Christ will not suffer his own ordinances to be trampled on. How light soever proud scornors may make of the censures of the church, let them know that they are confirmed in the court of heaven. They that are shut out

(17.) Church.] 'It would be contrary to all rules of criticism, to suppose that our Lord used this term in a sense wherein it could not then be understood by any one of his hearers; or that He would say congregation, for so the word literally imports, when He meant only a few heads or directors.'

Verse 18.

A groundless sentence of excommunication, or absolution, cannot possibly make any alteration in a man's state or character: all such decisions being merely declaratory. This has been entirely overlooked, in all those scandalous perversions of church-censures, which are the real cause of that relaxation, or rather destitution of discipline, which now so generally prevails. (Marg. Ref.—See Note, 16: 19.) Our Lord spoke to the apostles, and to all of them. The absolute authority given them was inseparably connected with their immediate inspection; and all their successors, pretended or real, from the consistory at Rome, to an independent church-meeting are concerned in the clause at Rome, to an independent church-meeting are concerned in the promise; just so far as their decisions, whether they bind or loose, accord to the doctrines, precepts, and rules, transmitted to us from the apostles; and no further. 'Nor shall you only in these cases, have power as Christians, to loose your repenting, and bind your obstinately offending brother; but, as you are my apostles, to whom I have promised my Spirit "to teach you all things, and lead you into all truth," whatsoever things ye shall bind on earth, or shall declare to be forbidden on pain of my displeasure, shall render them indeed obnoxious to my wrath: and whatsoever things ye shall loose on earth, (which once required by divine authority, of those who owned the law of Moses,) shall be loosed in heaven; and men shall be allowed to do them, without incurring my displeasure. And in this sense, this promise is the foundation of our obligation to believe and obey all the commands and doctrines of the apostles, and of the cessation of the ritual precepts of the law of Moses.' Whitby. Authority, to the extent of the words used by our Lord, many have claimed, but God never gave it to any, except his inspired apostles: and in this view, the promise is our Lord's full attestation to all the writings, which by them, and under their inspection, were given to the church and to posterity, as the infallible oracles of God. Scott.

Bind, &c.] 'See ch. 16: 19.' When the Jews set any apart to be a preacher, they used these words, 'Take thou liberty to teach what is bound and what is loose.' Strype.

It is here supposed, that all such transactions, as those above mentioned, would be conducted with prayer for direction, and for the humiliation of the offender; and in this case, not only when many, but even when two persons should agree to present their joint request on earth, the eternal Father, whose throne is in heaven, would surely regard and answer it. Some interpret this, of those miraculous interpositions, by which the censures of the church were sometimes followed and confirmed in the primitive times; or restrict it to the apostles, i.e. the execution of their important office: and, as they were immediately addressed, this might be especially intended: (Notes, 1 Cor. 4: 18-21 v. 21. 5: 1-5, v. 5. 2 Cor. 13: 1-4, 7-10. 1 Tim. 1: 18-20.) yet it seems to be also a general promise encouraging social prayer, especially in arduous cases. (Marg. Ref. x. y.) When such prayers are presented in faith, and the petition of them is conducive to our good, and to the glory of God, we are every where warranted to expect a favorable answer; and limitations must have been implied, even in the days when miracles were wrought. To this our Lord added, that when two or three were assembled in his name; that is, in dependence on his promise, in obedience to his command, out of love to Him, and regard to his glory, for prayer or other acts of worship, to hear his word, or to regulate those things, which pertain to the peace and purity of his church; 'there, says He, 'I AM, in the midst of you.' He says not, I will be, but, I am, referring to his divine presence, at all times and in all places; and to his special presence by the influences of his Spirit, to communicate blessings to his people, whenever or wherever they wait upon Him for them. Two or three of his true disciples may be thus met together, in ten thousand different places all over the earth, at the same time: this must therefore be allowed to be a direct assertion of his omnipresent Deity; and cannot, on any other supposition, be rendered consistent with propriety. (Marg. Ref. z. a.—Notes, 28: 19, 20, v. 20. Eccl. 3: 14. 20: 21-25, v. 24. John 8: 54-59, v. 58. Rev. 3: 1-3, v. 1.)

(19.) Two of you.] 'Hence Peter and John act jointly together among the Jews (Acts 3: 4. &c.) and they act jointly among the Samaritans, (Acts 8: 14.) and Paul and Barnabas among the Gentiles Acts 13: 2.'

20 For where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them.

21 ¶ Then came Peter to him, and said, Lord, how oft shall my brother sin against me, and I forgive him? till seven times?

fight with God. Paul speaks in the person of Christ, when he saith, To whom ye forgive any thing, I forgive also. 2 Cor. 2:10.

Now it is a great honor which Christ here puts on the church, that He will condescend not only to take cognizance of their sentences, but to confirm them; and in the following verses we have two things laid down as the ground of this.

(1.) God's readiness to answer the church's prayers; v. 19. Apply this, [1.] In general, to all the requests of the faithful; they shall not seek God's face in vain. Many promises we have in Scripture of a gracious answer to prayer, but this gives a particular encouragement to joint prayer; 'the requests which two of you agree in, much more which many agree in.' No law of heaven limits the number of petitioners. Note, Christ has been pleased to put honor on the joint prayers of the faithful. If they join in the same prayer, together, on some special errand, or, though at a distance, agree in some particular matter of prayer, they shall speed well. God is particularly pleased with union and communion in the prayers of the saints. See 2 Chron. 6:13. Acts 4:31.

[2.] In particular, to those requests that are put up to God about binding and loosing; to which this promise seems more especially to refer. Observe, 1st. That the power of church-discipline is not here lodged in the hand of a single person, but two, at least, are supposed to be concerned in it. When the incestuous Corinthian was to be cast out, the church was gathered together, (1 Cor. 5:4.) and it was a punishment inflicted of many, 2 Cor. 2:6. 2dly. It is good to see those who have the management of church-discipline, agreeing in it. Heats and animosities among those whose work it is to remove offences, will be the greatest offence of all. 3dly. Prayer must evermore go along with church-discipline. Pass no sentence, which you cannot in faith ask God to confirm. The binding and loosing spoken of, (ch. 16:19) was done by preaching, this by praying. Thus the whole power of gospel-ministers is resolved into the word and prayer, to which they must wholly give themselves. He doth not say, 'If you shall agree to sentence and decree a thing, it shall be done;' (as if ministers were judges and lords;) but, 'If you agree to ask it of God, from Him you shall obtain it.' Prayer must go along with all our endeavors for the conversion of sinners; see James 5:16. 4thly. The unanimous petitions of the church of God, for the ratification of their just censures, shall be heard in heaven; and obtain an answer; and if Christ say, 'It shall be done,' we may be assured that it is done, though we see not the effect in the way we look for it. God doth especially own and accept us, when praying for those that have offended Him and us. The Lord turned the captivity of Job, not when he prayed for himself, but when he prayed for his friends who had trespassed against him.

(2.) The presence of Christ in the assemblies of Christians; (v. 20.) the promise refers to meetings where two or three are gathered in his name, not only for discipline, but for religious worship, or any act of Christian communion. Assemblies of Christians for holy purposes are hereby appointed, directed, and encouraged.

[1.] They are hereby appointed; the church of Christ exists most visibly in religious assemblies; it is the will of Christ that these should be set up, and kept up for the honor of God, the edification of men, and the preserving of a face of religion on the world. When God intends special answers to prayer, He calls for a solemn assembly, Joel 2:15, 16. If there be no opportunity for large assemblies, yet then it is the will of God that two or three should gather together, to show their good will to the great congregation. Note, When we cannot do what we would in religion, we must do as we can, and God will accept us.

[2.] They are hereby directed to gather together in Christ's name. In the exercise of church-discipline, they must come together in the name of Christ, 1 Cor. 5:4. That name gives to what they do authority on earth, and acceptableness in heaven. In meeting for worship, we must have an eye to Christ; must come together, by virtue of his warrant and appointment, in token of our relation to Him, professing faith in Him, and in communion with all that in every place call upon Him. When we come together, to worship from the congregation of the righteous now, shall not stand in it in the great day, Ps. 1:5. Christ will not own those, as his, whom the church has duly delivered to Satan; but if through error or envy the censures of the church be unjust, Christ will graciously find those who are so cast out, John 9:34, 35.

2dly. In their sentence of absolution; Whatsoever ye shall loose on earth, shall be loosed in heaven. Note, 1. No church-censures bind so fast, but that, on the sinner's repentance and reformation, they may and must be loosed again. Sufficient is the punishment which has attained its end, 2 Cor. 2:6. There is no unpassable gulf fixed but that between hell and heaven. 2. Those who, on their repentance, are received to communion again, may take the comfort of their absolution in heaven, if their hearts be up to communion again, when he saith, To whom ye forgive any thing, I forgive also. 2 Cor. 2:10.

God in dependence on the Spirit and grace of Christ as Mediator, having an actual regard to Him as our Way to, and Advocate with the Father, then we are met together in his name.

[3.] They are hereby encouraged with an assurance of the presence of Christ; There am I in the midst. By his common presence He is in all places, as God; but this is a promise of his special presence. Where his saints are, there He will dwell; it is his rest, (Ps. 132:14.) his walk; (Rev. 2:1.) He is in the midst of them as the sun in the midst of the universe: it is a spiritual presence, the presence of Christ's Spirit with their spirits. There am I, not only I will be there, but I am there; as if He came first, they shall find Him there; He repeated this promise at parting, (ch. 23:20.) Lo, I am with you always. Note, The presence of Christ in the assemblies of Christians is promised, and may in faith be prayed for and depended on; There am I. This is equivalent to the Shechinah, or special presence of God in the tabernacle and temple of old, Exod. 40:24. 2 Chron. 5:14.

Though but two or three are met together, Christ is among them; this is an encouragement to the meeting of a few, when it is either, 1st. Of choice, two or three coming together, for mutual assistance in conference or in prayer. Or, 2dly. By constraint; when there are not more than two or three to come together, or, if there be, they dare not, for fear of the Jews. It is not the multitude, but the faith and sincere devotion, of the worshippers, that invites the presence of Christ; and though there be but two or three, the smallest number that can be, yet, if Christ make one among them, their meeting is as honorable and comfortable as if they were two or three thousand.

V. 21-35. This part of the discourse is certainly to be understood of personal wrongs which it is in our power to forgive. Now observe,

I. Peter's question concerning this matter; v. 21.

1. He takes it for granted that he must forgive; Christ had before taught his disciples this lesson, (ch. 6:14, 15.) and Peter has not forgotten it. He knows that he must not only not bear a grudge against his brother, or meditate revenge, but be as good a friend as ever, and forget the injury.

2. He thinks it a great matter, to forgive till seven times; he means not seven times a day, as Christ said, (Luke 17:4.) but seven times in his life; supposing, that if a man had any way abused him seven times, though he were ever so desirous to be reconciled, he might then abandon his society, and have no more to do with him. Perhaps Peter had an eye to Prov. 24:16. A just man falleth seven times; or to the mention of three transgressions, and four, which God would no more pass by, Amos 2:1. Note, There is a proneness in our corrupt nature to stint ourselves in that which is good, and particularly in forgiving, though we have so much forgiven us.

II. Christ's direct answer to Peter's question; I say not unto thee, Until seven times, (he never intended to set up any such bounds,) but, Until seventy times seven; a certain number for an indefinite great one. Note, There is something of ill-nature in scoring up the offences and injuries we forgive, as if we would allow ourselves to be revenged when the measure is full. God keeps an account, (Deut. 32:34.) because He is the Judge, and vengeance is his; but we must not, lest we be found stepping into his throne. It is necessary to the preservation of peace, both within and without, to pass by inju-

(20.) In the midst. [The like do the rabbins speak of two or three sitting in judgment, (or in discourse concerning the law. Schoettgen.) that 'the divine presence' is in the midst of them.] LIGHTFOOT.

Verses 21, 22.

As our Lord had intimated, that his disciples must bestow much pains to preserve or restore peace with their offending brethren, Peter wanted to be informed, how often they were required to renew their forgiveness of injuries, to such as repeated the offence. And, perhaps with reference to the traditions of the elders, he asked whether they were to proceed as far as seven times. To this our Lord answered, '1821 that they ought to forgive, not only to the seventh time, but 'to seventy times seven;' meaning an indefinite number; even as often as men renew their offences, or as God renews his pardons to believers. (Marg. Ref.—Note, Luke 17:3, 4.) The determination of the rabbins in this case runs thus, that three offences are to be remitted, but not the fourth; and this they gather from those words, 'For three transgressions, and for four, I will not turn away my wrath.' Amos 1:3. Peter puts the three and the four together, and enquires whether of their doctors did; and asks, whether he must forgive '1821 times.' Whitby.

22 Jesus saith unto him, I say not unto thee, Until seven times; but, Until seventy times seven.

[Practical Observations.]

23 Therefore ⁴ is the kingdom of heaven likened unto a certain king, ⁵ which would take account of his servants.

24 And when he had begun to reckon, one was brought unto him which ⁶ owed him ⁷ ten thousand * talents:

25 But forasmuch as he had not to pay, his lord ⁸ commanded him, without reckoning how often. God multiplies his pardons, and so should we, Ps. 78: 38, 40. It intimates that we should make it our constant practice to forgive injuries, and should accustom ourselves to it till it becomes habitual.

III. A further discourse of our Savior's, by way of parable, to show the necessity of forgiving the injuries that are done to us. The parable is a comment on the fifth petition of the Lord's prayer, Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us. Those, and those only, may expect to be forgiven of God, who forgive their brethren. The parable represents the kingdom of heaven, that is, the church, and the administration of the gospel dispensation in it. The church is God's family, his court; there He dwells, there He rules. In general, the parable intimates how much provocation God has from his family on earth, and how untoward his servants are.

There are three things in the parable.

1. The master's wonderful clemency to his servant who was indebted to Him; v. 23-27. Where observe,

(1.) Every sin we commit, is a debt to God; not like a debt contracted by buying or borrowing, but like a debt to a prince when a recognizance is forfeited, or a penalty incurred by a breach of the law or a breach of the peace; like the debt of a servant to his master, by withholding his service, wasting his lord's goods, breaking his indentures, and incurring the penalty. We are all debtors.

(2.) There is an account kept of these debts, and we must shortly be reckoned with for them. This king would take account of his servants. God now reckons with us by our consciences.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 15-22. How careful should all Christians be, to preserve the peace, as well as the purity, of the church! Alas! many deem themselves injured, when in reality they have no cause to complain; and others have recourse to slander and litigation, and almost every other expedient, instead of trying the method which Christ has expressly enjoined ⁹ on all his disciples; and few, in any place, have uniformly followed these directions of our common Lord. Various corrupt maxims, customs and reserves, prevent even conscientious men from speaking privately to their offending brethren, and from referring their disputes to the arbitration of pious Christians: hence jealousies, resentments, contentions, and even frivolous law-suits, among professors of the Gospel; and hence mutual criminations, and appeals in print to the world against each other, to the scandal of religion, and the insulting triumphs of its enemies! Surely we ought not to harbor so injurious an opinion of a professed Christian, as to think, that he would not endure to be mildly expostulated with, when he had evidently done wrong! Surely we should prefer gaining, recovering, and conciliating our offended brother, to obtaining a victory over him, or exposing his character! And certainly he who has done injustice, and will not be induced to make moderate concessions and amends, has no right to be treated as a believer, 'till he

'repent and do works meet for repentance.' No man should think himself a competent judge in his own cause: nor should any Christian seek legal redress, till it is evident, that no other means can procure that justice, which it is requisite should be done him. Indeed the abuse of discipline has so prejudiced the minds of numbers against it, that it is grievously fallen into disuse: yet, in whatever way the faithful ministers of Christ, and consistent believers, concur to show their decided disapprobation of an offender's conduct, on Scriptural grounds, it ought to be deemed a very solemn matter; for whatsoever is thus bound or loosed on earth, shall be ratified in heaven, however the offender may despise the protest.—In all our undertakings we should seek direction by prayer; and we cannot too highly value the promises of God to this effect: all the general concerns of families and churches should be conducted with social as well as secret prayer: nor should we ever censure or rebuke any man, without at the same time praying for his humiliation and salvation.—Whenever we meet in the name of Christ, in our families, or in public ordinances, at any time, or in any place, we should realize his presence in the midst of us; that we may both be impressed with awe of his holy, heart-searching eye upon us, and encouraged to expect abundant blessings from Him.

SCOTT.

(22.) Seventy times seven. 'An offence, properly such, is that which is given wantonly, maliciously, and without any provocation. Let a man search ever so accurately, he will not find that he has received, during the whole course of his life, four hundred and ninety (seventy times seven) such offences.'

⁴ Meaning a number without limitation: See Gen. 4: 24.

Bp. PEARCE.

Verses 23-27.

This parable represents God as calling men to account for the use which they have made of their abilities and advantages; especially, as by his conduct in this respect, the true Christian is distinguished from the hypocrite. (Notes, 25: 14-30. Luke 16: 1-12.) It represents our immense obligations to God, and our exceedingly great guilt as transgressors of his law, increased by our neglect or abuse of his Gospel: all indeed are deeply indebted, but some far more than others. (Notes, Luke 7: 40-43.) As the servant was wholly unable to pay this very great debt, his lord commanded that he, and his wife and children, should be sold for slaves, and his substance confiscated, according to the custom of those countries, in order that payment might be made. (Marg. Ref. h.—Notes, Ex 21: 2. 2 Kings 4: 1. Neh. 5: 1-5. Is. 60: 1-3, v. 1. Dan. 8: 24.) [Lev. 22: 3. Lev. 27: 1-8. Amos 8: 6. which state continued six years.] This represents the strictness of the law and justice of God, and the dreadful punishment to which sinners are righteously exposed; from which they cannot deliver themselves, and in which their connections are often involved. The servant, terrified, in the most submissive posture, craved time and patience, and promised that he would at length discharge the whole debt: this may show the terrors and convictions, to which men are subject from a view of the severity of God's justice, and that general hope of mercy by which they seek relief: but the engagement, 'I will pay thee all,' seems an intimation of an unburdened and self-confident spirit. (Notes, 23: 36 v. 25. Luke 14: 4-43 v. 42. Rom. 10: 1-4.) The Lord, however,

One of the first questions that an awakened conscience asks, is, How much owest thou unto my Lord? And unless it be bribed, it will tell the truth, and not write fifty for a hundred. A day of reckoning is coming, when these accounts will be called over, and nothing but the blood of Christ will balance the account.

(3.) The debt of sin is a very great debt; and with some is reckoned than with others. When he began to reckon, one of the first defaulters appeared to owe ten thousand talents, a vast sum, amounting by computation to one million, eight hundred seventy-five thousand pounds sterling. See what our sins are; [1.] For the heinousness of their nature, they are talents, the greatest denomination ever used in the account of money or weight. Every sin is the load of a talent, a talent of lead, this is wickedness, Zech. 5: 7, 8. The trusts committed to us, as stewards of the grace of God, are each a talent, (ch. 25: 15.) and for every one of them buried, much more wasted, we are a talent in debt. [2.] For the vastness of their number; they are ten thousand, a myriad, more than the hairs on our head, Ps. 40: 12. Who can understand the number of his errors, or tell how oft he offends? Ps. 19: 12.

(4.) The debt of sin is greater than we are able to pay; He had not to pay. Sinners are insolvent debtors; the Scripture is a statute of bankruptcy against us all. Silver and gold would not pay our debts, Ps. 49: 6, 7. Sacrifice and offering would not do it; our good works are but God's work in us, and cannot make satisfaction; we are without strength, and cannot help ourselves.

(5.) If God should deal with us in strict justice, we should be condemned as insolvent debtors.

of that servant is induced, by compassion, to set him at liberty and remit the debt; knowing well he would never be able to pay it: this represents the Lord's readiness to forgive all true penitents; and the false conclusions which many thence draw concerning their sins being pardoned, though they be not truly penitent.

BLOOMFIELD.

(24.) Ten thousand talents. 'A myriad of talents, the highest number known in Greek arithmetical notation. According to Priestley, the Roman talent was equal to 2164; ten thousand of which would amount to 2,160,000. If the Jewish talent of silver be designed, which is estimated by the same learned writer at 4504, this sum amounts to 4,500,000, but if the gold talent is meant, which is equal to 7200, then the amount is 72,000,000. (4,500,000, if the silver talent is meant, but if the gold, 67,000,000. Dr. A. Clarke.) This immense sum represents our boundless obligations to God, and our utter incapacity, as sinners infinitely indebted to divine justice, of paying one (mite) out of the talent.' ors, and God might glorify Himself in our utter ruin. Justice demands satisfaction. The servant had contracted his debt by wastefulness and wilfulness, and therefore might justly be left to lie by it. See here what every sin deserves; (v. 25.) this is the wages of sin. [1.] To be sold. Those that sell themselves to work wickedness, must be sold, to make satisfaction. Captives to sin are captives of wrath. He that is sold for a bond-slave, has nothing left him but his life, that he may be sensible of his miseries; which is the case of damned sinners. [2.] Thus he would have payment to be made, that is, something done towards it; though it is impossible that the sale of one so worthless should amount to the payment of so great a debt. By the damnation of sinners, divine justice will be to eternity in the satisfying, but never satisfied.

(6.) Convinced sinners cannot but humble themselves before God, and pray for mercy. The servant fell down at the feet of his royal master, and worshipped him; or, as some copies read it, besought him; his address was very submissive and very importunate, v. 26. The servant knew before that he was so much in debt, but was under no concern about it, till called to an account. Sinners are commonly careless about the pardon of their sins, till they come under the arrests of some awakening word, some startling providence, or approaching death, and then, Wherewith shall I come before the Lord? Mic. 6: 6. How easily, how quickly, can God bring the proudest sinner to his feet: Ahab to his sackcloth, Manasseh to his prayers, Pharaoh to his confessions, Judas to his restitution, Simon Magus to his supplication, Belshazzar and Felix to their tremblings. The stoutest heart will fail, when God sets the sins in order before it. This servant doth not deny the debt, nor seek evasions, nor attempt to abscond.

But, [1.] He begs time; Have patience with me. Patience and forbearance are a great favor, but many are borne with, who are not thereby brought to repentance, (Rom. 2: 4.) and then their being borne with does them no kindness.

[2.] He promises payment; Have patience a while, and I will pay thee all. Note, It is the folly of many who are under convictions of sin, to imagine that they can make God satisfaction for the wrong they have done Him; who go about to establish their own righteousness, Rom. 10: 3. He that had nothing to pay, (v. 25.) fancied he could pay all. See how close pride cleaves even to awakened sinners; they are convinced, but not humbled.

(7.) The God of infinite mercy is very ready to forgive the sins of those that humble themselves before Him; v. 27. The lord of that servant, when he might justly have ruined him, mercifully released him. The servant's prayer was, Have patience with me; the master's grant is, a discharge in full. Note, [1.] The pardon of sin is owing to the mercy of God, to his tender mercy; Luke 1: 77, 78. He was more with compassion. God's reasons of mercy are fetched from within Himself; He has mercy because He will have mercy. God looked with pity on mankind in general, because miserable and sent his Son to be a Surety for them; He looks with pity on particular penitents, because sensible of their misery, and accepts them in the Beloved. [2.] There is forgiveness with God for the greatest sins, if they be repented of. Though the debt was vastly great, he forgave it all. v. 32. [3.] The forgiving of the debt, is the loosing of the debtor; He loosed him; we never walk at liberty till our sins are forgiven. But observe, Though he discharged him from the penalty as a debtor, he did not discharge him from his duty as a servant. The pardon of sin doth not slacken, but strengthen our obligations to obedience; Luke 1: 74. I am thy servant, for thou hast loosed my bonds.

2. The servant's unreasonable severity toward his fellow-servant, notwithstanding his lord's clemency toward him, v. 28-30. This represents the sin of those who, though not unjust, yet are rigorous and unmerciful. Push a claim to an extremity, and it becomes a wrong. To exact satisfaction for debts of injury, which tend neither to reparation nor to the public good, but purely for revenge, though the law may allow it, in order to strike terror, yet savors not of a Christian spirit. To sue for money-debts, when the debtor cannot possibly pay them, and so let him perish in prison, argues a greater love of money, and a less love of our neighbor, than we ought to have, Neh. 5: 7.

Here, (1.) How small the debt was; He owed him a hundred pence or denarii, about three pounds and half a crown of [sterling] money. Note, Offences done to men are nothing to those committed against God. Not that therefore we may make light of wronging our neighbor, for that is also a sin against God; but therefore we should make light of our neighbor's wronging us, and not aggravate it, or study revenge. David was unconcerned at the indignities done to him; I, as a deaf man, heard not; but laid much to heart the sins committed against God for them, rioters of tears ran down his eyes.

(2.) How severe the demand was; He laid hands on him, and took him by the throat. What needed all this violence? The debt might have been demanded without taking the debtor by the throat; without sending for a writ, or setting the sheriff on him. How lordly this man's carriage, and yet how base and servile his spirit! Had he himself been going to prison for his debt to his lord, he might have had some preface for going to this extremity, in requiring his own; but frequently pride and malice prevail more to make men severe than would the most urgent necessity.

(3.) How submissive the debtor was; though his equal, yet knowing how much he lay at his

(26.) Fell down and worshipped him. [Crouched as a dog before him.] Dr. A. Clarke. "Prostrated himself at his feet." Bloomfield. "The form of lowly submission from the servant to his master, which is here described, is still practised in the East among the Arabs, when inferiors, in paying respectful deference to their superiors, fall down before them, and kiss their feet, their knees, or their garments."

Dr. SHAW.

Verses 28-30.

This seemeth to bear hard on those unmerciful and unchristian creditors, who cast poor men, who, they know, have nothing to pay, into prison for their debt; so rendering their brother's state more miserable, and their debt from him as desperate as ever. For sure, he that bid us "lend, hoping for nothing again," will not allow us to imprison, where nothing can be hoped for: and it is to be feared, that men so unmerciful may find but little mercy at that day. For if it be a crime that will then be objected to our condemnation, that we did not visit Christians when in prison: what will it be to cast them into prison? Whitby. (Marg. Ref.) Ten thousand talents were six hundred thousand times as much as the hundred denarii, calculating by Roman talents; (Marg.) by the Jewish talent, they were more than double that sum.

Scott.

(28.) Take him by the throat. [Throttled.] Dr. A. Clarke. "To take by the throat, so as almost to strangle, or rather to twist the neck behind them, was what merciless creditors used frequently to do to debtors, when they dragged them before the magistrates."

WESTEIN, BURDER.

Verses 31-35.

The man's fellow-servants 'were grieved' to see one, who had so merciful a master, thus cruel, and they inform their lord. This shows that real Christians are grieved and shocked at the misconduct of professed believers, more than at the wickedness of those who do not make any pretensions to religion; and that they complain to God of this dishonor thus done to his Gospel. The lord then called the servant, and having reproached him for acting in opposition to his example, and shown the wickedness of his character, and the unreasonableness of his conduct, he delivered him over to the executioners of justice, so he was confined and punished till he had paid the whole debt; and as he was not able to pay it, he could never obtain deliverance. Circumstances in parables do not always admit of minute application. In the parable of the prodigal son, the elder brother, who was evidently the representative of the Pharisees, is spoken of as heir of all his father's property. (Note, Luke 15: 25-32.) Our Lord frequently addresses men, according to what they thought of themselves, and not according to their real character. The servant, in this parable, bears no one mark of a humble penitent: and none but humble penitents are true believers, or really pardoned; though many others think themselves so. The general tenor of Scripture excludes the supposition, that God actually forgives men, and then afterwards imputes guilt to them to their final condemnation. (Notes, Ps. 103: 11-13. Jer. 31: 33, 34. Mic. 7: 18-20. Heb. 8: 7-13, v. 12.) But men will at last be dealt with, not according to their confidence, but according as their conduct, especially towards their offending brethren, has evidenced the reality of their faith and love, or the contrary. This is our Lord's own inference from it: whatever men's profession may be, God will deliver them as 'wicked servants' to the tormentors, to be punished according to their sins with exact justice; if they 'do not from their heart,' which He especially regards, 'forgive their brethren their trespasses.' No doubt, if true believers are betrayed into any degree of this unchristian spirit, they will experience frowns, rebukes, and chastenings: but to suppose that a real Christian can be habitually of this unmerciful

32 Then his lord, after that he had called him, said unto him, O thou wicked servant, I forgave thee all that debt, because thou desiredst me:

33 Shouldst not thou also have had compassion on thy fellow-servant, even as I had pity on thee?

34 And his lord was wroth, and delivered him to the tormentors, till he should pay all that was due unto him.

helps meet a man, rather than such a fool in his folly; but they went to their lord, and besought him to appear for the oppressed against the oppressor. Note, That which gives us occasion for sorrow, should give us occasion for prayer. Let our complaints, both of the wickedness of the wicked and of the afflictions of the afflicted, be brought to God, and left with Him.

3. The master's just resentment of the cruelty his servant was guilty of, v. 32, 33. Now observe here,

(1.) How he reproved his servant's cruelty; O thou wicked servant. Note, Unmercifulness is wickedness, great wickedness. [1.] He upbraids him with the mercy he had found with his master; I forgave thee all that debt. Those that abuse God's favors, may expect to be upbraided, ch. 11: 20. Consider; It was all that debt, that great debt. Note, The greatness of sin magnifies the riches of pardoning mercy: we should think how much has been forgiven us, Luke 7: 47. [2.] He thence shows him the obligation he was under to be merciful to his fellow-servant, v. 33. Note, It is justly expected, that such as have received mercy, should show mercy. He who needs forgiveness, easily bestows it. Senec. Agamemn. He shows him, 1st, That he should have been more compassionate, because he had himself experienced the same distress. What we have had the feeling of ourselves, we can the better have the fellow feeling of with our brethren. The Israelites know the heart of a stranger, for they were strangers. 2dly, That he should have been more conformable to the example of his master's tenderness, having himself experienced it, so much to his advantage. Note, The comfortable sense of pardoning mercy tends much to dispose our hearts to forgive our brethren. It was in the close of the day of atonement, that the jubilee-trumpet sounded a release of debts (Lev. 25: 9.) for we must have compassion on our brethren, as God has on us.

(2.) How he revoked his pardon, and cancelled the acquittance, so that the judgment against him revived; v. 34. Though the wickedness was very great, his lord laid on him no other punishment than the payment of his own debt. Note, Those that will not come up to the terms of the Gospel, need be no more miserable than to be left to the course of the law. See how the punishment answers the sin; he that would not forgive, shall not be forgiven. He delivered him to the tormentors. Note, The power of God's wrath to ruin us, goes far beyond the utmost extent of any creature's strength and wrath. The reproaches and terrors of his own conscience, that worm that dies not, and devils, the executioners of God's wrath, they are sinners' tempters now, will be their tormentors forever. He was sent to bridewell that he should pay all. Note, Our debts to God are never compounded; either all is forgiven, or all is exacted; glorified saints in heaven are pardoned all, through Christ's complete satisfaction damned sinners in hell are paying all, that is, are punished for all. The offence done to God by sin, is in point of honor, and therefore, some way or other, by the sinner, or by his surety, it must be satisfied.

Lastly, Here is the application of the whole parable; v. 35. The title Christ here gives to God, was made use of, (v. 19.) in a comfortable promise; It shall be done for them of my Father which is in heaven; here it is made use of in a terrible threatening. If God's government be fatherly, it follows thence that it is righteous, though not that it is not rigorous, or that under his government we must not be kept in awe by the fear of the divine wrath. When we pray to God as our Father in heaven, we are taught

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 23 -35. While we sinners live so entirely on mercy and forgiveness, how backward are we to forgive the offences of our brethren! Yet let us not think that any provocation can authorize us to harbor resentment, or seek revenge. This we can never suppose, if we consider duly, how many and aggravated our former and later transgressions have been, against our Creator and daily Benefactor; and how ready He is to forgive us, when we repent and seek his face. If He enter into judgment with us, our debt will be found immensely large; all the terrible curses of the law will be adjudged to be our righteous desert; and it will be in vain for us to say, 'Have patience with me, and I will pay thee all.' This the humbled sinner will perceive, and he will rely only on free abounding mercy, through the ransom of the death of Christ: in this way, his sins will be 'blotted out,' and 'buried in the depths of the sea;' and his gentle, forgiving, and compassionate spirit and conduct towards those who have injured him, or are dependent on him, will prove him a partaker of the Spirit and mind of Christ. But the unhumiliated professor of the Gospel will often betray himself, by a harsh, unforgiving, and unrelenting behavior to his debtors, his servants, the poor, and especially to those who have offended him. Such men scandalize the cause, and grieve true believers; but they deceive and destroy themselves, and their offended Lord will shortly deliver them, as 'wicked servants,' to the executioners of his vengeance, and the everlasting punishment prepared for the workers of iniquity. (See 25: 41-46.) Let us then examine ourselves, whether 'from our hearts we forgive every one his brother his trespasses.' Let us frequently ask ourselves, whether our conduct towards poor debtors, supplicants, or such as have affronted us, resembles the merciful conduct of our Lord towards us; and let us seek more and more for the renewing grace of God, to teach us to forgive others, even as we hope for forgiveness from Him.

and malignant temper, and act according to it. (Morg. Ref. t. u.—See 6: 12, 14, 15. Luke 6: 37, 38. 17: 3, 4. Eph. 5: 30—32. Col. 3: 12—15. (34.) Tormentors. If a person was suspected of fraud, (as there was reason for in this case) he was put to very cruel tortures among the Asiatics, to induce him to confess. In the punishments of China, a great variety of these appear; and probably there is an allusion to such tortures here. But if this refers to the day of judgment, then the worm that dieth not, and the fire that is not quenched, are the tormentors.

Bloomfield, however, translates tormentors, for tormentors, and says it does not appear that creditors had the power of using torture towards their debtors.

(43.) Reader, hast thou a child or servant who has offended thee, N. T. VOL. I.

and humbly asks forgiveness? Hast thou a debtor or a tenant who is insolvent, and asks a little longer time? Thy child is banished thy debtor in prison, thy tenant sold up; yet the child offered to run at thy feet; and the debtor, utterly insolvent, prayed for a little longer time; but to these things thy stony heart and seared conscience paid no regard! Monster of ingratitude, if thou canst, go hide thyself from the face of the Lord! In our common method of dealing with insolvent debtors, we in some sort imitate the Asiatic customs; we put them in prison, and all their circumstances there are so many tormentors; the place, the air, the company, the provision, the accommodations, all, all are destructive to comfort, to peace, to health, and to every thing that humanity would devise. If the person be poor, or comparatively poor, is his imprisonment likely to lead him to discharge his debt? But he had no other way to discharge it than by his labor; that is now impossible through his confinement, and the creditor is put to a certain expense towards his maintenance. How foolish this policy! What other end can be answered by it than the gratification of the malice, revenge or inhumanity of the creditor?

Jesus journey towards Judea, and he is the sick, 1, 2; answers the Pharisees concerning divorces, and his disciples on the expediency of marriage, 3-12; receives little children, 13-15; discourses with a rich young man, concerning eternal life, and detects a false wealth more than of God, 16-22; shews the difficulty of a rich man's salvation, 23-26; and makes gracious promises to those, who renounce worldly objects for his sake, 27-30.

bear the Christian name, persist in the most rigorous and unmerciful treatment of their brethren, as if the strictest laws of Christ might be dispensed with, to gratify their unbridled passions; and so they curse themselves every time they say the Lord's prayer.

CHAP. XIX. v. 1, 2. We have here an account of Christ's removal. Observe,

1. He left Galilee. There He had spent the greatest part of his life; it being only on occasion of the feasts, that He came up to Jerusalem, and manifested Himself there. But it was an instance of his humiliation, and in this, as in other things, He appeared in a mean state; that He would go under the character of a Galilean, a north-countryman, the least polite and refined part of the nation. Most of Christ's sermons hitherto had been preached, and most of his miracles wrought in Galilee; but now, having finished these sayings, He departed from Galilee, and it was his final farewell; (unless his passing through the midst of Samaria and Galilee, Luke 17: 11. was after this, which yet was but a visit, as He passed through the country.) Christ did not take his leave of Galilee till He had done his work there, and then He departed thence. Note, as Christ's faithful ministers are not taken out of the world, so they are not removed from any place, till they have finished their testimony in that place, Rev. 11: 7. This is very comfortable to those that follow not their own humors, but God's providence, in their removals. And who would desire to continue any where longer than he has work to do for God there?

NOTES.

CHAP. XIX. v. 1, 2. This seems to have been our Lord's final departure from Galilee, previous to his crucifixion: but He took a large compass in his journey, and passed through the districts which lay east of Jordan. (Marg. Ref.—See Luke 13: 22-30, v. 22.) SCOTT.

(1.) Beyond Jordan.] 'Or, by the side of Jordan.'

'Bezai and some other critics render it, on the banks of Jordan; and this may seem more suitable to what is said of Christ's coming to the coasts of Judea, which was bounded by Jordan, and had no coasts beyond it. But it appears from John 10: 40. that our Lord removed to Bethabara, (John 1: 28.) which was undoubtedly beyond Jordan. And this over against Jericho. Compare Josh. 3: 16. and Judg. 7: 24. And this was so near to the coasts of Judea, that we might very well take the phrase as Matthew has expressed it; especially as it is probable that Jesus, during his abode in these parts, might often cross the river, and pass from Bethabara to Judea, which lay on the opposite side.'

DODDRIDGE.

Verses 3-6.

The school of Hillel taught, that a man might put away his wife for any cause, because this divorce was permitted, "if she found not grace in his eyes." (Deut. 24: 1.) The son of Sirach saith, "If she go not away, as thou wouldest have her, cut her off from thy flesh, give her a bill of divorce, and let her go." (Ecclesiastes, 25: 26.) And Josephus saith, "The law runs thus, He that will be disjoined from his wife, for any cause whatsoever, as many such causes there are, let him give her a bill of divorce." And he confesseth, that he himself put away his wife, after she had borne him three children, because he was not pleased with her behavior. But the school of Shammai determined on the contrary, that the wife was only to be put away for adultery; because it is said, "Because he hath found some uncleanness in her." (Leviticus, 20: 10.) (See 5: 31, 32. Ex 20: 14. Mark 10: 2-12. Luke 16: 18, 19.)

to ask for the forgiveness of sins, as we forgive our debtors. Observe here,

1. The duty of forgiving; we must, from our hearts forgive. Note, We do not forgive aright, nor acceptably, if we do not forgive from the heart; for that is what God looks at. No malice must be harbored there, or ill will; no projects of revenge must be hatched there, as there are in many who outwardly appear peaceable and reconciled. Yet this is not enough; we must from the heart desire and endeavor the welfare even of those that have offended us.

2. The danger of not forgiving; So shall your heavenly Father do. (1.) This is not intended to teach that God reverses his pardons, but that He denies them to those that are unequal for them, according to the tenor of the Gospel; though, having seemed to be humbled like Ahab, they thought themselves, and others thought them, in a pardoned state, and made bold with the comfort of it. Intimations enough we have in Scripture, of the forfeiture of pardons, for caution to the presumptuous; and yet we have security enough for the continuance of them, for comfort to those that are sincere, but timorous; that the one may fear, and the other may hope. Those that do not forgive, did never truly repent, nor ever truly believe; and therefore that which is taken away, is only what they seemed to have, Luke 8: 13. (2.) This is intended to teach us, that they shall have judgment without mercy, that have shewed no mercy, Jam. 2: 13. It is indispensably necessary to pardon and peace, that we not only do justly, but love mercy. It is an essential part of that religion which is pure and undefiled before God and the Father, of that wisdom from above, which is gentle and easy to be entreated. Look how they will answer it another day, who, though they were in the most rigorous and unmerciful treatment of their brethren, as if the strictest laws of Christ might be dispensed with, to gratify their unbridled passions; and so they curse themselves every time they say the Lord's prayer.

2. He came into the coasts of Judea, beyond Jordan, that they might have their day of visitation, as well as Galilee, though He went to those parts of Canaan that lay towards other nations; Galilee is called Galilee of the Gentiles; and the Syrians dwelt beyond Jordan. Thus Christ intimated that, while He kept within the confines of the Jewish nation, He had his eye on the Gentiles, and his Gospel was aiming and coming toward them.

3. Great multitudes followed Him. Where Shiloh be, there will the gathering of the people be. The redeemed of the Lord are such as follow the Lamb whithersoever He goes, Rev. 14: 4. It was a respect to Christ, and yet a continual trouble, to be thus crowded after, wherever He went; but He sought not his own ease, nor honor in the eye of the world, but veris civis doing good; for so it follows, He healed them there. This shews what they followed Him for; and they found Him as able and ready to help here, as He had been in Galilee. He healed them there, because He would not have them follow Him to Jerusalem, lest it should give offence. He shall not strive, nor cry.

V. 3-12. We have here the law of Christ in the case of divorce. Observe,

1. The case proposed by the Pharisees; v. 3. This they asked, tempting Him, not desiring to be taught by Him. Some time ago, He had, in Galilee, declared his mind in this matter, (ch. 6: 31, 32.) and if He would in like manner declare Himself now, they would make use of it to prejudice and incense the people of this country against Him, who would look with a jealous eye on one that attempted to cut them short in a liberty they were fond of. They hoped He would lose Himself in the affections of the people as much by this as by any of his precepts. Or, if He should say that divorces were not lawful, they would reflect on Him as an enemy to the law of Moses, which allowed them; if He should say that they were, they would represent his doctrine as not having that perfection in it which was expected in the doctrine of the Messiah; since, though divorces were tolerated, they were not, with the stricter sort of people, of good report. Some think, that, though the law of Moses did permit divorce, yet, in assigning the just causes for it, the Pharisees had a controversy among themselves, and they desired to know what Christ said to it. Matrimonial cases have often been intricate and perplexed; not by the law of God, but by the lust and follies of men; and often in these cases people resolve, before they ask, what they will do.

Their question is, Whether a man may put away his wife, as was now common with the looser sort of people, for every cause. The toleration, in this case, permitted it, in case she found

16-18.) 'For every cause.' That is, on account of any thing in her temper, or person, or for any infirmity, which rendered her disagreeable. (See Deut. 24: 1-4.) When marriage was instituted, sin and death had not entered: the sinful cause of separation afterwards mentioned, and the natural dissolution of the union, were therefore not referred to: but they have since been specified, and resemble the cutting off of a mortified limb, and the separation of the parts of the body by death. In all other respects, the union is to be considered as indissoluble. It is observable, that Christ inserts the word 'twain,' which is not in the original institution, but is added by the LXX, purposely, as it seems, to obviate all misconception of its meaning. (Marg. Ref. c—g.—Notes, Gen. 2: 21-25.) The apostle warning the Corinthians against fornication, says, 'He that is joined to an harlot, is one flesh.' Hence some have endeavored to prove, that nothing more is essential to marriage, than carnal knowledge; and that every woman is in fact the wife of him, who first knows her. But if this were so, such a crime as simple fornication could not exist, nor such a character as a harlot; for every female must either be a virgin, a wife, an adulteress, or a widow. The apostle, however, could not mean this: for the woman of whom he spake is supposed to have been previously a harlot, not a virgin; (Note, 1 Cor. 6: 12-17, v. 15-17.) and surely none will say, that when a man becomes one 'flesh with an harlot,' they are 'joined together by God, and man must not put them asunder.' The Lord brought Eve to Adam, and gave her to him, and thus joined them together in marriage, previous to their carnal intercourse: and some established and attested recognition, as well as the consent of parties, is absolutely needful to honorable marriage, and to distinguish those who live in that state, from the adulterers and fornicators whom God will judge.' It may also be added, that they, who from erroneous religious motives, either separate themselves from their wives, or usurp, or counsel others to do so, whatever specious arguments they may use, most evidently act in direct violation of Christ's command, and Notes pleasing of sense and the preserving of a seed. Hence the manner of expression is somewhat singular, (Gen. 1:27.) In the image of God created He him, male and female created He them; him and them are used promiscuously; being one by creation before they were two, when they became one again by marriage-covenant, that oneness could not but be closer and indissoluble.

2. The fundamental law of marriage, that a man shall leave father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife, v. 5. The relation between husband and wife is nearer than that between parents and children. May a child desert his parents, or a parent abandon his children for any cause, for every cause? No, by no means. Much less may a husband put away his wife, betwixt whom, though not by nature, yet by divine appointment, the relation is nearer, and the bond of union stronger, than between parents and children; for that is in a great measure superseded by marriage, when a man must leave his parents no favor in his eyes, because he hath found some uncleanness in her, Deut. 24:1. This they interpreted so largely as to make any disgust, though causeless, the ground of a divorce.

II. Christ's answer to this question; though proposed to tempt Him, yet, being a case of conscience, He gave a full answer to it; laying down such principles as undeniably prove that such arbitrary divorces as were then in use, were by no means lawful. Christ Himself would not give the rule without a reason, nor lay down his judgment without Scripture-proof to support it. His argument is this; 'If husband and wife are by the appointment of God joined together in the strictest and closest union, then they are not to be lightly, and on every occasion, separated; if the knot be sacred, it cannot be easily untied.' Now, to prove that there is such a union between man and wife, he urges three things.

1. The creation of Adam and Eve, concerning which He appeals to their own knowledge of the Scriptures; p. 4. It is some advantage in arguing, to deal with those that own, and have read, the Scriptures. Note, it will be of great use to us, often to think of our creation, how and by whom, what and for what, we were created. He made them male and female, one female for one male: so that Adam could not divorce his wife, and take another, for there was no other to take. It likewise intimated an inseparable union between them; Eve was a rib out of Adam's side, so that he could not put her away, but he must put away a piece of himself, and contradict the manifest indications of her creation. Christ hints briefly at this; but in appealing to what they had read, He refers them to the original record, where it is observable, that, though the rest of the living creatures were made male and female, yet it is not said so concerning any of them, but only concerning mankind; because between man and woman the conjunction is rational, and intended for nobler purposes than merely the to cleave to his wife. See here the power of a divine institution, that the result of it is a union stronger than that which results from the highest obligations of nature.

3. The nature of the marriage-contract: They twain shall be one flesh, no more twain, but one flesh. A man's children are pieces of himself, but his wife is himself; the conjugal union is in a manner equivalent to that between one member and another in the natural body. As this is a reason why husbands should love their wives, so it is a reason why they should not put away their wives. They would be one, therefore there must be but one wife, for God made but one Eve for one Adam, Mal. 2:15.

From hence he infers, What God hath joined together, let not man put asunder. Note, (1.) husband and wife are of God's joining together—He hath yoked them together, so the word is, and it is very significant. God Himself instituted the relation between husband and wife in the state of innocence. Marriage and the Sabbath are the most ancient of divine ordinances. Though marriage be common to the world, yet, being stamped with a divine institution, and here ratified by our Lord Jesus, it ought to be managed after a godly sort, and sanctified by the Word of God and prayer. A conscientious regard to God in this ordinance, would have a good influence on the duty, and consequently on the comfort of the relation. (2.) Husband and wife being joined together by the ordinance of God, are not to be put asunder by any ordinance of man. Let not man put them asunder; not the husband himself, nor any one for him: not the magistrate, God never gave him authority to do it. The God of Israel hath said, that He hateth putting away, Mal. 2:16. It is a general rule, that man must not put asunder what God hath joined together.

III. A plausible objection started by the Pharisees against this; p. 7. He urged Scripture reason against divorce, they allege Scripture authority for it. Note, The seeming contradictions that are in the Word of God, are great stumbling-blocks to men of corrupt minds: what they call a command, was only an allowance, (Deut. 24:1.) and designed rather to restrain the exorbitances of it, than to give countenance to the thing itself. The Jewish doctors themselves observe such limitations in that law, that it could not be done without great deliberation. A particular reason must be assigned, the bill of divorce must be written, and, as a judicial act, must have all the solemnities of a deed, executed and enrolled. It must be given into

(3.) Tempting Him. 'Trying what answer He would give to a question which, however decided by Him, would expose Him to censure.'

Is it lawful, &c.] 'What made our Lord's situation at present so critical in respect to this question was, at this time there were two famous divinity and philosophical schools among the Jews, that of SHAMMAI, and that of HILLEL. By answering the question, not from Shammai or Hillel, but from Moses, our blessed Lord defeated their malice, and confounded their devices.'

(5.) Shall cleave.] 'Shall be firmly cemented.' A beautiful metaphor, which most forcibly intimates that nothing but death can separate them: as a well-fused board will break sooner in the whole wood than in the glued joint.'

One flesh.] 'Not only meaning that they should be considered as one body; but also as two souls in one body, with a complete union of interests, and an indissoluble partnership of life and fortune, comfort and support, desires and inclinations, joys and sorrows.'

'It is solidly argued, from Adam's pronouncing concerning the obligation of a child's relation to its parent, which had never yet existed, that he spake these words in consequence of some divine illumination; nor could he otherwise have known what had passed in his sleep, or ever conjectured the original of woman to have been what he so plainly refers to.'

VERSES 7-9.

We find from St. Mark, that our Lord asked the Pharisees, what Moses had commanded them; (Mark 10:45.) and to this they answered, that he had commanded to give a bill, &c. (Mark 10:4, 5.) 'Because public laws are constrained to bear with some things, it followeth not that God alloweth them.' Beza. (Notes, Ex. 21:2. Deut. 24:1-4.) The general scope of this reasoning is equally applicable to polygamy. (Marg. Ref. 1-6.—Note, 3-6.) A question has been raised, and copiously disputed, whether those who, according to this permission of Moses, put away their wives, or married others, committed sin against God. But it is a question in which we are little concerned. In a state of sinless perfection, such things would not have been even desired. Some, no doubt, were very criminal in availing themselves of the permission, and were adulterers in the sight of God. Others might have stronger reasons and better motives for their conduct; and whatever was sinful in those true believers, who allowed themselves in the practices thus tolerated or connived at, was no doubt forgiven by the special mercy of God, on their general repentance.—Our Lord however added, that therefore whosever should put away his wife, except for unchastity, (which violates the marriage-covenant, and destroys as it were the very nature of it,) and should marry another woman, would be adjudged an adulterer; as that man also would, who should marry the divorced woman. Whatever injustice there might be in the divorce, it could not be 'adultery against' the divorced woman, if the man and woman were not put entirely upon a level in this respect: so that under the Christian dispensation, the husband, who for the husband to take another woman, as for the wife to take another man. (Marg. Ref. 9-8.—See Mal. 2:13-16. Mark 10:2-12, p. 11, 12. Luke 16:16-18, p. 18. 1 Cor. 7:1-5.) Some argue, that as adultery was punishable by death according to the law of Moses, and the betrothed virgin was considered as the wife of him to whom she was contracted, and included in this law; the word rendered 'fornication' should be here understood in its usual sense, exclusively; so that the reason, why the woman who had been guilty of fornication might, nay must, be divorced, was this: 'She was in fact another man's wife, and to retain her would be to live in adultery.' This, however, increases the difficulty: for the woman who was detected at her marriage of unchastity before her espousals, was likewise condemned to die: so that, supposing these three laws rigorously executed, no woman detected, after marriage, of previous fornication, could escape death; and, according to this opinion, no man might marry her, who pleaded guilty of that crime, because she was already another man's wife. (Notes, Lev. 20:10-19, p. 10. Deut. 22:13-27.) For in that case none could be spared, but she who confessed her guilt, and no man on this supposition might marry her: and surely it is very absurd to suppose, that a word, constantly used in an ill sense through the whole Scripture, should here be considered as synonymous with marriage; for unless the woman who had committed fornication was, by so doing, married to her paramour, the whole argument falls to the ground. Did not many lay hold of such unguarded concessions, in reputable ways to support or palliate a most licentious system, which is secretly doing immense mischief, learned men might possess their peculiar notions undisturbed, at least by the author. In fact, these laws were seldom

5 He saith unto them, 'because of the hardness of your hearts, I suffered you to put away your wives: but from the beginning it was not so.

God not only sees, but foresees the hardness of men's hearts; He suited both the ordinances and providences of the Old Testament to the temper of that people, both in terror. Further observe, The law of Moses considered the hardness of men's hearts, but the Gospel of Christ cures it; his grace takes away the heart of stone, and gives a heart of flesh. By the law was the knowledge of sin, but by the Gospel its conquest.

2. He reduces them to the original institution, v. 8. Note, Corruptions that are crept into any ordinance of God, must be purged out by having recourse to the primitive institution. Thus, when Paul would redress the grievances in the church of Corinth, about the Lord's supper, he appealed to the appointment, (1 Cor. 11:23.) So and so I received from the Lord. Truth was from the beginning; we must therefore inquire for the good old way, (Jer. 6:16.) and reform, not by latter patterns, but by ancient rules.

3. He settles the point by an express law, (v. 9.) and it agrees with what He said before; (ch. 5: 32.) there it was said in preaching, here in dispute, but it is the same; Christ is constant to Himself. Now, in both these places,

(1.) He allows divorce in case of adultery; the reason of the law against divorce being this, They two shall be one flesh. If the wife play the harlot, and make herself one flesh with an adulterer, the reason of the law ceases, and so does the law. By the law of Moses, adultery was punished with death, Deut. 22:22. Now our Savior mitigates the rigor of that, and appoints divorce to be the penalty. Whithy understands this, not of adultery, but (because our Savior uses the word fornication) of uncleanness committed before marriage, but discovered afterward; because, if it were committed after, it was a capital crime, and there needed no divorce.

(2.) He disallows it in all other cases, v. 8. This is a direct answer to their query, that it is not lawful. In this, as in other things, gospel-times are times of reformation, Heb. 9:10. The law of Christ tends to re-instate man in his primitive integrity; the law of love, conjugal love is no new commandment, but was from the beginning. If we consider what mischiefs to families and states, what confusions and disorders, would follow upon arbitrary divorces, we shall see how much this law of Christ is for our own benefit, and what a friend Christianity is to our secular interests.

The law of Moses allowing divorce for the hardness of men's hearts, and the law of Christ forbidding it, intimate, that Christians being under a dispensation of love and liberty, tenderness of heart may justly be expected among them, that they will not be hard-hearted, like Jews, for God has called us to peace. There will be no occasion for divorces, if we forbear one another, and forgive one another in love as those that are, and hope to be, forgiven, and have found God not forward to put us away, Isa. 50:1. No need of divorces, if husbands love their wives, and wives be obedient to their husbands, and they live together as heirs of the grace of life: and these are the laws of Christ, such as we find not in all the law of Moses.

V. A suggestion of the disciples against this law of Christ; v. 10. It seems, the disciples themselves were loath to give up the liberty of divorce, thinking it a good expedient for preserving comfort in the married state. Though from the beginning, when no divorce was allowed, God said, It is not good for man to be alone, and pronounced them blessed, who were thus strictly joined together; yet, unless they may have a liberty of divorce, they think it is good for a man not to marry. Note, 1. Corrupt nature is impatient of restraint, and would fain have a liberty for its own lusts. 2. It is a foolish thing for men to abandon the comforts of life, because of the crosses woven in with them. As if we must needs go out of the world, because we have not every thing to our mind in the world; or must enter into no useful calling or condition, because it is made our duty to abide in it. No, whatever our condition is, we must bring our minds to it, be thankful for its comforts, submissive to its crosses, and, as God has done, set the one over against the other, and make the best of that which is, Eccl. 7:14. If the yoke of marriage may not be thrown off at pleasure, it does not follow that therefore we must not come under it; but therefore when we do come under it, we must resolve to comport with it, by love and meekness and patience, which will make divorce the most unnecessary, undesirable thing that can be.

VI. Christ's answer to this suggestion, (v. 11, 12.) in which,

1. He allows it good for some not to marry; He that is able to receive it, let him receive it. Christ allowed what the disciples said, It is not good to marry; not as an objection against the prohibition of divorce, as they intended it, but as giving them a rule, (perhaps no less unpleasant to them,) that they who have the gift of continence, and are not under any necessity of marrying, do best if they continue single; (1 Cor. 7:1.) for they that are unmarried have opportunity, if they have but a heart, to care more for the things of the Lord, how they may please the Lord, 1 Cor. 7:32, 34. The increase of grace is better than the increase of the family, and fellowship with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ, is to be preferred before any other fellowship.

2. He allows it, to forbid marriage, because all men cannot receive this saying; indeed few can, and therefore the crosses of the married state must be borne, rather than that men should run themselves into temptation, to avoid them; better marry than burn.

Christ here speaks of a two-fold unfitness to marriage:

discreetly executed under the Old Testament: being judicial regulations, they were not intended for the new dispensation, as of divine obligation; and concerning this our Lord was authoritatively laying down injunctions. The word rendered 'fornication' is in many places used as a general term, so that, undoubtedly, the common interpretation is the true one. Note also hence, that according to either interpretation, where it is lawful to put away the wife, it is so to marry again. Whithy.

Verses 10-12.

Jesus replied, that all men were not capable of complying with such a restriction; for seeing the human species was to be continued, and that men were generally to marry for that purpose, God had so constituted them, that many could not live, conscientiously and comfortably, in a single state. Indeed some were born with such a temperament of body that they were all their lives devoid of those inclinations, to which [185] others are subject: some were mutilated in infancy, through the violence or policy of men; and others were successful in their endeavors to subdue their natural inclinations, that they might more entirely dedicate their time and talents to the service of God, and have less incumbency in so doing. And if any man found himself disposed to that kind of life, and capable of it, it might be good for him not to marry; as he might be more useful in promoting the kingdom of heaven among men. Thus our Lord intimated to the apostles, that, whatever they chose for themselves, they must impose no restrictions on others in this matter.

(10.) It is not good to marry. 'God has said, (Gen. 2:18.) it is not good for man to be alone, i. e. unmarried. The disciples seem to say, that if the husband have not the power to divorce his wife when she is displeasing to him, it is not good for him to marry. Here was a flat contradiction to the decision of the Creator. There are difficul-

(1.) That which is a calamity by the Providence of God; such as those labor under, who are born eunuchs, or made so by men, who, being incapable of answering one great end of marriage, ought not to marry. But to that calamity let them oppose the opportunity that there is in the single state, of serving God better, to balance it.

(2.) That which is a virtue by the grace of God; such as theirs who have made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake. This is meant of an unaptness for marriage, not in body, but in mind. Those have thus made themselves eunuchs who have attained a holy indifference to all the delights of the married state, have a fixed resolution, in the strength of God's grace, wholly to abstain from them; and by fasting, and other instances of mortification, have subdued all desires towards them. These are they that can receive this saying; and yet these are not to bind themselves by a vow that they will never marry, only that, in the mind they are now in, they purpose not to marry.

* Now, [1.] This affection to the single state must be given of God, for none can receive it, save they to whom it is given. Note, Contenance is a special gift of God to some, and not to others; and when a man in the single state finds, by experience, that he has this gift, he may determine with himself, and (as the apostle speaks, 1 Cor. 7: 37.) stand steadfast in his heart, having no necessity, but having power over his own will, that he will keep himself so, take heed lest they boast of a false gift, Prov.

lusts and pleasures, it is so far from being a virtue, that it is an ill-natured vice; but when it is for religion's sake, not as in itself a meritorious act, (which the papists make it,) but only as a means to keep our minds more entire for and more intent on, the services of religion, that having no families to provide for, we may do the more in works of charity, then it is approved and accepted of God. Note, That condition is best for us, and to be chosen accordingly which is best for our souls, and tends most to prepare us for, and preserve us to, the kingdom of heaven.

V. 13-15. We have here the welcome Christ gave to some little children that were brought to Him. Observe,

1. The faith of those that brought them. How many were brought, we are not told; but they were so little as to be taken up in arms, a year old, it may be, or two, at most. They were brought to Him that He should put his hands on them and pray, v. 13. Probably their parents, guardians, or nurses brought them; and herein, 1. They testified their respect to Christ, and the value they had for his favor and blessing. Note, Those who glorify Christ by coming to Him themselves, should further glorify Him by bringing all they have, or have in influence upon, to Him likewise. 2. They did so kindness to their children, not doubting but they would fare the better, in this world and the other, for the blessing and prayers of the Lord Jesus. Others brought their children to Christ, to be healed when they were sick; but these children were under no present malady, only they desired a blessing for them. Note, It is a good thing to come to Christ ourselves, and bring our children to Him, not only in

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-12. We are again called to follow the divine Savior, as 'He went about doing good; let us not fail to look earnestly to Him, that we may not be wearied in well-doing, by the ingratitude and perverseness of our fellow sinners. Human depravity has deranged and perverted the appointments of the all-wise Creator, to the introduction of accumulated misery; and oppressors share the consequences with those, whom they oppress: but the Gospel is intended to soften the heart, and meliorate the spirits of men, as well as to regulate their passions and subdue their iniquities. When it is really embraced, it renders men affectionate relatives and faithful friends; teaches them to 'bear with the infirmities,' and 'to bear the burdens,' of those with whom they are connected; and to consider their interest, peace, and happiness, more than their own indulgence or convenience. This will reduce marriage, in good measure, to its original institution; and teach the parties concerned to regulate their conduct respecting it by the law of God, and not by their own humor, passion, or caprice. The true Christian will consider his wife, as the gift and appointment of the Lord, and his union with her as God's ordinance: he will learn to love her as his own flesh; and no more want a separation, than he would desire to have his limb cut off, or his flesh mangled. This he regards as a desperate and most painful remedy, in case of an incurable gangrene. He will consider the regulations of the divine law, as the dictates of wisdom and love, and every temptation as a source of temptation and disquietude, and the want of domestic felicity: and will perceive, that this view of the marriage-union, as indissoluble, and as an inseparable conjunction of interests and comforts till death, gives the most effectual motives to persevering endeavors for mutual peace and harmony. (Notes, Eph. 5: 22-23. 1 Pet. 3: 1-7.) Should a Christian even be united with an unconverted person, (which is indeed a heavy affliction,) he will see it best to take it up as his cross, and to submit to the will of God in thus correcting him; endeavoring to extract good from it, and expecting grace sufficient to support him under it: this he will perceive to be far preferable to any irregular method of dissolving the union. As to ungodly persons, it is proper, that their passions should be so restrained by human law, that they may not prove injurious to the peace of society. It does not indeed follow, that 'if the case of a man be so with his wife, it is' generally 'not good to marry;' but it certainly proves, that men should enter into this state with great seriousness, consideration, and fervent prayer; that they should not form the indissoluble union with one, whose external appearance or riches are the chief recommendation; and that Christians should be very careful not to be 'unequally yoked with unbelievers.' (Notes, P. 18: 22. 19: 13, 14. 31: 10-12.) As to the rest, our gracious Lord has imposed upon us no rigorous restrictions; but has left each of his disciples to choose that state of life, in which he can serve God, and mind the concerns of his soul, with most comfort and least distraction; and his condescending and considerate statement of this difficult subject forms a proper example for his people to imitate, in their conduct towards one another.

ies and trials in all states; but let marriage and celibacy be weighed impartially, and I am persuaded the former will be found to have fewer than the latter. However, before we enter into an engagement, which nothing but death can dissolve, we had need to act cautiously; carefully consulting the will and word of God. Where an unbridled passion, or a base love of money, leads the way, marriage is sure to be miserable.

(12.) For the kingdom of heaven's sake. 'I believe our Lord here alludes to the case of the ESSENEs, one of the most holy and pure sects among the Jews. These abstained from women, hoping thereby to acquire a greater degree of purity, and be better fitted for the kingdom of God: children they had none of their own, but constantly adopted those of poor people, and brought them up in their own way.'

Verses 13-15.

Christ might in part be displeased with the disciples, for so soon forgetting that instructive discourse which has been considered. (Notes, 18: 1-5.) and doubtless He meant to encourage parents to seek a blessing from Him, on their children, from their earliest infancy; and to teach the children to look to Him, as soon as they can understand his words. Christ did not indeed order these infants to be baptized; for Christian baptism was not then instituted, and circumcision was still in force. (Notes, 23: 19, 20.) Yet the passage seems to give considerable sanction to that method of bringing children to Christ; and we must think those disciples mistaken, who object to it, sometimes with arguments, which would have equally held good against infant-circumcision, or against 'bringing infants to Christ that He might touch them.' Indeed, the expression may also intimate that the kingdom of heavenly glory is greatly constituted of such as die in their infancy. Infants are as capable of regeneration, as grown persons; and there is ground to conclude, that all those who have not lived to commit actual transgressions, though they share in the effects of the first Adam's offence, will also share in the blessings of the second Adam's gracious covenant, without their personal faith and obedience, but not without the regenerating influence of the Spirit of Christ. What a topic of exhortation would this transaction give the ministers of Christ, if these parents afterwards brought up their children in an unchristian manner, or set them a bad example! or with the children, if they renounced that Savior, who had so condescendingly taken them in his arms and blessed them! In what a variety of ways, might instructions and admonitions, both to the parents and the children, have been grounded upon it: and what a sweet subject of converse would it afford to the parents, in afterwards instructing the children! What a plea in prayer for them. And might not infant-baptism be improved to similar purposes, did all who approve and contend for it, bestow true pains to make it a means of grace to themselves and those concerned? (Marg. Ref.—See Mark 10: 13-16.)

(13.) Put his hands on them, and pray. 'It appears to have been customary among the Jews, when one prayed for another who was present, to lay his hand upon the person's head.' [Gen. 18: 14. Matt. 9: 18. Acts 6: 6. 8: 17.]

reproved them that made it. Either they thought it below their Master to take notice of little children, except any thing in particular ailed them, or that He had toil enough with his other work, and would not have Him diverted from it; or, that if such an address were encouraged, all the country would bring their children to Him, and they should never see an end of it. Note, It is well for us, that Christ has more love and tenderness than the best of his disciples have. And let us learn of Him not to discountenance any well-meaning souls in their inquiries after Him, though weak. Those that seek Christ must not think it strange if they meet with opposition and rebuke, even from good men, who think they know the mind of Christ better.

III. The favor of our Lord Jesus.

1. He rebuked the disciples, and rectifies the mistake, v. 14. Note, (1.) The children of believing parents belong to the kingdom of heaven, and are members of the visible church. Of such, not only in disposition and affection, (that might have served for a reason why doves or lambs should be brought to Him), but of such in age, to them pertain the privileges of visible church-membership, as among the Jews of old. The promise is to you, and to your children. I will be a God to thee and thy seed. (2.) That for this reason they are welcome to Christ, who is ready to entertain those who, when they cannot come themselves, are brought to Him. And this, [1.] In respect to the little children themselves, whom He has on all occasions expressed a concern for; and who, having participated of the malignant influences of the first Adam's sin, must needs share in the riches of the second Adam's grace, else what would come of the apostle's parallel, 1 Cor. 15: 22. Rom. 5: 14, 15, &c. Those who are given to Christ, as part of his purchase, He will in no wise cast out. [2.] With an eye to the faith of the parents that brought them. Parents are trustees of their children, empowered by nature to transact for their benefit; and therefore Christ accepts their dedication of them as their act and deed, and will own these dedicated things in the day He makes up his jewels. [3.] Therefore He takes it ill of those who forbid and exclude those whom He has received, who cast them out from the inheritance of the Lord, and say, Ye have no part in the Lord; (see Josh. 22: 27.) and who forbid water, that they should be baptized, who, if that promise be fulfilled (Isa. 44: 3.) have received the Holy Ghost as well as we, for aught we know.

2. He received the little children, and did as He was desired; He laid his hands on them, that is, He blessed them. The strongest believer lives not so much by apprehending Christ, as by being apprehended of Him, (Phil. 3: 12.) not so much by knowing God as by being known of Him; (Gal. 4: 9.) and this the least child is capable of. If they cannot stretch out their hands to Christ, yet He can lay his hands on them, and so make them his own, and own them for his own.

Mathinks it has something observable in it, that, when He had done this, He departed thence, v. 16. As if He reckoned He had done enough there, when He had thus asserted the rights of the lambs of his flock, and made this provision for a succession of subjects in his kingdom.

V. 16-22. Here is an account of what passed between Christ and a hopeful young man, of great possessions, (v. 22.) a ruler, (Luke 18: 18.) and, as is probable, one of abilities beyond his years.

Now concerning this young man, we are told how fair he bid for heaven, and came short.

I. How fair he bid for hea.en. Here is, 1. The gentleman's serious address to Jesus Christ; v. 16. Not a better question could be asked, nor more gravely.

(1.) He gives Christ an honorable title, Good Master, not a ruling, but a teaching, Master. His calling him, Master, bespeaks his submissiveness, and willingness to be taught: and

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 13-15. The training up of children in true religion, is one grand design of God in marriage; and it beehoves all men to have respect to this in every step they take about it. And all Christians should, by faith and prayer, bring their children to the gracious Savior, at their birth, and even before it, that He may bless them with all his spiritual blessings. Whether they deem it right to devote their infant-offspring to Him in baptism, or form other conclusions on that controverted subject, they should certainly agree, in giving them up to Him, and bringing them up for Him. In attending to these important duties, we may take encouragement from the very rebuke which Christ gave his disciples, and from his readiness to grant the desire of these parents for their children: nor can we much doubt, that He really received and blessed them, as the lambs of his flock. Whilst we teach our children, as they become capable of learning, how ready the condescending Son of God is to answer their lisping petitions, and to accept of them as his disciples, we may be well satisfied, that He has taken to his heavenly kingdom such of them as have died in infancy: for doubtless the covenant is made with the believer, for the good of this part of his offspring in an especial manner. If then Christian parents have their beloved branches crot in the bud, they cannot surely have cause to complain; or to think much of their pain, care, or trouble, when they are made the instruments of God in raising up children to Him, who may inherit his everlasting kingdom.

SCOTT.

(14.) Of such is the kingdom of heaven. I acknowledge these words will not of themselves prove infant baptism to be an institution of Christ; but if that appears from other scriptures to be the case, (which I think probable,) there will be proportionable reason to believe that our Lord might here intend some reference to it; and I cannot apprehend of rendering [the original here] such as resemble these (that is, such children.) It is the part of a faithful translator not to limit the sense of the original, nor to fix what it leaves ambiguous. DOMINGUS.

Children have no appetite of revenge against those that hurt them, when the parents correct them; yet they cleave to them, and prefer them before all others: they would rather see their mother, though sordid and poorly clothed, than another in the most princely attire: they desire nothing beyond necessity; they are not distracted with cares of this world; nor know the many sins, wherewith years and maturity acquaint the best of the mere sons of men: if we will be saved, let us imitate these harmless patterns, which come nearest to our lost state of innocency.
